MCCULLOCH, C. J. Appellee, Herbert Harger, instituted this action in the circuit court of Franklin county against appellants, Wallace Harger and the Western Coal & Mining Company, to recover compensation for injuries sustained while he was working in a coal mine as an employé of appellants. It is alleged in the complaint that appellee was an employé of both of the appellants, and certain acts of negligence are set forth in the complaint as having been committed by other employés of appellants and that the personal injuries received by appellee resulted from said acts of negligence. In the answer filed by appellants the Western Coal & Mining Company denied that appellee was its employé or that it was operating the mine at the time of appellee's injury. The answer of each of the defendants also contained a denial with respect to the alleged acts of negligence and pleaded contributory negligence on the part of appellee and the assumption of risk on his part. The trial of the issues resulted in a verdict in favor of appellee against both of the appellants for the recovery of the sum of $2,187.50.

Appellee's injuries were received on April 21, 1919, while he was working in a coal mine near Denning. The mine was owned and formerly operated by the Western Coal & Mining Company, a corporation, but at the time of appellee's injuries it was being operated by appellant Wallace Harger under a written contract between him and the Western Coal & Mining Company. The character of this contract will be shown later.

Appellee was employed as the operator of an electric motor used in hauling a train of coal cars from what is called the "parting" to the foot of the shaft and then hauling the empties back from the shaft to the "parting," the distance between those two points being about 2,500 feet. The cars loaded with coal were made up into a train at the "parting," and appellee would connect the motorcar to the train and haul it to the foot of the shaft for the coal to be hoisted to the surface and then the empty cars would be made up into a train and hauled back to the "parting." This work was, of course, all underground, and the track between the two points was uneven—uphill and down. The coal cars in the train were coupled together by a crude appliance called a gooseneck, and on the occasion when appellee was injured the rear car became disconnected after the train left the "parting" en route to the foot of the shaft. This was caused by the coupling or gooseneck being too straight and the rear car loaded with coal was allowed to become disconnected from the train. The train on this occasion was composed of 17 cars, and appellee, without knowledge that the rear car had become disconnected, hauled the remainder of the cars to the foot of the shaft for the coal to be hoisted to the surface. The train arrived at the foot of the shaft just before noon, and one half of the cars were hoisted before the dinner hour and the other half after appellee had returned from his meal. The trainload of empties was made up and turned over to appellee and he proceeded on his journey, hauling the train back to the "parting," and when he had proceeded about 1,500 feet his train encountered the coal car on the track and collided with it. Appellee sustained serious personal injuries in the collision.

Five separate acts of negligence on the part of servants of appellants are alleged in the complaint as causing or contributing to appellee's injuries: First, that there was negligence in permitting the gooseneck or coupling attached to the rear car to become and remain straightened out, so that it would not hold its connection in the train; second, that Sam Young, the pit boss and mine foreman, was guilty of negligence in failing to notify appellee that one of the cars had been disconnected and was standing on the track, it being alleged that Young saw the car standing on the track and failed to notify appellee when he started on the return trip with the train of empties; third, that the brake on the motor had gotten out of repair, so that the train could not be stopped by means of the brake when danger was discovered; fourth, that the finger board on the motor had become defective and out of repair, so that the electric current could not be cut off and the train thereby stopped when danger was discovered; and, fifth, that there were no lights along the track so as to enable the operator of the motorcar to discover obstacles on the track, it being alleged that lights had been provided, but that at the time of this occurrence the sockets were empty and had no lamps in them.

Each of these alleged acts of negligence were, as before stated, denied by appellants in their answer, and they also alleged and introduced evidence tending to prove that it was the duty of appellee himself to check the number of cars in the train when it started on the trip from the "parting" and also when he was ready to return with the empties, leaving the foot of the shaft.

[1] It is contended by learned counsel for appellee that there is no bill of exceptions in the transcript, or rather that what purports to be the bill of exceptions is so confused and disconnected and that the certificate of the trial judge appears in such a way that there is no certainty about the authentication of the bill of exceptions as the one filed with the clerk. Time was allowed for filing the bill of exceptions, and during that time it was prepared and the oral proceedings were certified by the court stenographer. There appears on one of the pages a blank certificate for the signature of the trial judge, but it is unsigned, and on the next page there appears the certificate of the stenographer and also an agreement of counsel for the respective parties to sign, certifying that the foregoing bill of exceptions was correct, but this certificate was signed only by counsel for appellant and not by counsel for appellee. On this page there also appears the filing mark of the clerk showing that the bill of exceptions was filed on December 18, 1919. On several succeeding pages of the transcript there appear the instructions of the court and certain other proceedings, and finally there is attached the certificate of the judge, properly signed and dated December 17, 1919, in which the judge certified that "The above and foregoing is a true and perfect bill of exceptions in this cause." We think that, while the bill of exceptions is in somewhat confusing shape, there is sufficient to show that everything preceding the signature of the judge was treated as a part of the bill of exceptions and that it was properly certified. The fact that the filing certificate of the clerk appears several pages ahead of the certificate of the judge is not sufficient to show conclusively that the purported bill of exceptions ended at the place where the clerk affixed his filing certificate.

operating the mine at the time of appellee's injury. It is insisted that according to the undisputed evidence the Western Coal & Mining Company had leased the mine to its coappellant, Wallace Harger, and that appellee was employed by the latter and that the Western Coal & Mining Company had no connection whatever with his employment or service. After carefully considering the evidence we think that this contention is sound, and that the court erred in not giving a peremptory instruction in favor of the Western Coal & Mining Company, withdrawing the issue as to its liability from the jury.

The Western Coal & Mining Company owned the mine property and had been operating it for a number of years, but entered into a written contract with Wallace Harger on February 16, 1915, whereby it was agreed that the mine should be leased to Harger to be operated as a coal mine, and the testimony is clear and undisputed that the mine was being operated by Harger under said contract at the time appellee was injured. According to the express terms of this contract the mine was leased by the Western Coal & Mining Company to Wallace Harger and one Craig (Harger having subsequently succeeded to the rights of Craig), and the lessees undertook to operate the mine and to sell the coal mined therefrom to the Western Coal & Mining Company at a stipulated price on board cars at the time. Under this contract the lessees agreed:

"To operate and keep in proper repair all of the mining buildings, railway side tracks, mine workings and machinery, fans, pumps, pit cars, and all other implements, equipment, and tools as will appear on an inventory of such property attached hereto and made a part hereof, at the signing of this agreement; to remove all mine rails and ties from entries and rooms exhausted and suspended during their operations on the premises, and at the termination of this contract to leave the property in as good condition as it was when received, less the depreciation of actual use; or, upon the failure of said first parties to return any portion of such machinery, personal property, etc., said first parties agree to pay for same at a reasonable price to be agreed upon, and no buildings, machinery, fans, boilers, pumps, pit cars, or other personal property belonging to said mine shall be placed upon or taken from the premises of the second party without the consent in writing of its representative."

It was also agreed that the lessees should protect the lessor from any liability by reason of injury to persons or property, and to "provide such personal injury liability insurance as will indemnify and be satisfactory to the party of the second part."

The contract is, on its face, one for the leasing of the mine to be independently operated by Harger. There is nothing in the contract from which there can be gathered any intention to make the lessor responsible for the conduct of the lessees in the operation of the mine. The possession of the mine was completely surrendered to the lessee, and the agreement was that the latter should keep the same in repair. The only right reserved to the lessor was the right to send inspectors to see that the property was cared for and not injured. The reservation of this right did not make the lessor liable for the failure of the lessee to keep the premises in good repair, for one of the essentials of a contract to have work done independently is that the work is to be done in the course of an independent occupation according to the methods and under the direction of the contractor himself and that he represents the will of the owner only as to the result of the work done. Wheeler Co. v. Fitzpatrick, 135 Ark. 117, 205 S. W. 302. In the contract the lessor was exonerated from any duty to keep the premises in repair and this duty was cast upon the lessees. In this respect the contract does not resemble the one dealt with in the case of Collison v. Curtner, 216 S. W. 1059. Nor does the fact that the lessor in his contract with the lessee exacted of the latter an undertaking "to provide such personal injury liability insurance as will indemnify and be satisfactory" create responsibility on the part of the lessor for the negligent acts or omissions of the lessee. Appellant coal company had the right to require indemnity against all loss under any contingency without committing itself to an obligation to become responsible for any injuries to persons or property.

Outside of the contract itself there is no substantial evidence that the relation of the parties was other than that created by the express terms of the contract itself. Each of the circumstances introduced in evidence was entirely consistent with the relations of lessor and lessee created by the contract. The lessor was to purchase the output of the mine at a stipulated price, and the proof shows that it advanced money to the lessee on the pay roll and that Harger, the lessee, put himself on the pay roll covered by such advances. This circumstance is without any probative force to establish the fact that appellant Harger was a mere employé or agent of the coal company in the operation of the mine. It had the right to make advances under its purchases without the transaction being treated as a departure from the terms of the contract and as a change of its nature. The only other circumstance relied on is that the printed matter originally used by the coal company and left at its office when the property was turned over to the lessee was used by appellant Harger in making out his pay roll. Sufficient importance cannot be attached to this circumstance to make it constitute substantive proof that the mine was being operated by Harger as the agent of the coal company.

[3] It is contended that the testimony of appellee himself was sufficient to warrant the submission of the question as to whether or not the coal company was operating the mine and that appellant Harger was conducting the operations as the agent of the company. Appellee in his testimony made the statement that he was employed by the company, but this was a mere statement of a conclusion, as he gave no facts or circumstances to base it on. The undisputed evidence was that appellant Harger was in charge of the mine and employed the men therein. Appellee did not testify that he was employed by any one acting for the company, and his bare statement that he was employed by the company amounted to nothing more than a conclusion of his without any evidence to support it.

In holding, as we do, that no liability is established against appellant coal company, the judgment must be reversed as to that appellant. Other assignments of error relating solely to the liability of the company are thus eliminated from the discussion, and the further consideration of the court is confined to the questions regarding the liability of appellant Harger. According to the undisputed testimony Harger, as lessee of the mine, was operating it for himself and not associated with any other person or corporation.

The first question presented with respect to his liability arises upon the interpretation of the statute enacted by the General Assembly of 1907 (Acts of 1907, p. 163), which reads as follows:

"Section 1. That hereafter all railroad companies operating within this state, whether incorporated or not, and all corporations of every kind and character, and every company whether incorporated or not, engaged in the mining of coal, who may employ agents, servants or employés, such agents, servants or employés being in the exercise of due care, shall be liable to respond in damages for injuries or death sustained by any such agent, employé or servant, resulting from the careless omission of duty or negligence of such employer, or which may result from the carelessness, omission of duty or negligence of any other agent, servant or employé of the said employer, in the same manner and to the same extent as if the carelessness, omission of duty or negligence causing the injury or death was that of the employer."

[4] Does this statute apply to the operation of a coal mine by an individual? We have upheld the validity of this statute as applicable to railroad companies, and in the case of Ozan Lumber Co. v. Biddle, 87 Ark. 587, 113 S. W. 796, we upheld that portion of it which relates entirely to corporations "of every kind and character." The succeeding part of the statute applies to "every company, whether incorporated or not, engaged in the mining of coal," etc. The plain purpose of the framers of the statute was to make its provisions applicable to those engaged in the mining of coal, and the only question is whether or not the use of the word "company" is broad enough to include an individual engaged in that business. It being perfectly clear from the language used that the Legislature intended to regulate the business of coal mining, we should and ought to carry out that intention and give the language used a liberal interpretation in defining the word "company," and we think that that word used in this connection was intended to include individuals and is not limited to associations of persons. The strictest interpretation of the word would confine its application to corporations alone, but it is obvious that the Legislature did not mean it in that sense, for they had already provided for the regulation of all corporations, irrespective of the kind of business conducted. If we depart from this strict construction there is no reason discoverable why individuals could not come within the term, as well as association of individuals, such as partnerships. There is authority for this interpretation, and we think it is a correct view of the matter.

In the case of Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. State, 135 Ga. 545, 69 S. E. 725, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 20, the court held that—"The word 'company' does not necessarily mean a corporation, but may mean a firm, partnership or individual."

There was a like holding in Efland v. Southern Ry. Co., 146 N. C. 135, 59 S. E. 355; Keystone Pub. Co. v. Hill Dryer Co., 55 Misc. Rep. 625, 105 N. Y. Supp. 894; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Wright, 97 Ga. 114, 25 S. E. 249, 35 L. R. A. 497.

This question has never been before us for decision until the present case was presented, and the cases referred to on the brief of appellants did not go into this question, but, on the contrary, were decisive of other phases of the statute. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the statute applies to the operation of a coal mine by an individual, and that it abolished the common-law doctrine as to liability for acts of fellow servants and made the operator of the mine responsible to an employé for the negligent acts of his fellow servants.

The instructions given by the court were, we think, according to the well-settled principles of law with respect to relations between master and servant and the duties of one to the other. Those instructions are numerous and the assignments of error in regard to them are equally numerous, and a discussion of those matters is unnecessary, as no new question is presented.

[5] It is contended that the first instruction was erroneous because it submitted to the jury the issue of the employment of appellee by both of the appellants. This assignment raises the question of the legal sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict against the coal company, and that has already been disposed of in this opinion, but the elimination of the coal company from consideration does not make the instruction erroneous as to the other appellant.

Error of the court is assigned in refusing to give the following instruction requested by appellant:

"If it was the duty of the plaintiff to count the cars when he started with a trip, or if it was his duty to ascertain how many cars he had in the trip when he started, and if it was his duty also to count or ascertain the number of cars at the completion of the trip, so as to know whether any cars were left along the haulage way, then and in that event the plaintiff did not have the right to rely upon notice from the foreman, Sem Young. If the above are the facts, the defendant did not owe to the plaintiff the duty to warn plaintiff that he had left a car on the track, and in that event the jury will find for the defendants on the alleged negligence of defendant in failing to give notice of the presence of the car on the track."

[6] This instruction was erroneous in telling the jury that appellee should be denied the right to recover because of his own failure to ascertain the fact that one of the cars had been lost on the trip, notwithstanding the actual knowledge on the part of the foreman that the car was standing on the track in a dangerous position and his failure to notify appellee of that fact.

There is abundant testimony that it was the affirmative duty of the pit boss to notify the men of any dangerous conditions existing, and the evidence shows that Young, the foreman, had actual knowledge of the presence of the car and failed to notify appellee as he started on his return trip. Even though appellee failed to discharge the duty of counting the cars before he started on the return trip, yet the negligent failure of Young to notify him of the presence of the lost car on the track which created the danger was the intervening and proximate cause of the injury. It was a case of peril actually discovered by the representative of the employer and his negligence in failing to guard against it or give warning concerning it was the proximate cause of the injury. This instruction was therefore incorrect in excluding that element from the consideration of the jury.

[7] There are other assignments of error not of sufficient importance to consider. Several of them relate to matters to which no exceptions were saved, or which do not appear in the bill of exceptions. The question of permitting the appellee to introduce in rebuttal testimony which was not properly rebuttal testimony was a matter of discretion for the court, and we cannot say that the court abused its discretion in that respect.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause is dismissed as to the Western Coal & Mining Company, but as to appellant Wallace Harger the judgment is affirmed.

SECURITY LIFE INS. CO. OF AMERICA v. BATES. (No. 36.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 7, 1920.
Rehearing Denied July 5, 1920.)

1. Trial \S 177—Both parties, asking peremptory instruction, submit undisputed facts to trial court.

Where both parties ask for a peremptory instruction, and do nothing more, they assume the facts to be undisputed, and in effect submit to the trial court the determination of the inferences to be drawn from them.

2. Appeal and error \S 846(1) — Supreme Court, reviewing court case, limited to consideration of correctness of finding on law.

In reviewing action of trial court sitting as a jury, Supreme Court is limited to consideration of correctness of finding on the law, and must affirm the judgment, if there is any evidence to support finding.

3. Principal and agent \S 99—Principal bound by acts of agent within authority.

The general rule is that a principal is bound by the acts of its agent within his authority, including what is usually necessary to the performance of such duties.

4. Insurance \S 92—Evidence held to justify finding agent had authority to receive application relative to military service.

In an action on a life policy, issued to one subsequently killed in battle in France, evidence held to justify trial court in finding that agent who wrote policy was general agent of company in the particular town, and possessed at least apparent authority to receive application for permit to enlist in the army and go overseas, given him by insured's brothers, and to accept it.

5. Insurance \S 92—Evidence held to justify finding agent had authority to accept in particular form application for permit to enlist.

In action on life policy, issued to one subsequently killed in battle in France, evidence held to justify finding by trial court that insurer's general agent in town had authority to accept, in form in which it was presented to him by insured's brothers, application for permit to enlist and to go overseas, and that the brothers were justified in relying on his promise to attend to the matter of getting a permit.

6. Insurance §361—Arrangement by insured for payment of premiums through firm of which insurer's agent was credit man sufficient.

Where agent of life insurer agreed with insured and his brothers that while insured was in military service he would take care of premiums by advancing them from funds of firm for which he was credit man, and charging insured and his brothers on firm's books, both insured and his brothers were justified in believing agent would pay a premium when it fell due, together with an additional premium under a war risk clause, and, insured having been killed in battle, insurer cannot defend for nonpayment of extra premium.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Yell County;
A. B. Priddy, Judge.

Suit by Amos B. Bates, administrator of Alvin S. Bates, against the Security Life Insurance Company of America. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Amos B. Bates, administrator of the estate of Alvin S. Bates, sued the Security Life Insurance Company of America to recover on a policy of life insurance for $2,000. The company defended, on the ground that the policy had been forfeited, because the insured had not complied with the war clause contained in it.

On the 27th day of August, 1917, the Security Life Insurance Company of America issued a life insurance policy to Alvin S. Bates for $2,000, payable to the insured's administrators, executors, or assigns. The policy contained the following clause:

"This policy shall be incontestable after one year from its date, except for nonpayment of premiums, and except for naval or military service in time of war without a permit, which are risks not assumed by the company: Provided that, in case of the death of the insured while engaged in such service without a permit, the amount payable hereunder shall be the reserve on the policy at date of death. All statements made by insured shall, in the absence of fraud, be deemed representations, and not warranties, and no such statement shall void this policy, unless it is contained in the application therefor."

Amos B. Bates lived at Sulphur Springs, in Yell county, Ark., and was drafted into the army of the United States on September 19, 1917. While in the army at Camp Pike, Ark., in November, 1917, Alvin S. Bates sent to his brothers at Sulphur Springs, Ark., a paper writing in which he asked the company to issue him a permit to engage in the military service of the United States. The insured and his brothers traded with a mercantile firm in Dardanelle, in Yell county, of which Ben Wirt, the agent of the insurance company, was the credit man. Wirt had taken the application for the insurance and had delivered the policy to the insured. In fact, the policy was left by the insured in Wirt's possession. An arrangement was made with Wirt whereby the firm, of which he was the credit man, would pay the premiums as they fell due and charge the same to the account of the Bates Bros. While at Camp Pike, Ark., in November, 1917, the insured filled out an application to the company to secure a permit to engage in the military service of the United States and to go beyond the limits of the United States, and mailed it to his brothers at Sulphur Springs, Ark., and asked them to take it to Ben Wirt and do what was necessary to be done with regard to securing such permit. The brothers of the insured carried the application to Ben Wirt, and, handing it to him, asked Wirt for information as to what should be done in the premises. Wirt looked at the application and handed it back to the brothers of the insured, saying to them, "I will make it all right." Relying on the promises of the agent, the brothers went on home and never took any other steps in the matter. They did not pay the extra premium of $100 on the thousand required of those drafted in the army and going beyond the limits of the United States. They had made arrangements with Mr. Wirt for the firm, of which he was the credit man, to pay the premiums and charge the same to the account of the Bates Bros. Alvin S. Bates was sent to France, and in July, 1918, was killed in battle while in the military service of the United States. When the second premium became due, on August 27, 1918, Mr. Wirt paid the same and charged it to the account of the Bates Bros. He did not, however, pay the extra premium above referred to. At the time the payments were made it was not known that the insured had been killed in battle during the latter part of the previous month. The brothers of the insured relied wholly upon the promise made by Mr. Wirt to secure the permit for the insured to go with the army to France and to pay the premiums as agreed upon, and for that reason took no further steps in the matter.

Ben Wirt was a witness for the defendant. According to his testimony he was the agent of the insurance company at Dardanelle, and secured the application of Alvin S. Bates for a policy of $2,000 in the company. Soon after the United States became involved in the war with Germany, Wirt received instructions from the company that any policy holder who was engaged in the military service of the United States would have to have a permit from the company. Subsequently Wirt was instructed that any policy holder who had been granted this permit and went beyond the limits of the United States would have to pay an additional $100 on the thousand. Wirt wrote to the company for blank permits for the policy holders to fill out. The company wrote him that they had no regular forms at that time. Wirt then drew up some forms of his own and sent them to the policy holders. He mailed one of these to Alvin S. Bates at Camp Pike, Ark. He instructed Bates to sign the application for a permit, and put the number of his company and regiment on it, and forward it to the company. The form was never returned to Wirt, and he supposed, from that, that Bates had received it. Wirt wrote to the company, and asked if he would be allowed to sign his name to applications for permits, and was informed that the insured would have to sign in person. When the brothers applied to Wirt, he told them he would look after the matter for them and make it all right. He had in mind that he had already sent an application to Alvin S. Bates and thought that was sufficient.

On cross-examination Wirt was asked if the Security Life Insurance Company had a general agency at Dardanelle, Ark. He replied, "I represent them as general agent, local territory." Wirt further stated that it was only necessary for a policy holder to have a permit to engage in the military service of the United States, but that, if the policy holder went overseas in the service, an extra premium of $100 on each thousand was required. The company at first failed to send Wirt any blank forms for permits, because it did not have any. Later it did send to him such blank forms. Wirt explained to Alvin S. Bates that he would have to pay an extra premium if he went overseas in the United States army. He told Bates to notify him with regard to the matter before he left for France, and that he would take care of the matter for him. Wirt told Bates about the extra premium a few days before Bates went to Camp Pike. Wirt understood that Bates was about to be sent overseas at the time the brothers showed him the application which the insured had signed for permission to enter the military service. Both sides requested a peremptory instruction, and asked for no other instructions.

The court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and from the judgment rendered the defendant has appealed.

F. W. Bull, of Chicago, Ill., and T. E. Helm, of Little Rock, for appellant.

J. B. Crownover, of Dardanelle, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] Where both parties ask for a peremptory instruction, and do nothing more, they assume the facts to be undisputed, and in effect submit to the trial court the determination of the inferences to be drawn from them. St. L. I. M. & So. Ry. Co. v. Ingram, 118 Ark.

W. 692.

[2] In the case at bar each party asked the court for a peremptory instruction and requested no other instruction. This then amounted to a submission of the cause to the court sitting as a jury, and in reviewing the action of the trial court we are limited to a consideration of the correctness of the finding on the law, and must affirm the judgment if there is any evidence in support of the court's finding.

[3] Wirt testified that he was the general agent of the company in local territory. The general rule is that a principal is bound by the acts of its agent within the authority conferred upon him, and this includes what is usually necessary to the performance of such duties. In discussing the authority of a general agent in Oak Leaf Mill Co. v. Cooper, 108 Ark. 79, 146 S. W. 130, the court said:

"A principal is not only bound by the acts of the agent done under express authority, but he is also bound by all acts of a general agent which are within the apparent scope of his authority, whether they have been authorized by the principal or not, and even if they are contrary to express directions. The principal in such case is not only bound by the authority actually given to the general agent, but by the authority which the third person dealing with him has a right to believe has been given to him. Brown v. Brown, 96 Ark. 456. The question in all such cases relative to the acts of a general agent is, not whether the authority of such agent was limited, but whether the person dealing with such agent had knowledge or notice of such limitations of his authority."

Wirt said that he was the "general agent, local territory." The words "local territory" did not limit his powers as agent, but only restricted the territory over which he might exercise the powers of a general agent. Wirt testified that, when the brothers came to him and submitted the insured's application for a permit to go overseas, and he told them that it was all right, that he would attend to the matter, he had in mind that he had already sent a blank form to the insured at Camp Pike, to be filled out, and supposed that the insured would fill out the blank form and mail it to the company. In testing, however, the legal sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding of the court, we must consider the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. It does not appear that Wirt communicated to the brothers of the insured that he had already sent in a blank form to the insured at Camp Pike, to be there filled out by him and mailed to the company at its home office. Wirt told the brothers that it was all right and he would attend to the matter. He had already told the insured, when he passed through Dardanelle on his way to Camp Pike, to notify him in case he got orders to go overseas, so that he might attend to the matter of getting a permit for the insured. Wirt also told the insured that he would attend to the matter of paying the premiums.

[4] Under this state of the record the court was justified in finding that Wirt was general agent of the company at Dardanelle, and possessed at least the apparent authority to receive the application for a permit to enlist in the army and to go overseas, given to him by the insured's brothers, and to accept the same.

[5] The court was further justified in finding that he had authority to accept such application in the form it was presented to him, and that the brothers of the insured were justified in relying upon his promise in the premises. Therefore the evidence was legally sufficient to justify a finding by the trial court in favor of the plaintiff.

[6] Again it is insisted that the court was not warranted in finding in behalf of the plaintiff, because no extra premium was paid as required in case of policy holders who were soldiers in the United States army and had received permits from the company to enter such service and to go overseas and fight in the war with Germany. It will be remembered that the insured was killed in battle in France in July, 1918, and that his second premium was not due until the 22d of August, 1918. In pursuance of the agreement of the insured and his brothers, Wirt charged the amount of the second premium on the books of the merchant with whom he worked to the Bates Bros., and remitted the amount to the company. It is true this was done before any of the parties knew that the insured had been killed in battle, but it was done pursuant to an agreement made by

Wirt with both the insured and his brothers. Wirt was the credit man for a mercantile firm in Dardanelle, and had authority to say when and how much money would be paid by the firm for such customer. He agreed with the insured and his brothers to take care of the premiums on his policy, and to pay them to the company and charge the Bates Bros. with them on the books of the mercantile company. Of course, in making the payment to the insurance company, he was acting as agent of the Bates Bros.; but in receiving the money he was acting as agent of the insurance company. The Bates Bros. made an arrangement in advance with the mercantile company to secure the money, and Wirt promised to apply it to the payment of the premiums as they fell due. Both the insured and his brothers were justified in believing that Wirt would pay the second premium when it fell due, and that he would pay the additional premium under the war risk clause. They had made arrangements for the money with the mercantile firm of which Wirt was the credit man, and he agreed to send the money in to the insurance company. As general agent of the company, he had the authority to receive the money and send it in. The money was there under his control all the time, and he had nothing to do but send it in to the company. Therefore the court was justified in finding that the insured had done all that was necessary for him to do with regard to paying his premium. New York Life Insurance Co. v. Allen, 220 S. W. 803; Sovereign Camp, Woodmen of the World v. Newsom, 219 S. W. 759.

It follows that the judgment must be affirmed.

STATE v. NAVE. (No. 21897.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.

1. Witnesses \Leftrightarrow 384—Not impeachable by prior contradictory statements as to mere matter of opinion.

To impeach a witness by prior contradictory statements, they must be statements of fact pertinent to the issue, and not merely matters of opinion; facts which would be competent evidence independent of inconsistency with the witness' testimony; hence it was error to admit impeaching evidence that accused's father had previously stated in conversation, in accused's absence, that he thought accused had taken the mules he was accused of stealing.

2. Larceny \Leftrightarrow 68(1)—Evidence held insufficient to connect accused with stealing mules.

In trial for grand larceny, evidence as to accused's connection with the stealing of mules charged held insufficient to take the question of his guilt to the jury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Taney County;
Fred Stewart, Judge.

Mack Nave was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Reversed, and defendant discharged.

G. W. Thornberry, of Galena, and D. F. McConkey, of Forsyth, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and George V. Berry, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WHITE, C. The defendant was indicted in the circuit court of Taney county on a charge of grand larceny, was convicted April 24, 1919, and his punishment assessed at two years' imprisonment in the state penitentiary, and appealed.

Defendant was charged with stealing two mules that belonged to James Beck. Beck lived just within the state of Arkansas, about three miles from Protom, Mo. On the night of August 11, 1918, which was said by the witnesses to be Friday night, two bay mules belonging to Beck disappeared and he was unable to find them. About six weeks later he learned they were at the barn of Rich Kissee at Ozark, in Christian county.

He went there, identified them, and took them away. On Monday following the Friday night on which the mules were stolen they were sold to Stone & Hesterlee by one Wayne Moulder for $160, although at the time they were worth $235. Stone & Hesterlee immediately sold them to Kissee.

The facts relied upon by the state to connect the defendant with the theft of the mules briefly are as follows:

Mack Nave was a boy about 15 years of age, and lived with his father, Willis Nave, in Taney county, about 20 miles from where Beck, the owner of the mules, lived. Willis Nave had a son, Perry Nave, who lived in the neighborhood of Protom, a few miles from where Beck lived. On Friday, about August 11th, Mack Nave passed Beck's house and watched the house with unusual and unnecessary intentness, according to the statement of Beck. The mules disappeared that night. On Sunday two mules with halters on, answering the general description of Beck's mules, were seen in Willis Nave's pasture. It was suggested to Mack Nave that they had better be driven out. He said, "Let the mules get out the way they got in." The witnesses who saw those mules could not tell whether they were fastened up by halters or not. The defendant, Mack Nave, was in the neighborhood of Protom at the time the mules were stolen, and, according to the testimony of his brother, he stayed all night at Perry's house on that night, and remained there until noon the next day.

Wayne Moulder, who sold the mules to Stone & Hesterlee two days after they were stolen, was a farm hand in the employ of Willis Nave. When he brought the mules to Ozark he was riding a mule which belonged to Willis Nave; Mack Nave, the defendant, told some of the witnesses that he loaned Moulder that mule to ride Sunday night.

As soon as the mules were recovered, the defendant was arrested by the sheriff of Christian county and taken to Ozark. On the way the sheriff stopped at Sparta, in Christian county, where he told his prisoner that he would have to take him before a justice of the peace. He explained to Nave that he would have to have a preliminary trial or else waive it. The defendant did not seem to understand that he would have to go through a preliminary trial, and, after further explanation, he said: "Well, I guess I just as well plead guilty." Other witnesses heard him make the statement in connection with a preliminary hearing. No objection was made to that evidence. The next morning after he was taken to Ozark his father, Willis Nave, having ridden all night to reach Ozark, appeared there and paid Hesterlee $207, the amount the mules had cost Hesterlee with the expense. Hesterlee said he thought after that transaction the matter would be dropped. Beck then took the mules home. Wayne Moulder disappeared about the time the mules did and was not seen in the neighborhood afterwards.

On Sunday, when the mules were seen in Willis Nave's pasture, the place was in charge of one Norman Combs, who, it seems, had rented the place. He knew the mules referred to did not belong to Willis Nave. Some other facts are mentioned in the evidence tending to show the movements of Mack Nave and Wayne Moulder in the neighborhood Saturday and Sunday after the mules disappeared from Beck's place.

When Willis Nave was on the stand and recalled by the defendant in rebuttal, he was asked this question:

"I will ask you if you didn't have a conversation with Norman Combs in which you said, 'Aint this a good get-off?' and he said, 'Yes, sir; it is,' and you said, 'What do you think of this?' and he refused to tell you there before the family, and out in the field the next morning you asked him again, 'What do you think about this?' and you told him that you thought Mack had taken the mules."

The witness denied making any such statement.

Norman Combs was then placed upon the stand and asked if the conversation took place—the defendant not present—in substantially the same language as in the question put to Willis Nave. He answered that Nave did make the statement. All this was duly objected to by appellant's counsel and exceptions saved.

[1] 1. The evidence offered and admitted to contradict Willis Nave was gross error. While a witness may be impeached by showing that he has made statements at other times in contradiction of what he testifies on the stand, contradictory statements, which may be shown for the purpose of impeachment, must be statements of facts pertinent to the issue, and not merely matters of opinion; facts which would be competent evidence independent of any inconsistency with the testimony of the witness. Hamburger v. Rinkel, 164 Mo. 398, loc. cit. 407, 64 S. W. 104; McFadin v. Catron, 120 Mo. 252, loc. cit. 263, 25 S. W. 506; Schloemer v. Transit Co., 204 Mo. loc. cit. 118, 102 S. W. 565; Wojtylak v. Coal Co., 188 Mo. loc. cit. 289, 87 S. W. 506; Herman v. Ry., L. & P. Co., 144 Mo. App. loc. cit. 154, 129 S. W. 414. Here the former statement of Willis Nave, which the state was allowed to prove, merely gave his opinion. It is not a statement of any fact within the knowledge of the witness or within the knowledge of Nave. Its damaging character is sufficient to account for the verdict.

[2] II. In order to convict it was necessary by competent evidence, to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. The statement made by the appellant when under arrest that he thought he had better plead guilty was incompetent, but was not objected to. A boy 15 years of age, in custody of an officer, a threatened prosecution for grand larceny impending, with no friend or counsel near to advise him, makes the statement which on its face does not prove he actually participated in taking the mules. It was only an expression of helplessness and despair in the heart of the boy, and, under the circumstances, ought not to be considered as evidence against him.

There is no other fact in the evidence which accomplishes more than to arouse a mere suspicion that he participated in the theft. There is no doubt of the guilt of Wayne Moulder. He took the mules away from the neighborhood of Protom to another county and sold them, got the money, and disappeared. It is not shown that the defendant assisted in any manner in taking the mules away or received any of the proceeds of the sale. He passed Beck's house on the day preceding the night on which the mules were stolen and actually looked at Beck's house with considerable interest. It is not even claimed that he looked at the mules or saw them on that occasion. He loaned Moulder the mule on which he rode the night he took the mules away. It is not shown to be anything unusual for one to loan a mule or saddle horse in that community without inquiring the purpose for which it may be used. If there had been evidence that Mack Nave knew where Moulder was going and what he borrowed the mule for, the evidence of that loan might have some probative force.

The mules seen in the pasture of Willis Nave the day after Beck's mules disappeared were not shown to be the stolen mules. That pasture at that time was not in charge of Mack Nave or of his father, Willis Nave, but was in charge of Norman Combs, a witness for the state. It was not shown that the defendant brought the mules there or took them away or had anything to do with them while they were there except to tell some one that they might get out the way they got in.

The evidence was entirely insufficient to submit to the jury the question of the defendant's guilt.

The judgment is reversed, and the defendant discharged.

RAILEY and MOZLEY, CC., concur.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion by WHITE, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

STATE v. JACKSON. (No. 21916.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Indictment and information \S 110(38)—Indictment for carrying concealed weapons following statute held sufficient.

An information setting out the crime of carrying concealed weapons in accordance with approved precedents and closely following Rev. St. 1909, \S 4496, is sufficient.

2. Criminal law \S 875(1)—Verdict finding defendant guilty as charged held sufficient.

In a prosecution for carrying concealed weapons, a verdict, "We, the jury, find defendant guilty in the manner and form as charged in the information, and assess his punishment," etc., held sufficient in form.

3. Criminal law \S 1159(2)—Verdict of guilty supported by substantial evidence will not be disturbed.

In a prosecution for carrying concealed weapons, it was the duty of the jury to pass upon the facts under the instructions of the court, and, where there was substantial evidence to sustain a verdict of guilty, it should stand.

4. Criminal law \S 1064(1)—Assignments that verdict was against evidence, or against law declared in instructions, are too general.

Assignments in a motion for new trial that "the verdict is against the evidence" or that "the verdict is against the law as declared in the instructions given by the court" are too indefinite to require consideration, in view of Rev. St. 1909, \S 1841, requiring motions to be specific.

5. Criminal law \S 901—Demurrer to state's evidence is waived where defendant introduces evidence and rebuttal evidence follows.

Defendant in a criminal case, having put before the jury his own evidence, and rebuttal testimony having been introduced, waived his right to be heard on the overruling of his original demurrer to the evidence filed at the close of the state's evidence in chief.

6. Criminal law \S 752—Overruling of demurrer not error where verdict is supported by substantial evidence.

If defendant filed a demurrer to the evidence at the conclusion of the whole case, the court would have been justified in overruling it, since there was substantial evidence offered at the trial sustaining the verdict of guilty.

7. Weapons \S 17(5)—Intention in carrying pistol concealed held for jury.

In a prosecution for carrying a concealed weapon, it was a question for the jury as to whether defendant intentionally carried his pistol concealed.

8. Weapons \S 11(1/2)—That defendant was a postmaster and had government money and stamps did not excuse carrying concealed weapon.

In a prosecution for carrying concealed weapons, under Rev. St. 1909, \S 4496, it was not error for the court to instruct the jury that the fact that defendant was a postmaster, and had government money and stamps upon or about his person, etc., was not a defense.

9. Criminal law \S 1129(3)—General assignment as to rulings on evidence will be overruled where record shows no error.

In a criminal prosecution, where an assignment of error alleging admission of incompetent, illegal, and irrelevant testimony offered by the state over defendant's objection does not point out the specific objectionable evidence, and where the record does not show erroneous adverse rulings in such respect, the assignment will be overruled.

10. Criminal law \S 655(2)—Remark by court that accused as postmaster had no right to carry concealed weapon to protect government funds held proper.

In a prosecution for carrying concealed weapons, where defendant was asked if he was not under bond to protect government funds, which was objected to as immaterial, the court's remark that "it don't give him any authority to carry a pistol," and further that "the law says he shall not carry it concealed except on certain conditions, and the intention don't make any difference," and a further statement that the law points out the conditions under which one may carry a concealed weapon, where defendant was attempting an excuse because he was postmaster and had government funds on his person, held proper.

11. Criminal law \S 720(2)—Assertion of prosecuting attorney held supported by evidence.

In a prosecution for carrying concealed weapons, an interruption of the prosecuting attorney when he stated that the prosecuting witness said that something fell to the ground during the scuffle between himself and defendant, objecting that there was not such testimony, is without merit, where the prosecuting witness had testified as to defendant's picking up something from the ground and not knowing where defendant got the pistol.

12. Criminal law \S 720(7) — Statement of prosecuting attorney showing his conclusion from evidence held proper.

In a prosecution for carrying concealed weapons, a remark of the prosecuting attorney that defendant tore his pocket in trying to get his pistol out held proper, as counsel's opinion, where witness testified that the pocket was torn after defendant put his hand in his pocket, it being the province of the jury to determine the facts from the evidence supporting such contention.

13. Criminal law \S 728(1)—Court need not permit interruption of prosecuting attorney's argument by trivial objections.

While it is the duty of the trial court to protect a defendant charged with crime from improper remarks, calculated to prejudice the jury against him, yet, on the other hand, trivial objections interrupting the prosecuting attorney's argument, made for the purpose of breaking the force of his remarks to the jury, should not be tolerated.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Gasconade County; R. A. Breuer, Judge.

John H. Jackson was convicted of carrying concealed weapons, and, after overruling of his motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

On July 14, 1919, the prosecuting attorney of Gasconade county, Mo., filed in the circuit court of said county a verified information charging defendant with the crime of carrying a concealed weapon. The information, without caption and jurat, is as follows:

"J. W. Hensley, prosecuting attorney within and for the county of Gasconade, in the state of Missouri, informs the court upon the sworn complaint of Fred. Bodendick that on the 29th day of May, 1919, at and in the county of Gasconade, in the state of Missouri, John H. Jackson, not being then and there a legally qualified sheriff, police officer, or other person whose bona fide duty it was to execute process, civil or criminal, make arrests or aid in conserving the public peace, and, not being then and there traveling in a continuous journey peaceably through the state of Missouri, did unlawfully and feloniously carry concealed about his person a certain deadly and dangerous weapon, to wit, a revolving pistol, against the peace and dignity of the state. J. W. Hensley, Prosecuting attorney of Gasconade county, Mo."

On September 8, 1919, defendant was properly arraigned and entered his plea of not guilty.

The evidence on the part of the state tends to show that on the evening of May 29, 1919, Fred Bodendick, prosecuting witness in this case, arriving in Bland, Gasconade county, of this state, from Hermann, also in this state, went directly to the light plant and garage to see one Coonle Miller, relative to a trip back to Hermann next day. Upon arriving at the light plant and garage, he saw the defendant, John H. Jackson, in the act of filling one of the tires of his car which he had there with air. Defendant finished, put on his coat, and walked around to the back of the car, met Bodendick, who said to him, "You have been running over the family, and probably you want to run over me," whereupon he struck defendant, and defendant ran his hand in his right outside pocket. Bodendick, seeing this action, took hold of defendant, and they scuffled until, Bodendick says, defendant said he had enough. During this altercation Bodendick did not see defendant with a pistol, nor did he know that he had one, although while they were scuffling he felt something in defendant's pocket. After the scuffle they both walked back toward the car, and at this time defendant reached down and picked something from the ground. Bodendick saw that defendant had a gun or pistol, and attempted to "grab" his hand. Defendant fired, and Bodendick turned and ran. Defendant followed, discharging the pistol five times, firing each shot in Bodendick's direction. The first went through his "pants," and one of the others through his "shirt." It appears that defendant was the postmaster at Bland, and Bodendick's wife had told him that defendant had ejected his (the witness') daughter twice from the post office. One witness testified that defendant was not a sheriff, constable, police officer, or any officer authorized to execute process or make a criminal arrest, and several other witnesses who were present and saw the encounter testified that they did not at any time see a gun or pistol until after defendant had picked one up from the ground, and their testimony as to the other incidents are substantially as outlined above.

At the conclusion of respondent's evidence in chief, the defendant asked, and the court refused, the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that, under the law and the evidence in this case, you should find the defendant not guilty."

An exception was saved to this ruling.

The evidence on the part of the defendant tends to show that he was the postmaster at Bland, and on the evening of the 29th of May, 1919, he closed the post office about 7 o'clock, and, not having a safe in the office, he placed the money, stamps, and money orders in his pocket to take home for safe-keeping, as it was his custom to do. He also placed in his right-hand outside coat pocket his pistol, and, as he states, the lapel of the pocket of his coat was turned in, and the pistol not concealed. He had recently bought an automobile from Mr. Neese, the cashier of the Commercial Bank, and had made an appointment with him to test the car out, to ascertain whether or not it was in good running condition. The defendant was intending to make a trip to New Salem the next day. After the ride, and after Mr. Neese had left him, he went to the garage to fill one of the tires of the car with air, intending to leave immediately for his home. After filling the tire, he put on his coat, and noticed the butt of the pistol protruding from his pocket. After putting on his coat, and after he started to get into the car, he noticed the valve cap of the air stem on the ground and stooped to put it on. While doing this, he heard Bodendick, or some one else, say something, turned his head, and saw that it was Bodendick, who immediately kicked him while he was still in this position. He grabbed Bodendick by the leg, and was "slung" loose and kicked in the ribs twice more. Defendant again "grabbed" Bodendick's leg, and they both fell in a nearby ditch, and as they crawled out Bodendick, being somewhat ahead of defendant, started to pick up something, and, as defendant said, made some threatening remark, just what it was he did not know. At this time he saw his gun on the ground, picked it up, and, as Bodendick "grabbed" him again, fired at him and continued to do so five times. Defendant says that he does not know how the gun came to be on the ground. After the shooting defendant surrendered to a deputy sheriff and was released on bond.

The instructions and such other matters as may be deemed important will be considered in the opinion.

The case was tried on September 8, 1919, before a jury, and the latter returned into court the following verdict:

"We, the jury, find the defendant guilty in manner and form as charged in the information, and assess his punishment at a fine of $250.

"Geo. Ruediger, Foreman."

On September 10, 1919, the court pronounced judgment and sentence upon defendant in conformity with the terms of the verdict. Defendant, in due time, filed his motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and the cause appealed by him to this court.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and H. P. Ragland, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAILEY, C. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The information heretofore set out is sufficient in form and is in accordance with approved precedents. Section 4496, R. S. 1909; State v. Athanas, 150 Mo. App. 588, 131 S. W. 373; State v. Smith, 24 Mo. App. 413; Kelley's Crim. Law & Practice, § 588, p. 517; State v. Carter, 259 Mo. loc. cit. 360, 168 S. W. 679; State v. Barton, 209 S. W. 888, 889.

[2] 2. The jury found defendant guilty as charged in the information and assessed his punishment at a fine of $250. The verdict was sufficient in form. State v. Richardson, 248 Mo. loc. cit. 575, 576, 154 S. W. 735, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 307; State v. Elvins, 101 Mo. 243, 13 S. W. 937; State v. Berning, 91 Mo. 82, 85, 3 S. W. 588.

[3, 4] 3. Defendant, in his motion for a new trial, assigns the following errors:

"(1) The verdict is against the evidence.

"(2) The verdict is against the law as declared in the instructions given by the court."

There was substantial evidence offered at the trial to sustain the verdict against defendant. It was the province of the jury to pass upon the facts under the instructions of the court. Aside from the foregoing, we have uniformly held that such general assignments are too indefinite to require at our hands further consideration of same. State v. Mann, 217 S. W. loc. cit. 69; State v. Rowe & Sanders, 271 Mo. loc. cit. 94, 196 S. W. 7; State v. Selleck, 199 S. W. loc. cit. 130, 131; State v. McBrien, 265 Mo. loc. cit. 604, 605, 178 S. W. 489; State v. Sydnor et al., 253 Mo. loc. cit. 380, 161 S. W. 692; State v. Scott, 214 Mo. loc. cit. 261, 113 S. W. 1069; State v. Espenschied, 212 Mo. loc. cit. 222, 223, 110 S. W. 1072; section 1841, R. S. 1909.

[5] 4. Appellant, in his third assignment, contends that the trial court committed error in overruling his demurrer to the evidence at the conclusion of the state's evidence in chief. The defendant, having put before the jury his own evidence, and rebuttal testimony having been introduced, he waived his right to be heard on the original demurrer, as it became the duty of the jury to determine the issues under all the evidence in the cause. The ruling, in respect to above matter, has become elementary law in this state, as shown by the following authorities: State v. Mann, 217 S. W. 69; Lareau v. Lareau, 208 S. W. loc. cit. 243; State v. Selleck, 199 S. W. loc. cit. 130; Riley v. O'Kelly, 250 Mo. loc. cit. 660, 157 S. W. 566; State v. Cummings, 248 Mo. loc. cit. 518, 154 S. W. 725; State v. Gow, 235 Mo. loc. cit. 329, 138 S. W. 648; State v. Lackey, 230 Mo. loc. cit. 713, 132 S. W. 602; State v. Martin, 230 Mo. loc. cit. 700, 132 S. W. 595; Riggs v. Railroad, 216 Mo. loc. cit. 310, 115 S. W. 969; Hilz v. Ry. Co., 101 Mo. loc. cit. 42, 13 S. W. 946; McPherson v. Railway Co., 97 Mo. loc. cit. 255, 10 S. W. 846; Guenther v. Ry. Co., 95 Mo. loc. cit. 289, 8 S. W. 371; Bowen v. Railway Co., 95 Mo. loc. cit. 275, 276, 8 S. W. 230.

[6] (a) There is nothing in the record before us which indicates that defendant filed a demurrer to the evidence at the conclusion of the whole case, but, even if one had been filed, the trial court would have been justified in overruling same, as there was substantial evidence offered at the trial sustaining the verdict of the jury.

[7, 8] 5. Appellant's fourth assignment reads as follows:

"(4) Because the court erred in giving instruction No. 4, as asked by the state."

Said instruction 4 is couched in the following language:

"The court instructs the jury that the fact that the defendant was postmaster or had money or stamps upon or about his person is not of itself defense to this action, and does not authorize or excuse him from carrying the pistol concealed, if you find he did so intentionally carry it concealed."

This assignment is conclusively settled adversely to the contention of appellant in State v. Carter, 259 Mo. loc. cit. 360, 168 S. W. 681, where we said, in construing section 4496, R. S. 1909:

"III. The court did not err in refusing to allow the defendant to prove that he had been threatened with great bodily harm or had good reason to carry the weapon in the necessary defense of his person. The above were proper defenses under section 1863, Revised Statutes 1899. But that section was repealed in 1909, and a new section (section 4496, R. S. 1909) was enacted in lieu thereof. Laws 1909, p. 452.

"Those defenses are not available to the defendant charged with carrying concealed weapons under the new act."

To same effect is State v. Reagan, 217 S. W. 84, 85.

It was a question for the jury as to whether defendant intentionally carried his pistol concealed. If he did so, then the fact that he was postmaster, or had money or stamps upon or about his person, did not excuse him for violating the plain provisions of section 4496, supra. It is evident that the law-makers of this state, in the enactment of section 4496, were attempting to put a stop to the carrying of firearms, except in respect to those cases where the persons in charge thereof were authorized by said section to carry same.

The foregoing contention of appellant is accordingly overruled.

[9] 6. The fifth assignment reads as follows:

"(5) Because the court erred in admitting incompetent, illegal, and irrelevant testimony offered by the state over the objections and exception of the defendant."

No brief has been filed by appellant, and the general objection supra does not point out to us any specific objectionable evidence alleged to have been offered by the state. We have, however, read the record carefully, in passing upon the questions involved, and do not find any adverse rulings of the court, in respect to above matters, of which the defendant can have any legal grounds of complaint.

[10] 7. In his sixth assignment of error appellant asks for a reversal of the cause:

"Because the court erred in making the following prejudicial statement in the presence and hearing of the jury."

The matters complained of under this caption occurred as follows:

"Q. By Mr. Baxter to defendant: I will ask you if you are under bond to protect the funds of the United States government in the post office?

"Mr. Hensley: I object to that; that is not material.

"The Court: It don't give him authority to carry a pistol.

"Mr. Baxter: We are offering the evidence to show the intention of the defendant as to whether or not he intended to carry this pistol concealed.

"The Court: The law says he shall not carry it concealed except on certain conditions and the intention don't make any difference.

"Mr. Baxter: If the court please, the intention is the primary feature in this case, as to whether or not this defendant intended to carry this pistol concealed.

"The Court: The law says under what conditions a man may carry a pistol concealed, and when he carried it under any other conditions concealed, the intention don't cut any figure. (To which ruling of the court the defendant by his counsel then and there duly excepted and still excepts.)

"Which said error was not cured by the court later giving instruction No. D offered by defendant."

The court was clearly within the law in making the above statements. State v. Carter, 259 Mo. loc. cit. 360, 168 S. W. 679. The first question above quoted clearly indicated that defendant's counsel was attempting to show that his client ought to be excused for carrying a concealed weapon if he was under bond to protect the funds of the United States government. The court not only ruled correctly in respect to above matter, but at the instance of defendant gave the jury instruction D, which reads as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that to conceal a weapon means something more than carrying it or the mere fact of having it where it may not be seen. It implies an assent of the mind and a purpose to carry it so that it may not be seen; and the court instructs you that, if you find and believe from the evidence that the defendant John Jackson did not intend to carry the pistol mentioned and described in the information herein concealed, then you should find the defendant not guilty."

This assignment is without merit and is overruled.

[11] 8. In appellant's seventh assignment of error, it is claimed that counsel for the state was permitted to indulge in improper statements in his argument to the jury. The following occurred:

"Mr. Monroe (attorney for state): The prosecuting witness says that during the scuffle something fell on the ground—

"Mr. Baxter (interrupting): There is no evidence on the part of the prosecuting witness, and he did not testify, that anything fell on the ground.

"The Court: That is a mere matter of argument; go ahead."

Turning to the transcript of the evidence (pages 6 and 7), we find that defendant's counsel had the prosecuting witness testify as follows:

"Q. Now, you say the first time you saw this pistol was when Mr. Jackson had stooped and picked it up off of the ground? A. He picked something off of the ground, and the first I seen it was in his hand. * * *

"Q. You don't know where that pistol came from that Mr. Jackson picked off of the ground? A. No, sir."

In view of the foregoing, we are of the opinion that the interruption of respondent's counsel was without merit, and properly overruled.

[12] Complaint is also made as to the remark of respondent's counsel to the effect that, when Jackson tried to get that pistol out, he tore his pocket. The prosecuting witness said defendant ran his hand in the pocket of his coat. He further testified:

"Q. Well, what was the condition of the pocket after he done this? A. The lining was torn wrong side out, it looked like about half-way, and his coat was tore down the side a little ways."

In view of the foregoing, counsel for respondent was simply giving it as his opinion that Jackson tore the pocket out in getting the pistol. It was the province of the jury to determine the facts, and no harm was done in overruling the above objection.

[13] Other remarks of the state's counsel were objected to, but we find there was no merit in the objections thus made. While it is the duty of the trial court to protect a defendant charged with crime from improper remarks calculated to prejudice the jury against him, yet, on the other hand, trivial interruptions of the prosecuting attorney, made for the purpose of breaking the force of his remarks to the jury, should not be tolerated.

The issue in this case was whether the defendant was carrying a concealed weapon in violation of law. The facts were put before the jury without prejudice, and there is no merit in any of the objections above referred to in the motion for a new trial.

9. The defendant had a fair and impartial trial upon proper instructions given by the court. He was convicted upon substantial evidence, and we find no grounds for disturbing the verdict of the jury.

The judgment below is accordingly affirmed.

WHITE and MOZLEY, CC., concur.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of RAILEY, C., is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court.

STATE v. HOSTETTER. (No. 21920.)
(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Homicide \S 218—Evidence as to admissibility of dying declaration properly heard out of presence of jury.

In determining the admissibility of a claimed dying declaration, the trial court acts properly in hearing evidence in regard to the same out of presence and hearing of jury.

2. Homicide \S 203(1), 214(1) — Res gestae declarations under sense of impending death admissible; "dying declarations."

Declarations by deceased, admissible as his dying declarations, must be a part of the res gestae, and voluntarily made under the realization of impending death.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Dying Declarations.]

3. Homicide \S 207—Form of dying declarations immaterial.

It is immaterial in what form claimed dying declarations were made, or who prepared them, or when, if, when they were read over to declarant, he understood and assented to them.

4. Homicide \S 208—Dying declarations admissible, though not written down in exact language.

The admissibility of dying declarations is not affected because when written down they were not in the exact language of declarant if, when read over to him, he approved them.

5. Criminal law \S 778(2) — Instruction not erroneous as imposing excess burden on defendant.

In prosecution for murder, instruction that jury, after ascertaining true facts, should apply them to the law contained in the instructions, etc., held not erroneous through its use of the word "true," as imposing an excess burden on defendant.

6. Criminal law \S 822(1)—Instructions to be construed together or as a whole.

Instructions are to be construed as a series or as a whole, except under certain limitations.

7. Homicide \S 300(5) — Instruction defining jury's province not in conflict with one on self-defense.

In prosecution for murder, instruction defining generally the jury's province, in particular stating that it was their duty to receive the instructions as the law, and, after ascertaining the true facts from the evidence, to apply them to the law contained in the instructions, held not in conflict with instruction defining doctrine of self-defense as applicable under facts in evidence.

8. Homicide \S 300(2)—Charge defendant "alleges" he killed in self-defense not improper; "affirms;" "asserts;" "declares."

In prosecution for homicide, the use of the word "alleges," synonymous with "affirms," "asserts," or "declares," in an instruction on self-defense, using the expression that defendant alleged that the act with which he was charged was done in self-defense, held not improper as belittling the defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Affirm; Allege; First Series, Declare.]

9. Criminal law \S 829(5)—Refusal of requested instruction on self-defense held not error, in view of instruction given.

In prosecution for murder, in view of instruction given at instance of state, refusal of defendant's requested instruction on self-defense in regard to the other phases of the case held not error.

10. Homicide \S 300(2)—Use of "good cause" in defining self-defense not error.

In prosecution for murder, use of phrase "good cause," instead of "reasonable cause," in defining self-defense in the instructions was not error.

11. Homicide \S 309(3)—Evidence of intentional killing held not to warrant instruction on manslaughter.

In prosecution for murder, evidence held not to warrant instruction on manslaughter in fourth degree under either Rev. St. 1909, \S 4467, or section 4468; the killing having been intentional beyond controversy.

12. Homicide \S 79—In absence of sudden passion, offense not reduced to manslaughter in fourth degree.

In absence of evidence that defendant acted on sudden passion engendered by reasonable provocation, the existence of malice, a vitally constituent element of murder, is not negatived, and the offense is not reduced to manslaughter in fourth degree.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Carroll County; F. P. Divilbiss, Judge.

Enos Hostetter was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

James A. Shannon, of Kansas City, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and Henry B. Hunt, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. Appellant was charged by information in the circuit court of Carroll county with murder in the first degree in having in that county, on the 31st day of August, 1918, stabbed with a knife and killed one Powhattan B. Darr. Upon a trial in January, 1920, appellant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and his punishment assessed at 10 years' imprisonment in the penitentiary. From this judgment he appeals.

Darr, the deceased, was a bachelor, living on a farm in Carroll county, which for twelve or more years prior to the difficulty resulting in his death he had managed for his sister, a Mrs. McKinney. Mrs. McKinney had died in the January preceding. During her last illness the appellant and his wife—the latter being a sister of Mrs. McKinney and of Darr—had come to the McKinney home and had remained there until Darr's death, which occurred the second day after he was stabbed by the appellant.

The morning of the difficulty Darr, who had been out attending to such chores as are necessary on a farm, came into the kitchen where Mrs. Hostetter was preparing her own and her husband's, the appellant's, breakfast. When Darr entered the room he ordered the appellant, who was sitting before the cook stove, to get out of his way, and began to prepare his own breakfast. Appellant became angry, and started to rise, when his wife stepped between him and Darr and told appellant to go out and feed the chickens. He went, and Darr proceeded to prepare his breakfast. Mrs. Hostetter stepped into the adjacent dining room for a moment, and in the language of Darr, to whose testimony the jury gave credence, while he was leaning over the stove and breaking an egg into a skillet, appellant rushed upon him and began to stab him. He turned and attempted with his bare hands and arms to ward off the knife thrusts being inflicted by appellant. The noise occasioned by appellant's onslaught brought Mrs. Hostetter back into the room. She found Darr backed up against a window by the appellant and so hard-pressed that the window was broken out. She attempted to pull appellant away from Darr, but was unable to do so until assisted by her grown son, who came hurriedly upon the scene from a bedroom on the second floor in response to his mother's appeal. Aside from appellant's statement, there is no pretense, except such as is afforded by proof that a butcher knife was found lying on the kitchen floor, that Darr had attempted with a weapon to assault the appellant. This knife it was shown was one used in the kitchen for cutting meat when a meal was being prepared, and the reasonable conclusion is that if it was in Darr's possession when he was attacked it was for the usual purpose for which it had been employed. The jury so concluded, as evidenced by their ignoring appellant's testimony in this regard. When the appellant was pulled away from Darr, the latter was found to have received a number of knife wounds. One of these was a little to the right of the center of the chest, an inch or two above the right nipple, and penetrated the lobe of the lung. Another knife wound penetrated the liver. Other wounds were on one arm, a cut on the forehead where the knife had struck the bone and glanced, and a slashing cut penetrating one of the cheeks. When appellant's wife and son pulled him away from Darr the latter was bleeding profusely. Neighbors who had been summoned found upon their arrival Darr sitting in a chair in the kitchen. His shirt had been removed, and bandages, made from a bed sheet, had been wrapped about his body to stop the flow of blood from his wounds, which covered the kitchen floor where the difficulty had occurred. Some of the neighbors helped him to a bed, where he languished from Saturday, the day of the onslaught, until the succeeding Monday, when he died from the effect of his wounds.

Darr made dying declarations, the material facts of which are embodied in the foregoing statement, but which are also set forth in detail hereafter.

The signed statements of the wife and grown son of the appellant, made on the day of the difficulty and their testimony at the trial, do not in their pertinent portions differ sufficiently from the facts as above set forth to require them to be more particularly stated. There was testimony on the part of the state of threats having been made a few days before the difficulty to two different persons by the appellant against Darr. To one of these, a woman, appellant said that—

"Darr had been mean from childhood, and that he would kill him if it grieved Mammy (his wife, Darr's sister) the rest of her days."

Appellant denied having made these threats. A witness for the defense testified that Darr had several months prior to the difficulty tried to hire him to kill appellant. Appellant testified that he was sitting at the corner of the kitchen range on the morning of the difficulty when Darr came in, jerked his chair, and said: "You get up and get out of here." His wife went to Darr and said: "My God, Bud, what does make you do this way?" She then asked appellant to go and feed the chickens, and he went. When he came back and was going to get the washbasin Darr struck him a terrible blow across the nose with his hand. Appellant turned, and saw Darr with a butcher knife raised as if to cut him. He warded off the blow and struck Darr; that his whole thought was to save his life; that Darr's eyes looked like those of a maniac. Appellant remembered cutting Darr at one time with all of his power; that it was the only thing that saved his life; that his wife ran in and grabbed his wrist, and when she saw the knife in his own hand it took all the life out of him, and he dropped the knife; that his wife got between him and Darr; and she and his son separated them; that at the time appellant was bleeding from the nose; that his granddaughter then said, "Daddy, come with me," and at his wife's request he left and went to a neighbor's. On the way he washed off the blood in a branch, and then found the cut on his face. On cross-examination appellant said that his nose, as a result of the blow given him by Darr, was badly swollen for a week; that when Darr struck him he was standing in a small space between the stove and cabinet; that while so situated he struck at appellant with a big old knife; that not a word was spoken, and they just went at it; that appellant cut Darr as quick as he could get out his knife; that he warded the latter's blows off with his left hand and cut him with his right. He did not know at what stage of the affray Darr's knife fell from his hand; he did not see it fall; he heard something fall. He does not say whether this was before or after he struck Darr, nor that it was the knife he heard fall. There were some eggs in a skillet and some knives and spoons on the floor after the scuffle.

Several witnesses testified that they saw appellant soon after the difficulty and for a day or two thereafter; that he had no cut on his face, and his nose was not swollen. Enough of the relevant facts have been stated to enable an intelligent disposition to be made of the errors assigned.

[1] I. The admission in evidence of the dying declarations of Darr is assigned as error. The reasons urged are that they were not voluntary statements, but were suggested by the prosecuting attorney, and that they were not in the language of the deceased, were not written by him, and are simply conclusions of the prosecuting attorney from what Darr said to him. The trial court in determining the admissibility in evidence of the declarations pursued the course we have frequently approved of hearing evidence in regard to same out of the presence and hearing of the jury. State v. Finley, 245 Mo. 465, 150 S. W. 1051; State v. Colvin, 226 Mo. loc. cit. 483, 126 S. W. 448; State v. Crone, 209 Mo. 316, 108 S. W. 555; State v. Johnson, 118 Mo. 491, 24 S. W. 229, 40 Am. St. Rep. 405. S. J. Jones, testifying at that hearing, said:

"I saw Darr the day after he was stabbed. He was lying on the bed, appeared to be suffering; his breathing was short. As I came in to the room he said: 'Jack, they've got me;' or 'He's got me; this wound here in my breast is going to kill me.'"

Jones said, "Maybe it's not so bad as that; not so bad as you think," to which Darr replied, "Yes; I am not going to get well; I am going to die." Jones then said:

"If he actually believed he was going to die, that the prosecuting attorney was there, and he had better call him in and he (Darr) make a statement." "However," continues Jones, "before that he told me how it occurred. He said he had made a statement to the prosecuting attorney the day before. To which I replied, 'Yes; but probably you didn't make that in view of impending death or a belief that you were going to die,' and I should call him in and repeat what he had to say about it. The prosecuting attorney came in, and I stated to him the purpose in calling him. He sat down at a table close by the bed and asked Mr. Darr questions, and he answered them, and the prosecuting attorney wrote them out. After it was completed the prosecuting attorney handed it to me, and we called in Mr. Calvert, and I sat down at the head of the bed, close by Mr. Darr, and read it over to him, that paper there, and his reply was, 'That was the way it occurred; that was the facts.' I read it over in his hearing. He appeared to hear and comprehend it, but he was so weak he couldn't sign it, couldn't sit up, and my recollection is the prosecuting attorney signed his name there, and we witnessed it."

Two dying declarations of Darr were read in evidence. The first was introduced by the prosecution in support of the charge in the information; and the second was introduced, also by the prosecution, upon the demand of counsel for the defense, on the ground that it was being withheld and its contents concealed from the appellant. The admission in evidence of this last declaration, not only with the approval but upon the demand of appellant, will technically suffice to dispose of this ground of error adverse to appellant's contention, as both declarations are in all of their substantial facts identical. The first introduced is as follows:

"I, Powhattan B. Darr, a resident of Carroll county, Missouri, in view of impending death from certain knife wounds inflicted upon me by Enos Hostetter, do make the following statement:

"About 7 o'clock Saturday morning, August 31, 1918, I came into my kitchen from attending to my chores to get breakfast. My sister Nannie Hostetter and her husband Enos Hostetter were in the kitchen when I came in. Enos Hostetter was in my way and I asked him to get out of my way. He seemed to resent my request and started to get out of his chair, when his wife stepped in between and told him to go out and feed the chickens. Both Enos Hostetter and his wife Nannie Hostetter then left the kitchen and I went on about the preparation of my breakfast, without paying any further attention to either of them. The next I knew of Enos Hostetter again being near me was while I was standing by the cookstove leaning over breaking an egg for my breakfast. At that time while I was in that position he came up from behind and began striking and cutting me with a knife. I didn't know he was near until he struck me from behind. His first blow with the knife caused the deep cut in my right chest. The second cut was farther down on the same side, and after I turned around and began warding off his blows he cut me again in the forehead, on my left cheek and on my left arm. All of these cuts were made by Enos Hostetter with a knife in his hands. I never had a knife or any other kind of a weapon in my hands or about me at any time and I never struck him that morning either before or after he cut me except in warding off his blows with the knife. Nannie Hostetter and her son Robert came into the kitchen and separated us after Enos had cut me, but they were not in the room at the time of the cutting."

To this is appended the mark of Darr, attested by two witnesses.

[2, 3] Ignoring appellant's waiver to the admission of these declarations, we address ourselves to his concrete objections thereto. The declarations were a part of the res gestæ; they were voluntarily made by the declarant under the realization of impending death. These are the two prime requisites for their admission in evidence. No question is raised as to the verity of the declarations as embodied in the statement prepared for and signed by the declarant. The objections are more superficial; they go to the manner in which the declarations were prepared, their phraseology, and that they were conclusions rather than statements of facts. Absent any intimation, much less evidence, that the declarations did not accurately express what was said by the declarant, coupled with the fact, affirmatively shown, that he understood the meaning of the words employed and adopted them, the objections must go for naught. Reason and precedent support the conclusion that it is immaterial in what form the declarations were made. State v. Livingston, 204 S. W. 262; State v. Colvin, 226 Mo. 446, 126 S. W. 448; State v. Kelleher, 201 Mo. 614, 100 S. W. 470; State v. Nocton, 121 Mo. loc. cit. 537, 550, 26 S. W. 551. In the latter case we said, in effect, that it was enough if it satisfactorily appeared in any mode that the declarations were voluntarily made under a sense of impending dissolution. This ruling has in like terms received the approval of this court in State v. Brown, 188 Mo. loc. cit. 460, 87 S. W. 519. Since the law looks to substance rather than form, the manner in which the declarations are made is of minor importance. It is immaterial who prepared them or when they were prepared, if they were read over to the declarant and he understood and assented to them. Perry v. State, 102 Ga. 365, 30 S. E. 903; People v. Callaghan, 4 Utah, 49, 6 Pac. 49; People v. Brady, 72 Cal. 490, 14 Pac. 202; Scales v. State, 96 Ala. 69, 11 South. 121; State v. Kindle, 47 Ohio St. 358, 24 N. E. 485; State v. Cantieny, 34 Minn. 1, 24 N. W. 458.

[4] Nor is the admissibility of the declarations affected because when committed to writing they were not in the exact language of the declarant, if when read over to him he approved them. State v. Baldwin, 15 Wash. 15, 45 Pac. 650; Com. v. Haney, 127 Mass. 455; State v. Parham, 48 La. Ann. 1309, 20 South. 727; 1 R. C. L. § 86, p. 542. Thus run the rulings elsewhere, and they but serve to affirm under different states of fact what we have said on the subject. In view of all of which appellant's contention is, in this regard, overruled.

II. The giving of instruction numbered 1 is assigned as error. It is as follows:

"The instructions read to you by the court constitute the law of this case, and it is your duty to receive such instructions as the law, and, after ascertaining from the evidence what are the true facts herein, you should apply them to the law contained in said instructions, and find your verdict accordingly and not otherwise. You must not consider any of the instructions as an expression or intimation of what the court thinks of the evidence, because you are the sole judges of the facts herein, and you must ascertain them yourselves from the evidence before you, under your oaths as jurors. In a criminal prosecution such as this, before a verdict, either of conviction or acquittal can be returned, all the jurors must agree to it. When it has been agreed to, however, only the foreman should sign it."

The objection urged to this instruction is the employment of the word true which we have italicized. The reason assigned therefor is that—

"The use of the word has the effect to deprive the appellant of the benefit of all evidence except such as may be determined by the jury to be the true facts in the case, thereby placing upon the appellant the great burden of establishing his defense by true facts, whereas the law only requires that he have reasonable cause to believe, and did believe, that the deceased intended to take his life or inflict upon him some great personal injury. That this imposed upon him a greater burden than rested upon the state."

[5] It will be noted from the language employed in the instruction that the jury is required "to ascertain from the evidence what the true facts are, and apply them to the law as contained in the instructions." If this were not enough to clearly define the province of the jury, they are further instructed that they "are the sole judges of the facts, which they must ascertain for themselves from the evidence before them." Thus nothing is left unsaid necessary to enable them to intelligently perform their duty; nor is any additional burden thereby laid upon the appellant. The instruction as framed expresses nothing more than is embodied in the often employed and frequently approved phrase that the jury are the exclusive judges of the facts proved, of the credibility of the witnesses, and the weight to be given to their testimony. State v. Maupin, 196 Mo. 164, 93 S. W. 379; State v. Sharpless, 212 Mo. 176, 111 S. W. 69; State v. Mittner, 247 Mo. 577, 153 S. W. 1020; State v. Jackson, 186 S. W. 990.

Nor was this all. The court, having thus defined the general duty of the jury in their consideration of the evidence, gave, as authorized by appellant's testimony, the following instruction on self-defense:

"As a defense to this prosecution the defendant alleges that the act, with which he is charged, was done in self-defense. Upon this feature of the case you are instructed that if at the time defendant stabbed the deceased he [the defendant] had reasonable cause to apprehend a design on the part of the deceased to take his life or do him some great personal injury, and that there was reasonable cause for him to apprehend immediate danger of such design being accomplished, and that to avert such apprehended danger the defendant stabbed the deceased, and that at the time he did so he had reasonable cause to believe, and did believe, that it was necessary for him to do so in order to protect himself from such apprehended danger, then such stabbing was justifiable; and, if such are the facts in this case, you should acquit on the ground of self-defense.

"In passing upon the question whether or not the defendant had reasonable grounds for believing there was imminent danger that the deceased was about to kill him or do him some great bodily harm, the jury should look at the transaction from the standpoint of the defendant, and under his surroundings at the time he acted. And if you believe from the evidence that the defendant had good cause to believe, and did believe, that the deceased was about to take his life or do him some great bodily harm, and that the defendant, so believing, acted in a moment of apparently impending danger, then it was not required of him to nicely gauge or measure the proper quantity of force necessary to repel the assault. The question to be determined by the jury from the evidence is, not whether some other or lesser force might not have been adequate to protect defendant from great bodily harm or death, but whether when the defendant acted he had reasonable cause to believe that such act was necessary to protect himself from immediate danger of great bodily harm or death.

"It is not necessary, in order to acquit on the ground of self-defense, that the danger should have been actual or real, or that the danger should have been impending and about to fall. All that is necessary is that defendant had cause to believe, and did believe, those facts. On the other hand, it is not enough that defendant should have so believed. He must have had reasonable cause to so believe. Whether or not he had reasonable cause is for you to determine under all the facts and circumstances given in evidence. If you believe from the evidence that defendant did not have reasonable cause for such belief, you cannot acquit him on the ground of self-defense, although you may believe that the defendant really thought that he was in danger. If upon a consideration of all the evidence in the case, including that upon the question of self-defense, you have a reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt, you should acquit him."

[8-8] Keeping in view the rule that the instructions are to be considered as a series or construed as a whole, except under limitations which do not arise in this case, there is no conflict between instruction numbered 1, defining generally the province of the jury, and instruction numbered 9, defining the doctrine of self-defense, as applicable under the facts in evidence. The latter instruction has, in the various phases it presents, been repeatedly approved by this court. The language employed in the introductory sentence of this instruction is objected to, the burden of same being that "the defendant alleges that the act with which he is charged was done in self-defense." And this was his attitude, and hence the propriety of the instruction. The use of the word "alleges," which is but synonymous with "affirms," "asserts," or "declares," or that of the more archaic "allegiare," which simply means "to define or justify by due course of law" (Jac. L. Dict.), was not improper, and in no sense belittled the appellant's defense of self-defense, upon which the jury was, as stated, correctly instructed. Other objections to the phraseology of this instruction are made, possibly unintentionally, in disregard or in contradiction of its express terms. We regard them as trivial.

Other instructions were given at the request of the state defining the presumption of innocence, a reasonable doubt, the manner in which threats made by either the appellant or the deceased were to be considered, as to what would authorize a verdict for murder in the first or in the second degrees, explaining the doctrine of self-defense, and the meaning of the technical words necessary to be used in charging murder in the first degree. A careful review of these instructions in the light of the evidence does not disclose an error therein of such prejudicial effect to the appellant as to authorize a reversal.

At appellant's request the formal nature of the charge was defined as constituting no evidence of guilt; and the right of the appellant to be on the premises at the time when the crime was committed was declared.

[9] The refusal of appellant's instruction on self-defense and in regard to other phases of the case was not error, in view of the instructions given at the instance of the state.

[10] We have not failed to consider what may be termed appellant's minor contentions in regard to the law as declared by the court. The use of the phrase "good cause," instead of "reasonable cause," in defining self-defense is urged as error. In State v. Parmenter, 213 S. W. 439, we discussed at some length an attempted distinction there made by an appellant between the use of these words, and held it to be without merit. We find nothing in the instant case to justify a change in the conclusion there reached.

[11, 12] The evidence did not warrant an instruction for manslaughter in the fourth degree under either section 4467 or section 4468, R. S. 1909. That the killing was intentional there is no ground for controversy. In the absence of evidence that the appellant acted upon a sudden passion engendered by reasonable provocation, the existence of malice, a vitally constituent element of murder, is not negatived, and the offense is not reduced to manslaughter in the fourth degree. Hence the refusal of the court to so instruct was not error. State v. Goldsby, 215 Mo. loc. cit. 53, 114 S. W. 500; State v. Sebastian, 215 Mo. loc. cit. 80, 114 S. W. 522, and cases; State v. Stewart, 212 S. W. 853.

Fifty or more pages of this transcript are employed in a detailed account of the examination of the array of jurors and the opening statement of the prosecuting attorney. No question having been raised in regard to either, they serve no other purpose than to swell the volume of the record and unnecessarily add to the costs of transcription.

Finding no prejudicial error, the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

All concur.

Acts 1915, p. 324, relative to justices of the peace in townships containing 75,000 and not over 150,000 inhabitants, held intended to govern all justices of the peace, those in office as well as those subsequently elected or appointed, despite section 2, providing every justice before entering on his duties shall give bond.

8. Justices of the peace §—15—Justice held not entitled to clerk hire.

Justice of the peace of Washington township, Buchanan county, held not entitled, under Sess. Acts 1915, p. 324, to clerk hire of $75 a month sued for in addition to his salary.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Buchanan County; L. A. Vories, Judge.

Suit by Lyman W. Forgrave against Buchanan County. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and cause remanded for new trial in accordance with the opinion.

Graham & Silverman and Strop & Mayer, all of St. Joseph, for appellant.

Randolph & Randolph, of St. Joseph, for respondent.

SMALL, C. I. This is a suit by appellant, a justice of the peace of Washington township, Buchanan county, to recover his salary at the rate of $2,000 per annum from respondent, under the act of the Legislature of 1915 (Session Acts 1915, p. 324), and also to recover clerk hire at the rate of $75 per month under said act.

Prior to the institution of this suit appellant had brought a suit in mandamus to compel the judges of the county court of said county to order a warrant issued for the services now sued for. This court held mandamus would not lie, and plaintiff's remedy, if any, was by suit against the county. State ex rel. v. Hill et al., 272 Mo. 206, 198 S. W. 844. Subsequently this suit was brought.

The defense set up in the answer, besides a general denial, was that the act is unconstitutional in that it violated the Constitution of the state in the particulars to be noticed in this opinion. The lower court held with the defendant, and plaintiff appealed to this court.

The act in question, including the caption and title, is as follows:

"(H. B. 106.)

"Justices' Courts—Organization and Procedure; Justices in Townships Containing Seventy-Five Thousand and Not Over One Hundred and Fifty Thousand Inhabitants.

"An act entitled justice of the peace in townships containing seventy-five thousand inhabitants and not over one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants.

Section

1. Salary and number of justices of the peace.
2. Justice of the peace to give bond.
3. County court may require new bond.
4. Fees to be paid into the county treasury.

Section

5. Penalty for noncompliance with provisions of this article.
6. County may sue on bond of justice of peace.
7. County to provide office—appointment of clerk and payment of salary.

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of Missouri, as follows:

"Section 1. Salary and Number of Justices of the Peace.—In all townships which now contain or may hereafter contain seventy-five thousand inhabitants and not over one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants according to the last decennial census there shall be four justices of the peace and each shall receive a salary of two thousand dollars per annum, payable monthly out of the treasury of the county in which he is elected.

"Sec. 2. Justice of the Peace to Give Bond.—Each justice of the peace shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, give bond to the state of Missouri, with two good and sufficient sureties, residents of the county, in the penal sum of two thousand dollars, conditional that he will account for and pay to the proper officer all the money received by him by virtue of his office; said bond to be approved by the county court, or the clerk in vacation, and if taken by the clerk in vacation it shall be approved or rejected by the court at the next term.

"Sec. 3. County Court may Require New Bond.—Whenever any surety shall die, remove from the county or become insolvent, or when from any other cause the county court shall have reason to believe that the sureties to a justice's bond are likely to become or have become insufficient, the court shall require the justice, at a time to be fixed, to show why a new bond shall not be required and unless cause to the contrary be shown, the justice of the peace shall be required within a given time to give a new bond; and in default thereof the office shall be vacant, which shall be filled as now provided by law for filling vacancies in office of the justice of the peace.

"Sec. 4. Fees to be Paid Into the County Treasury.—Each justice of the peace shall pay over all fees collected for his services to the treasurer of the county in which he is elected every thirty days, accompanied by a statement thereof sworn to by him, and all other costs collected by said justice of the peace shall be paid by him every thirty days, accompanied by like sworn statement, to the constable of his district, who shall be responsible for the same and pay over the same to the parties entitled thereto, as is now required by law in cases of costs collected by or paid to said constable.

"Sec. 5. Penalty for Noncompliance with Provisions of This Article.—Upon failure or neglect of any justice of the peace to comply with the provisions of this article, within five days from the time provided for paying over said costs and filing said statement, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall forfeit his salary for and during such time that he fails to make such statement, as provided in section four of this article; and should he further fail and neglect to pay over said costs and file said statement for a period of thirty days from the time required for filing the same, he shall forfeit all his right and claim to said office of justice of the peace, and the same shall be filled as now provided by law for filling vacancies in the office of justice of the peace.

"Sec. 6. County may Sue on Bond of Justice of Peace.—Any such county shall sue for and recover all sums of money payable into the treasury thereof by any justice of the peace, and the sureties on his official bond shall be liable therefor.

"Sec. 7. County to Provide Office—Appointment of Clerk and Payment of Salary.—Said county shall provide proper offices for said justice courts and for the proper care of the same, and shall provide light, heat, proper books of accounts, dockets, and printed forms of writs, and stationery, and whatever else may be deemed necessary by the county court of said county, for the proper conduct and the business of such court, including a clerk thereof, to be designated by the justice, at a salary of seventy-five dollars per month, payable at the end of each month out of the treasury of such county. Approved March 23, 1915."

[1,2] II. It is true the power to declare an act of the Legislature null and void because it infringes upon provisions of the Constitution of the state or of the United States is, by reason of our system of government, vested in the courts. But great care and caution has always been used in the exercise of this high prerogative. We have accordingly laid it down, as a rule, that unless the conflict with the Constitution is so plain that it is beyond reasonable doubt, the act would be held constitutional and valid. Greene County v. Lydy, 263 Mo. loc. cit. 87, 172 S. W. 376, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 274, and cases cited. With this rule in mind, therefore, let us compare the provisions of the Constitution with the provisions of the law in question, and see whether they conflict with each other beyond such reasonable doubt.

III. First, as to the title to the act: An examination of the original bill, as it was passed by the Legislature and approved by the Governor, shows that the headnotes and index to the sections, above copied, were not part of the bill, but were placed there afterwards when the bill was printed in the session acts. Therefore we can only consider the title proper, which is as follows:

"An act entitled justice of the peace in townships containing seventy-five thousand inhabitants and not over one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants."

The constitutional provision as to the title and subject-matter of legislative acts is as follows:

Section 28 of article 4:

"No bill * * * shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title."

The objection that acts of the Legislature conflict with this constitutional provision has frequently been passed upon by this court, but the titles and acts involved are so variant that little aid can be had by referring to the adjudicated cases. But the guiding principle has been firmly established. As to singleness of the subject, the rule has been stated as follows:

"The test is that, when all the provisions of the statute fairly relate to the same subject, have a natural connection with it, * * * are the means of accomplishing it, then the subject is single." Elting v. Hickman, 172 Mo. 252, 72 S. W. 704.

As to the expression of the subject-matter in the title, the rule has been stated as follows:

"The constitutional mandate in regard to the title of a statute does not require a table of contents as a caption to a law. It is sufficient if the title does not mislead as to the chief topic of the act, and that the minor features of it have a reasonable and natural connection with the subject named in the title. [Citing authorities.] Mere generality in the title will not vitiate an act of the General Assembly, unless the title is of such a nature as to compel the conviction that it was designed to mislead as to the subject dealt with." State ex rel. v. County Court, 128 Mo. loc. cit. 441, 30 S. W. 105.

[3] Under the liberal rules thus announced, we think the title to the act before us sufficiently shows that the act will provide generally for justices of the peace, which would include provisions generally for justice courts, their organization and procedure in townships containing 75,000 and not over 150,000 inhabitants, and that all the provisions in the act relate to that one subject. The provisions for four justices of the peace in such townships, that they should have a salary, that it should be paid by the county, that their fees should be turned over to the county, that they should give bond for so doing, that there should be a clerk of the justice's court, to be approved by the justice and paid by the county, etc., are all matters relating to justices of the peace and incident to the maintenance and operation of their courts. So with the furnishing the justice with an office and supplies. In State ex rel. v. Williams, 232 Mo. loc. cit. 75, 133 S. W. 8, this court said:

"The act in question not only amends the statute which prescribes what fees should be paid to the various prosecuting attorneys throughout the state, and fixes fees of those in the counties to which the act applies, but also creates the office of assistant prosecuting attorney in those same counties, provides for the manner of their appointment and fixes the amount of their salaries. While the question of creating an office and prescribing the manner of appointing the officer thereto is different from the question of prescribing the fees to be paid such officer; however, the one is germane to the other and so closely connected therewith that we are unable to say they constitute two separate and distinct subjects within the meaning of said constitutional provision"—citing many cases.

We not only think the act before us contains but one subject, but that there are no provisions in it not germane and naturally connected with that subject, as expressed in the title, and that therefore the subject is clearly expressed in the title, within the meaning of the Constitution in that regard.

IV. It is contended that the act is contrary to section 53, art. 4, of the Constitution, prohibiting the passage of a local or special law for any of the following purposes: Clause 18:

"Regulating the fees or extending the powers and duties of aldermen, justices of the peace, magistrates or constables."

And clause 32:

"Legalizing the unauthorized or invalid acts of any officer or agent of the state, or of any county or municipality thereof. In all other cases where a general law can be made applicable, no local or special law shall be enacted; and whether a general law could have been made applicable in any case is hereby declared a judicial question, and as such shall be judicially determined, without regard to any legislative assertion on that subject."

[4] The contention of learned counsel is that the act only applies to one township in the state, to wit, Washington township, Buchanan county, because that was the only township in the state which had 75,000 or less than 150,000 inhabitants when the act was passed and took effect. But the language of the act does not limit its operation to townships that have that population at the time of its passage, but includes all townships "which now contain or may hereafter contain seventy-five thousand and not over one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants." It is well settled that this language takes the law out of the category of a special or local law and makes it a general law, so as not to conflict with the constitutional provisions against special and local laws pointed out by the respondent.

In State ex inf. v. Aetna Ins. Co., 150 Mo. loc. cit. 135, 136, 51 S. W. 420, the court says:

"The proviso relates to fire insurance in cities of a class, that is, cities in this state which now have or which may hereafter acquire a population of 100,000 inhabitants or more, and while there are but two of such cities in this state at this time, St. Louis and Kansas City, it has been repeatedly held by this court that such a law is general, and not special. Ewing v. Hoblitzelle, 85 Mo. 64; Rutherford v. Heddens, 82 Mo. 388; State ex rel. v. Herrman, 75 Mo. 340; Kelly v. Meeks, 87 Mo. 396; Rutherford v. Hamilton, 97 Mo. 543; Lynch v. Murphy, 119 Mo. 163."

Same ruling in the recent case of State ex inf. v. Southern, 265 Mo. loc. cit. 286, 287, 177 S. W. 640.

But learned counsel say that the real intent of the Legislature was to limit the act to the one township in Buchanan county, and cite especially Henderson v. Koenig, 168 Mo. 356, 68 S. W. 72, 57 L. R. A. 659, and State v. Messerly, 198 Mo. 351, 95 S. W. 913, as so holding. An examination of those cases will show that the language in the act before us, "or hereafter having 75,000 inhabitants and less than 150,000 inhabitants," or equivalent language, making the law general in its application, was absent from the acts construed in those cases. Indeed, in those cases there were special features and provisions in the act itself which showed clearly an affirmative intent to limit the operation of the law to a certain territory, which is not the case here. We must rule this point, too, against respondent.

[5] V. Nor does the act violate clause 33, art. 4, of section 53 of the Constitution, which provides:

"Nor shall the General Assembly indirectly enact such special or local law by the partial repeal of a general law."

Here there is no partial repeal of a general law so as to create a special law. It is true the old general law relating to justices of the peace no longer governs in townships now or hereafter having the specified population, but the act in question leaves the old general law in force in all other townships in the state, except in the townships provided for by this act, which, we hold, is a general law governing such townships.

[6] VI. It is also contended that the act violates section 8 of article 14 of the Constitution, which provides:

"The compensation or fees of no state, county or municipal officer shall be increased during his term of office."

The change of an officer's compensation during his term of office from a fee basis to a salary is not necessarily an increase of his compensation. It may be a decrease, and frequently is.

The evidence introduced in this case showed that the fees earned by the plaintiff as justice during the time sued for somewhat exceeded the salary prescribed by the act for that period, but that the fees actually collected did not quite equal such salary. But in the view we take that question is not material. The fees were not fixed sums to be paid by the public, like unto a salary, which he was sure to receive, but were to be paid by the litigants, and the compensation received by him depended upon the amount of the fees collected, which was necessarily more or less uncertain. In such cases it has been held that a law changing from a fee basis to a salary, by requiring the fees to be turned over to the county, and the county to pay a fixed salary, does not necessarily increase the officer's compensation, contrary to such constitutional provision, and will not be so held unless it appears, as a matter of law, on the face of the act itself, that the officer's compensation is thereby increased. If not, it will be conclusively presumed that the Legislature investigated the facts and ascertained that by the change from the fee basis to the salary prescribed no increase would be made in the compensation of the officer. Galeener v. Honeycutt, 173 Cal. loc. cit. 103 et seq., 159 Pac. 595; State ex rel. v. Erickson, 120 Wis. loc. cit. 442, 98 N. W. 253; State v. Grimes, 7 Wash. 445, 35 Pac. 361.

While this court has never before passed upon the question, we deem the above ruling to be sound, and it meets with our approval.

[7] VII. It is next argued that the act does not apply to justices in office at the time the act took effect, because it provides that (section 2) "each justice of the peace shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, give bond to the state," etc., that he will pay over all moneys received by him. The whole act shows that it is to govern all justices of the peace, those in office, as well as those subsequently to be elected or appointed. The language quoted means that before entering upon his duties as justice, under the act, each justice shall give bond, etc. He could not enter upon his duties, under the act, until it took effect, and it was intended he should then and thereafter turn over his fees, give bond to secure his obligation so to do, and receive a salary. We must rule this contention also against respondent.

[8] VIII. We sustain the respondent's contention that plaintiff is not entitled to the clerk hire sued for. The statute does not require the justice to pay the clerk, if there is one, nor require the salary of the clerk to be paid to the justice.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial in accordance with the views herein expressed.

BROWN and RAGLAND, CC., concur.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion by SMALL, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

All concur, except WOODSON, J., absent.

SULLIVAN v. CHAUVENET. (No. 21154.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations \Leftrightarrow 706(5)—Evidence held to show that defendant's automobile was running at excessive speed.

In an action for personal injuries sustained by a 13 year old boy struck by an automobile while crossing the street, evidence held to show that defendant's automobile was running at an unlawful and dangerous speed.

2. Municipal corporations \Leftrightarrow 705(3)—Failure of automobile driver to sound warning at street intersection held negligence.

In an action for personal injuries sustained by a 13 year old boy struck by defendant's automobile while crossing the street, failure of defendant's chauffeur to sound a warning upon approaching the crossing, which was a commonly used one, held negligence.

3. Municipal corporations \Leftrightarrow 705(5)—Street running into but not crossing another street held not an "intersecting highway," within statute.

Laws 1911, p. 327, § 8, par. 2, requiring an automobile upon approaching an intersecting highway, or curve or corner in a highway where the operator's view is obstructed, to slow down and give timely signal, does not require the driver of an automobile to slow down when approaching a point where a side street debouches into another street; such street not being an "intersecting highway," within the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Intersecting Way.]

4. Municipal corporations \Leftrightarrow 705(5)—Ordinance held not to require motor vehicles to slow down at street crossing when not exceeding speed prescribed.

A city ordinance limiting the speed of vehicles to six miles per hour when turning the corner of intersecting streets, avenues, boulevards, or public places, or when traversing a curve or turn in the street where the view is obstructed, does not require the driver of an automobile going at a rate not exceeding six miles an hour to slow down, and an instruction authorizing a recovery for such omission is erroneous.

5. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 856(1)—Case reversed for error, though another ground of recovery established.

On appeal by defendant in an action for personal injuries sustained in an automobile collision, where error has been committed in allowing recovery, merely for not slowing down at the street crossing, the judgment must be reversed, notwithstanding defendant's failure to signal was established.

6. Municipal corporations \Leftrightarrow 706(7)—Contributory negligence in automobile accident held for jury.

In an action for personal injuries to a 13 year old boy struck by defendant's automobile while crossing the street, evidence held to make the question of his contributory negligence one for the jury.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Karl Kimmel, Judge.

Action by James J. Sullivan against Anna L. A. Chauvenet, wherein, upon plaintiff's death, Patrick Sullivan was substituted as administrator. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

H. W. Allen and Blodgett & Rector, all of St. Louis, for appellant.

Walter B. Douglas and Roebke & Clay, all of St. Louis, for respondent.

GOODE, J. Between 7:30 and 8 o'clock in the evening of October 2, 1912, James J. Sullivan, then a boy 13 years old, was collided with and seriously hurt by an automobile owned by defendant and driven by a chauffeur employed by her. The injured boy began this action, but, as he has died since it was tried, Patrick Sullivan, the administrator of his estate, has been substituted as the plaintiff. For convenience we will speak of the boy as still the plaintiff. As related by the boy and corroborated in important particulars by other testimony, the facts are these:

The plaintiff had been playing a game with some boys at Garfield and Union avenues, two intersecting streets in St. Louis; the former running east and west and the latter north and south. Boys of another group were teasing the proprietor of a hardware store near by and finally the proprietor chased them. Plaintiff was afraid he might be caught and charged with the mischievous acts done in front of the hardware store, though he said he had nothing to do with them, so he ran too, and southwardly along the east side of Union avenue toward another east and west street which intersected it, that is, Cote Brillante avenue. Cote Brillante does not run across Union in a straight course, but has a jog in it at Union, which it enters at the east side about 40 feet south of where it enters at the west. Plaintiff ran along the east sidewalk of Union avenue until he reached a point opposite the mouth of Cote Brillante on the west side of Union, which was a common crossing place, and there he started across Union, still running, to join a boy friend on the southwest corner of Union and Cote Brillante. He was looking south but saw no automobile coming. Double street car tracks run along the center of Union avenue, with roadways on either side, and when plaintiff was within 3 feet of the east street car track and 17 feet from the east curb of Union he was run into by defendant's automobile, knocked down but got up, walked to the sidewalk, fell there, was taken up, and conveyed in the automobile that hurt him to a hospital. The machine was stopped about 35 feet north of the point where it knocked plaintiff down. No warning of its approach had been given by horn or other noise and he had not observed it, but its headlights were burning and he could see several blocks to the southward. The chauffeur went to the plaintiff while plaintiff was lying on the ground, and was asked why he did not sound a horn, and the chauffeur replied he did not have time. The automobile was a heavy one and the fenders on it were heavy. The left front fender was the part that struck plaintiff and it was bent slightly by the blow. A witness testified he noticed the automobile just before it hit the boy; that it was running "at full speed"—15 or 20 miles an hour. An expert said it could have been stopped, considering the condition of the street and the speed, in 15 or 20 feet. Traffic ordinances of the city of St. Louis regulating the driving of automobiles are in proof.

The driver of the automobile testified as follows: He had stopped just south of East Cote Brillante avenue to adjust his rear light, and after starting again was running about 6 miles an hour; plaintiff ran into the automobile, having started southwest across the driveway of Union avenue, when the automobile was within 3 feet of him; he was looking back in the direction of the proprietor of the hardware store, who was chasing some boys; when he saw plaintiff the clutch was thrown out and the brake applied, which were the acts to do to stop the car; also the car was turned toward the east curb of Union avenue and hit plaintiff only a foot from the curb; ran 3 feet after the collision; did not blow his horn because he had not time to do so after he saw plaintiff. The injured boy was given attention by a physician at the hospital, where he complained of pain in the region of his left kidney; showed no bruise or swelling, but was pale and weak; was taken home that evening; suffered much through the night and the next day, or the day after, commenced to bleed from the left kidney, and the hemorrhage continued until he came near dying; was taken again to the hospital and an operation performed. The left kidney had been torn in two; the upper third was torn off. The kidney was removed and after several weeks the plaintiff was able to leave the hospital, and in two months he returned to school, but remained weak for a long time.

The specifications of negligence counted on in the petition are these: First, that by the exercise of ordinary care the driver could have seen plaintiff crossing the street in time to avoid injuring him; second, in violation of the duty imposed by law and ordinance on persons operating automobiles on a public street, the driver of the car ran it at a high and dangerous speed and in excess of 10 miles an hour; third, the driver sounded no warning; fourth, did not reduce speed as he approached the intersection of Cote Brillante and Union avenues. The answer was a general denial and an averment that plaintiff caused or contributed to his injury by running backward into the street from the curb on Union avenue at a point not customarily used by pedestrians as a crossing, without looking to see whether a vehicle was approaching, and in so doing ran into and collided with the automobile, when by using reasonable care to look for approaching vehicles he could have avoided the collision. The jury returned a verdict against defendant for $12,- 500, and, judgment having been entered on the verdict, the defendant appealed.

The court instructed for a verdict for the plaintiff, James Joseph Sullivan, if the jury found defendant's chauffeur negligently ran the automobile against plaintiff at a high and dangerous speed, or without sounding a warning or giving any signal of its approach, or without slowing down as the automobile approached the intersection of Cote Brillante and Union avenues, provided the plaintiff was found to have been exercising ordinary care for his own safety. The instruction omitted to submit the question of whether the driver of the car could have seen the boy, had ordinary care been used, in time to avoid running against him, though an allegation to that effect was made in the petition. The defendant asked a separate instruction concerning each of the three acts of negligence submitted to the jury, and charging that plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict for the particular act of negligence mentioned in the instruction; the total effect of these three instructions being that the plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict at all. We learn from the opinion of the St. Louis Court of Appeals that at the first trial the only issue of negligence left to the jury related to the omission of the chauffeur to sound a warning. We presume additional evidence was introduced at the second trial, as a different view of the case was then taken by the court in instructing the jury, and rightly.

[1] The limit of speed allowed by municipal ordinance in the district of St. Louis where the accident occurred was 10 miles an hour. There was testimony that the speed defendant's automobile was under when it hit the boy was from 15 to 20 miles an hour. This evidence, if believed, inclines to prove the speed was not only excessive, but dangerous. The car ran 35 or 40 feet past the boy after colliding with him; the fender that struck him, a heavy one, was bent upward by the blow; he was knocked 3 feet away; his kidney was torn in two. We rule there was substantial evidence that the car was running at an unlawful and dangerous speed.

[2] An ordinance of the city required drivers of motor vehicles to sound their horns so as to warn pedestrians when they approached the crossing of a public street. The plaintiff was struck at a point on Union avenue which was commonly used as a crossing, according to the testimony, and no signal was given as defendant's car drew near that crossing. The chauffeur acknowledged he did not blow his horn when he started again after having stopped on the south side of the intersection of East Cote Brillante avenue with Union, a point some 70 feet south of the place where the boy was struck. He said, too, he did not signal at any time after resuming his journey and before the boy was hit; in fact, did not remember blowing the horn after he passed

Delmar avenue, an intersecting street many blocks south of Cote Brillante. Possibly the fact that West Cote Brillante opened into the west side of Union further north was the cause of his omitting to signal as he approached the crossing; but, as a commonly used crossing was there, the evidence tends to support a finding that it was an omission to comply with the ordinance, and cause for a finding that the chauffeur was negligent.

The court instructed it was ground for a verdict for plaintiff if the automobile approached the intersection of the streets without slowing down. For convenience in considering the propriety of that direction, we transcribe the instruction wherein it was given:

"The court instructs you that if you find and believe from the evidence that on or about the 2d day of October, 1912, the defendant or her agent and servant was operating an automobile on Union avenue at the intersection of said avenue with Cote Brillante avenue, and that both of said avenues are public streets of the city of St. Louis, and that the defendant or her agent and servant negligently ran said automobile at a high and dangerous rate of speed, or without sounding any warning or giving any signal of its approach, or without slowing down as said automobile approached the intersection of said streets, upon and against plaintiff, striking and injuring him, and if you find and believe from the evidence that plaintiff's injury was proximately caused by defendant's negligence in one or more of said particulars above mentioned, and that the plaintiff at the time was exercising ordinary care for his own safety, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff."

We remark that the three careless acts, either of which, if proved to have happened, would warrant, according to the instruction, a verdict for plaintiff, are stated separately and divided by the word "or." We remark, too, that the right of recovery, if the car approached the intersection of the streets without slowing down, is not based on neglect to slow down upon the driver's apprehending, or having reason to apprehend, the plaintiff was in danger of being run against if the speed was not lowered, but on the bare fact that the speed was not lowered as the intersection was approached. Omitting to reduce speed was not in itself (and independently of reason to anticipate striking some person if the rate of speed was kept up) negligent conduct unless the law of the state or a municipal ordinance required a reduction when approaching the place of the accident.

This is the statute that bears on the question:

"Upon approaching a pedestrian, who is upon the traveled part of any highway and not upon a sidewalk, and upon approaching an intersecting highway or a curve or a corner in a highway, where the operator's view is obstructed, every person operating a motor vehicle shall slow down and give a timely signal with his bell, horn or other device for signalling." Laws 1911, p. 327, § 8, par. 2.

[3] The question submitted was not whether the driver of the automobile neglected to slow down upon approaching the plaintiff when the plaintiff was a pedestrian in the highway, but when the car approached an intersecting highway. Can it be said the statute required the driver to slow down because he, while driving in the east driveway of Union, was drawing near to the line of the intersection of Cote Brillante avenue with the west side of Union, a street 55 feet wide and with double street car tracks in the middle and roadways on either side of the tracks? Was Cote Brillante an intersecting highway in the statutory sense? We think not. The object of the law is to prevent collisions between motor vehicles and other vehicles and persons at the intersection of streets and highways where collisions are apt to happen—at a point where one street opens into another and vehicles usually run past the mouth of the intersecting street. Where two separate roadways run along a street and a cross street debouches into the roadway an automobile is not running on, the statute does not apply. It is to be borne in mind the statute does not refer to a crossing of a street or highway; that is, the point where pedestrians cross.

We next ask: Was there a city ordinance which required the chauffeur to diminish speed when approaching the crossing? The only ordinance which can be argued to have that effect, after prescribing maximum speeds for vehicles, lays this duty on drivers:

"And when turning the corner of intersecting streets, avenues, boulevards, or public places, or when traversing a curve or turn in a street, avenue, boulevard, or public place where the view is obstructed, the rate of speed shall not be greater than six miles per hour."

[4, 5] The driver of the car in question testified he was not exceeding 6 miles an hour. Other testimony goes to prove he was. But the act of negligence the instruction for plaintiff submitted to the jury was, not that the car was running more than 6 miles an hour "when turning the corner of intersecting streets," etc., or when the view was obstructed, but that the defendant's driver approached the intersection of Cote Brillante and Union avenues "without slowing down."

That was a precaution the ordinance did not prescribe. It follows the instruction was erroneous in authorizing a recovery for the omission of the driver to do something not exacted of him by the law. Should the judgment be reversed for this error when another failure of duty, namely, not signaling, was established? We think it must, for the reason that it cannot be known which neglect was found by the jury to have been the proximate cause of the accident—omitting to signal or omitting to slow down. If they thought the latter neglect was the sole proximate cause of the accident, then it was not the breach of a duty to the boy by defendant's driver, and the verdict should have been for defendant.

[6] It is earnestly insisted the plaintiff was shown conclusively to have caused his injury by his own carelessness in darting suddenly off the sidewalk of Union avenue in close proximity to the car; that he knew moving motorcars were frequent at the point, must have realized the need to look for them, and could have seen the five headlights of the defendant's car had he looked southward before leaving the sidewalk. He said he looked and did not see the car—an improbable occurrence, we may say an impossible one, if he looked carefully, and with his mind alert to ascertain whether he could cross in safety. Therefore the question is, should the plaintiff be held negligent in law for leaving the sidewalk when he did? If the car was only 3 feet away at the moment, and he was struck within a foot of the east curb, as the driver said, then he was negligent. If he was struck as he said, and as other evidence tends to show, 17 feet from the east curb, and only 3 feet from the east rail of the car track, the conclusion of contributory negligence on his part is not compelled; for this would make an issue for the jury as to whether the car was far enough away from him when he started to cross the street to lead a reasonably prudent boy of 14 years to attempt to cross in the belief that he could get over before the car reached him. The issue of his negligence as a cause or factor in causing the accident was left to the jury under a sound instruction and rightly, we think.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

STATE v. DALE. (No. 21970.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §956(4)—Evidence held to show that when defendant entered plea of guilty he was misled.

In a prosecution for robbery where defendant entered plea of guilty, and on being sentenced to five years in the penitentiary moved for new trial on the ground that he had been led to believe that he would be paroled by court, evidence held to establish defendant's contention he had pleaded guilty under a misapprehension; hence denial of the motion was erroneous.

2. Criminal law §913(1)—Courts in accepting plea of guilty must see that defendant has not been misled.

Courts have always been accustomed to exercise a great degree of care in receiving pleas of guilty in prosecutions for felonies to see that the defendant has not made his plea by being misled, and where it appears that defendant probably was misled he should be allowed to withdraw his plea and be granted new trial, notwithstanding entry of judgment of conviction.

Appeal from Circuit Court, St. Charles County; Edgar B. Woolfolk, Judge.

Virgil Dale was convicted of robbery on plea of guilty, and after the overruling of his motion for new trial he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Defendant pleaded guilty in the circuit court of St. Charles county to an information charging him with robbery in the first degree, in that defendant feloniously took $7 from the person of one Frank J. Bull, by force and violence to his person. Thereupon the court sentenced defendant to five years' imprisonment in the state penitentiary. At the time the plea of guilty was entered defendant was not represented by counsel, but afterwards, and within four days, defendant appeared by counsel and filed a motion for a new trial, setting up as a ground that he had entered a plea of guilty upon a promise that he would be paroled by the court. Testimony was heard by the court upon this motion and the motion was overruled. Defendant thereafter duly perfected an appeal to this court.

The evidence heard upon the motion for a new trial was as follows:

"Synopsis of Testimony of Virgil Dale.

"My name is Virgil Dale, age 23. I reside at 8453 Lowell, St. Louis, Mo. I was employed at the Baden car shops. I was arrested with Alvin Meyer, charged with robbing Frank Bull, on the night of the 21st of February, in a saloon in St. Charles, by Sheriff John Grothe. After arresting me Mr. Grothe took me into a back room adjoining the saloon and searched me, then took me outside of the saloon onto the street and had me turn my coat collar up, then had Frank Bull come and see if he could identify me as one of the men who had held him up and robbed him. Bull looked at me and said that he could not say that I was one of them. Then Mr. Grothe took me over and put me in jail. After I was in jail about one-half or three-quarters of an hour, Mr. Hensler, the prosecuting attorney there, came over to the jail and the sheriff came and got me and took me into a room in the jail and the sheriff and Mr. Hensler began asking me questions about the robbery. I told them I did not know anything about it, but they kept on questioning me about the robbery and I kept telling them that I did not know anything about it.

"Then they put me back in the cell and took Alvin Meyer out. After awhile they came and got me and took me back to the room again and told me I might as well tell them about the robbery as Meyer had made a statement that we had robbed Mr. Bull. Mr. Hensler said to me that if I would make a confession and say that I held up Mr. Bull and took money from him that it would be easier for me. He said that he was my friend, and that if I would say that I had committed the robbery and sign a statement and plead guilty that the court would parole me. After talking the matter over with him and the sheriff for quite awhile, I believed what each of them said to me, and signed the statement, and when I was brought into court I pleaded guilty, believing that I would be paroled by the court, as Mr. Hensler told me the night I was arrested I would be; but instead of paroling me they gave me five years in the penitentiary."

"Question by the Court: 'Weren't you represented by an attorney at the time that you entered a plea of guilty?'"

"Answer by Virgil Dale: 'I did not have an attorney. They told me I did not need one. Mr. Hensler also told me there in jail that night that Mr. Bull did not want his name in court, and that if I would plead guilty he would see to it that I was paroled.'"

"Synopsis of Testimony of John Dale.

"My name is John Dale. I am the father of Virgil Dale. After Virgil was arrested and in jail waiting for trial, I went to see Mr. Hensler, prosecuting attorney, to see what Virgil was charged with. Mr. Hensler told me that it was highway robbery; that he had held up Frank Bull of St. Charles and robbed him of $7. I talked with Mr. Hensler about the case, and said that I would get a lawyer for Virgil, but Mr. Hensler said it was not necessary; 'the boy has pleaded guilty and you need not do it.' He said he would go with me to the judge and see what could be done about it, and that we would have a talk with the judge about paroling Virgil."

"On the morning of the 18th of March (this was the day that Virgil's trial came up) I had a talk with Mr. Hensler, and he said the judge would be in on the 10:48 train, he supposed, and that we could see him; but Mr. Hensler said that he would see the judge and that everything would be all right, and I just relied on what Hensler said and did not get a lawyer for Virgil."

"Synopsis of Testimony of Mrs. Allie Jacobsen.

"My name is Mrs. Allie Jacobsen. I went to see Mr. Hensler at his house and had a conversation with him about the trouble that Virgil was in. This was after Virgil was arrested and before they sentenced him to the pen. Mr. Hensler told me that we did not need a lawyer for Virgil; that he had already made a confession to him about the robbery, but that he knew that Virgil was not a bad boy and that he would help him out of his trouble; that he would do all in his power for him; that it was all in his hands and that he would go to the judge. I am an aunt of Virgil Dale.

"I later had a conversation with Mr. Hensler at his office and he repeated about the same thing to me at his office that he had said to me at his house, and assured me that he would help Virgil out of the trouble at the same time I talked with him at his office. I asked him again if we would need a lawyer for Virgil and Mr. Hensler said, "No," it was not necessary; it was all in his hands. This is the statement that he made to me, and I thought he was telling me the truth about it."

"Synopsis of Testimony of John Grothe.

"My name is John Grothe. I am sheriff of St. Charles county. On the night of February 21st I arrested Virgil Dale in a saloon and searched him, and then took him outside and had Frank Bull come and see if he could identify him. Mr. Bull said, "It looks like the two boys;" but he was not sure; then I took him over and locked him up in jail. After a short time Mr. Hensler came over to the jail and we took Dale out into a room and began to question him and he denied the charge of robbery. We then brought out Alvin Meyer and questioned him and he made a statement, and we then again brought out Virgil Dale, and told him that Meyer had told us all about holding up Bull and that he might as well tell the truth about it. Then Dale said to me, "If I tell you about it can I go home to-night, or can I get out on bond, and if I tell you will I be paroled?" I told him I could not parole him; that was for the court to say; that it was too late for him to get out on bond that night. I told Dale I was his friend, but I did not tell him that if he would confess he would be paroled. I told him that I was his friend and was still his friend and would help him if I could."

"Synopsis of Testimony of Osmund Hensler.

"My name is Osmund Hensler. I am prosecuting attorney for St. Charles county. On the night of the 21st of February, 1919, I came from St. Louis and went over to the jail and had a conversation with Virgil Dale and questioned him regarding having robbed Frank Bull on that night of $7. Dale denied the robbery and said that he did not know anything about it. After talking with him for some time Grothe, the sheriff here, brought out Alvin Meyer and questioned him and he made a statement to us that they had robbed Frank Bull. We again brought Dale out and told him that he might as well tell what he knew about the robbery as Meyer had told us all about it and had made a confession. Then Dale put his head on the table and asked me, "Will I get out?" Grothe told him it was too late to get out that night. I did not say to Dale that if he would make a confession that he would be paroled by the court. I told him that I was his friend and that I would help him. I do not remember just all that was said there that night.

"I had a talk with John Dale, Virgil's father, in my office on the morning of the 18th of March. I told him that I would see the judge and see what could be done about the case, but I did not tell Virgil that if he would sign a confession that he would be paroled. I don't remember all that was said there that night in the jail when we talked to Virgil. I did say to him that I was his friend.

"I had a conversation with Allie Jacobsen, at my house, a few days before Virgil's case came up and told her that I would do all that I could for the boy. I did tell her that I knew that he was a good boy, and had never been in any trouble before that I had ever heard of, but I did not tell her that I would have him paroled.

"I talked with John Dale, the boy's father, three or four times about the case, and I did tell him that I was in sympathy with him and I told the boy's father that I would do all I could for Virgil."

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and C. P. Le Mire, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WILLIAMS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] After carefully reviewing the foregoing testimony offered upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial, we are of the opinion that defendant at the time of entering a plea of guilty was laboring under misapprehension as to his rights and that he had been misled by the conversations which he had had with the prosecuting attorney. We do not mean by this that the evidence shows that the prosecuting attorney willfully misled the defendant, but what we do mean to say is that we think the evidence tends strongly to show that the defendant was in fact misled by what occurred.

It is immaterial whether the misleading was intentionally or unintentionally done. The material inquiry is: Was the defendant misled, or under a misapprehension, at the time he entered his plea of guilty? While it may be true, as stated by the prosecuting attorney, that he did not in so many words tell defendant that if he would make a confession that he would be paroled, yet we think the statements made by the prosecutor to the defendant were such as did cause him to believe that he would be paroled if he entered a plea of guilty.

[2] Under such circumstances the judgment should not be permitted to stand. The rule to be here applied is fully discussed in the early case of State v. Stephens, 71 Mo. 535. In that case the court, in reversing and remanding a judgment of the trial court in refusing to grant a new trial on the ground that the defendant had been misled into entering a plea of guilty, said:

"Viewing the matter, then, in either light, we feel constrained to say that it would better have comported with the proper exercise of a sound judicial discretion, had the special judge permitted the withdrawal of the plea of guilty and the entry, in its stead, of the usual plea. The law is not composed of a series of snares and pitfalls for the unwary, neither does it favor what Judge Bliss terms 'snap judgments.' * * * Courts have always been accustomed to exercise a great degree of care in receiving pleas of guilty, in prosecutions for felonies, to see that the prisoner had not made his plea by being misled, or under misapprehension or the like."

The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded.

STATE v. MEYER. (No. 21969.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.

Criminal law §956(4) — Evidence held to show that when defendant entered plea of guilty he was misled.

In a prosecution for robbery where defendant entered a plea of guilty, and on being sentenced to five years in the penitentiary moved for a new trial on the ground that he had been led to believe that he would be paroled by the court, evidence held to establish defendant's contention that he had pleaded guilty under misapprehension; hence denial of the motion was erroneous.

WILLIAMS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). This is a companion case to the case of State v. Dale, 222 S. W. 763, which has just been delivered by this Division of the court.

We are of the opinion that the testimony in this case also tends strongly to show that defendant entered a plea of guilty under a misapprehension as to his rights in the premises and on account of being misled. The rule of law applied in the Dale Case is likewise applicable to this case.

For the reasons stated in the Dale Case, the judgment herein is reversed and the cause is remanded.

DILLARD v. SANDERSON et al. (No. 20631.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, in Banc. May 21, 1920.)

Courts \Leftarrow 231 (33)—Threatened trespass to lay out public highway does not involve title conferring jurisdiction on Supreme Court.

In a suit by a landowner against the members of the county court and a highway engineer and public road overseer to enjoin a threatened trespass upon his property for the purpose of laying out a public road already established, the title to real estate is only incidentally involved, and will not support jurisdiction on the part of the Supreme Court, where the judgment actually affecting the title to the land at the time of the establishment of the road has not been appealed from.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pike County; Edgar B. Woolfolk, Judge.

Action by C. W. Dillard against R. R. Sanderson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Transferred by the Court of Appeals. Retransferred.

J. O. Barrow, of Vandalia, and Hostetter & Haley, of Bowling Green, for appellants.

Pearson & Pearson, of Louisiana, Mo., for respondent.

GRAVES, J. This cause was transferred to this court by the St. Louis Court of Appeals on the ground that title to real estate is involved. In Division 1 it was transferred to this court on account of a contrariety of opinion in this court.

The action is one by a landowner against the members of the county court of Pike county, and the highway engineer of said county, together with one Williams, a public road overseer. The action is one by injunction, wherein the plaintiff seeks to restrain the defendants from entering upon and laying out a public road over the plaintiff's land. Plaintiff avers that defendants threatened to enter upon his land for such purpose. The suit is to enjoin such threatened trespass upon his property. The answer avers that a public road had been duly established, by the order of the county court, over the lands of plaintiff, and that defendants were fully authorized to enter upon the property in question.

By its judgment the trial court perpetually enjoined defendants from entering upon the premises of the plaintiff. From such judgment appeal was taken to the St. Louis Court of Appeals, and that court has transferred the case here as above stated. The first question is our jurisdiction. The same state of facts was held in judgment by this court in Hill v. Hopson et al., 221 Mo. 103, 120 S. W. 29. In that case we held that we had no jurisdiction, and transferred the case to the Court of Appeals, 150 Mo. App. 611, 131 S. W. 357. We said that in an injunction suit for a similar threatened trespass title to real estate was only incidentally involved, and was not involved in the sense which lodged jurisdiction here. The rule in that case determines our jurisdiction in this case. Under that rule we are without jurisdiction, and this cause should be recertified to the St. Louis Court of Appeals.

In cases of this character we have not ruled by a uniform voice. We should not overlook the fact that the real character of a case of the kind involved here is to restrain a threatened trespass. In such cases title to real estate is not so involved as to confer jurisdiction here. When the road was ordered, and the party's land was actually taken, was the time when title to real estate was so involved, as to cast the jurisdiction here. That was a judgment in the county court, and by appeal to the circuit court would have been tried de novo. If by the judgment of the circuit court the road was established and the land taken, the appeal from such circuit court judgment would lie here, because such judgment directly affected the title to land. But such is not the case here. The judgment actually affecting the title to lands was not appealed from by the landowner. In this injunction proceeding the title is only incidentally involved, depending upon the record deeds upon the one side, and this county court judgment on the other side. Like all trespass cases title to real estate may be incidentally involved, but the judgment itself (unlike the judgment ordering the road) does not take title from one and lodge it in another. Mere injunction to restrain trespass (as is the case here) does not so involve title to lands as to confer jurisdiction upon this court.

That we may speak with a united voice, the case of Ripkey v. Gresham, 214 S. W. 851, and the cases therein cited are hereby overruled. This ruling likewise applies to the same case in the Springfield Court of Appeals, when it was transferred here, and the cases in that opinion cited, 190 S. W. 354, and all like cases. The cause is retransferred to St. Louis Court of Appeals.

All concur, except WOODSON, J., who is absent.

STATE v. PLOTNER. (No. 21550.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Forgery \S 15—"Person dealing with corporation" as to making false entries must be one representing the adverse side of a transaction with the corporation.

A "person dealing with * * * corporation," within Rev. St. 1909, \S 4653, denouncing the making of false entries with intent to defraud in books of corporation to be delivered, or with intent to be delivered, to some "person dealing with the corporation," must be a person representing the other side in a transaction with the corporation, and not officers or directors acting for the corporation.

2. Forgery \S 15—Persons held "dealing" with bank, within statute denouncing false entries in books delivered to "person dealing with corporation."

State bank examiners, clearing house auditor, or any stockholder or depositor, would be persons dealing with the bank, within Rev. St. 1909, \S 4653, denouncing the making of false entries with fraudulent intent in books of corporation delivered or intended to be delivered to any "person dealing with * * * corporation."

3. Forgery \S 15—Bank's cash journal not "delivered" to depositor, within statute denouncing forgery, by permitting them to examine the book.

Permitting depositors, stockholders, or clearing house examiners to examine cash journal of bank does not constitute delivery of such book to such depositors, within Rev. St. 1909, \S 4653, denouncing as forgery the making of false entries with intent to defraud in books of corporation "delivered" or intended to be "delivered" to any person dealing with such corporation; the book not being "delivered" until there is at least temporarily a change of control or of possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Given.]

4. Statutes \S 188—Legislature presumed to have given word its ordinary meaning.

The court cannot assume that the Legislature, in the use of a word in the enactment, intended to give it a meaning radically different from that which ordinarily attaches to it, without some explanation of such intention.

5. Forgery \S 15—Books of bank may be "delivered" by temporary transfer of actual and absolute control of a book.

In order that a book of a bank be "delivered," within Rev. St. 1909, \S 4653, denouncing as forgery the making of false entries with intent to defraud in books of corporation "delivered or intended to be delivered" to person dealing with such corporation, it is not necessary to place the book permanently beyond the control or demand of a bank, as in case of a sale or gift, but there may be a delivery for the purpose of inspection, or a conditional delivery; but to constitute delivery in such case there must be temporarily a transfer of actual and absolute control of book.

6. Forgery \S 15—Bank books "delivered" to person dealing with such bank by examination thereof by bank examiners.

In view of Rev. St. 1909, \S 1080, as amended by Acts 1911, p. 91, and section 1081, the books of a bank are "delivered" to person dealing with the bank, within section 4653, denouncing as forgery the making of false entries in books of corporation "delivered or intended to be delivered," to any person dealing with such corporation, on examination of such books by state bank commissioner, and his deputy, and the bank examiners; such examination constituting a temporary transfer of the control of books to the examiners.

7. Forgery \S 5—Intention of defendant, accused of making false entries in books of corporation, immaterial.

In prosecution for forgery, by making false entries with intent to defraud in books of bank delivered or to be delivered to any person dealing with bank, in violation of Rev. St. 1909, \S 4653, the intention of the defendant as to delivery of book is immaterial, in view of section 4921; the words "intended to be delivered," within former statute, referring to the intention of the corporation owning the books, and not the intention of the person making false entries.

8. Forgery \S 27—Information charging forgery by making false entries in book of bank held defective.

In prosecution for forgery by making false entries, with intent to defraud, in books of corporation, in violation of Rev. St. 1909, \S 4653, information held defective in failing to allege that the bank intended to deliver the book to any person, or kept book for that purpose, as required by the statute.

9. Forgery \S 21—Defendant held guilty on coconspirator making false entries in bank book.

Defendant, who instructed bank employé to make false entries in bank book, and who instructed employé to pick out some account that had not previously been tampered with, but that had sufficient money to withstand a false entry, was guilty of forgery, in violation of Rev. St. 1909, \S 4653, though employé made the false entry in account that had previously been manipulated, since in so doing the employé was carrying out the general purpose of the conspiracy to defraud by making a false entry.

10. Criminal law \S 59(4)—Rule as to guilt of coconspirator stated.

If two or more persons agree together to commit some crime, and enter upon the commission of the crime, and one of them, in pursuance of the common design and for the purpose of carrying it out, performs some criminal act different from that in contemplation of the parties at the outset, the others will be guilty of the criminal act.

11. Criminal law §159 — Prosecution on amended information held not barred by limitations.

That information on which trial for forgery was had was filed more than three years after the commission of the crime did not bar prosecution by limitations, though such information was given a different number than a previous information, where order permitting the filing of an amended information recited that the amended information was given a different number, and where court by order corrected such number, so as to make it correspond with previous information.

12. Forgery §15—Statute denouncing making of "false entries" violated by making single false entry.

Rev. St. 1909, § 4653, denouncing as forgery the making of "false entries" in books of a corporation, is violated by the making of a single false entry, in view of sections 8053-8055, notwithstanding that, as originally enacted, the statute contained the singular "entry."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, False Entry.]

Appeal from Criminal Court, Jackson County; E. E. Porterfield, Judge.

James A. Plotner was convicted of forgery in third degree, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

See, also, 185 S. W. 192.

The defendant was convicted in the circuit court of Jackson county of forgery in the third degree, in violation of section 4653, R. S. 1909, and appealed. The amended information on which he was tried is as follows (caption and signatures omitted):

"Now comes Hunt C. Moore, prosecuting attorney for the state of Missouri, in and for the body of the county of Jackson, and upon his oath informs the court that John Edward Kornfeldt and James A. Plotner, whose Christian names in full are unknown to said prosecuting attorney, late of the county aforesaid, on the 14th day of September, 1914, at the county of Jackson, state of Missouri, did unlawfully and feloniously conspire, combine, and confederate with one another and together, with the felonious intent then and there to defraud the Mercantile Bank of Kansas City, Missouri, a moneyed corporation (existing under the laws of Missouri and engaged in the general banking business in the city of Kansas City, Jackson county, Missouri), and customers, depositors, and patrons of said bank and corporation aforesaid, particularly one William H. Toller, of the money and personal property of said bank aforesaid, and its said customers, depositors, and patrons, particularly said Toller, and in pursuance of and to effectuate their said unlawful and felonious intent and purpose, did then and there unlawfully and feloniously cause to be made, and did make, a certain false entry and entries, in a certain book of accounts, then and there kept by said bank aforesaid, in which said book of accounts was then and there recorded and kept the accounts of said bank aforesaid, with its customers, depositors, and patrons, and particularly the account of the said William H. Toller, its customer, depositor, and patron as aforesaid, thus and thereby unlawfully and feloniously, by then and there making and entering the figures '200,' did then and there add and enter a charge of two hundred dollars ($200.00) against said Toller, depositor of said bank, as aforesaid, on said book of accounts, and then and there and thus and thereby unlawfully and feloniously did diminish and discharge the existing pecuniary obligation of said bank aforesaid to said Toller in the sum and to the amount of two hundred dollars ($200.00), and at the same time and by the same act, and with the same unlawful and felonious intent and purpose, did then and there in manner and form as aforesaid create an, as well as increase the, existing pecuniary obligation of said Toller to said bank aforesaid, in the sum of and to the amount of two hundred dollars ($200.00), which said book of accounts with the said false and fraudulent entry and entries therein unlawfully and feloniously made as aforesaid, the said defendants, John Edward Kornfeldt and James A. Plotner, did unlawfully and feloniously intend to and did deliver to the officers of said bank, to wit, George H. Ruddy, George M. M. Edwards, directors and officers of said bank, and William T. Kemper and others, persons then and there dealing with said bank aforesaid, and to the said William H. Toller, depositor of said bank aforesaid, against the peace and dignity of the state."

On a severance the trial proceeded against Plotner. John Edward Kornfeldt at the time of the trial had pleaded guilty, was under sentence to serve two years in the penitentiary, and at liberty on parole. He was the principal witness for the state.

The defendant, in August, 1914, and thereafter, was an attorney, with an office in the Lathrop Building, Kansas City, Mo., and a depositor in the Mercantile Bank mentioned in the information. At that time Kornfeldt, a young man 22 years of age and married, was a bookkeeper in the bank, and had charge of those books representing the alphabet from K to Z, covering Plotner's account. Plotner had done Kornfeldt some favors, so as to arouse a feeling of obligation on Kornfeldt's part. About August 17, 1914, Plotner requested Kornfeldt to come to his office, which Kornfeldt did. Plotner then told Kornfeldt that he was expecting certain checks to come through the bank, which he would not have money deposited to cover. He had a check for $200 coming through that day, and asked Kornfeldt to "take care of it." Kornfeldt was unable to see how he could take care of it, in the absence of sufficient deposit to Plotner's credit.

Plotner suggested that it could be handled by charging the amount to some other depositor who had ample deposit, and promised that he would make it good the following day. The check was accordingly presented, drawn by James A. Plotner, payable to B. Himberg. Kornfeldt carried out the scheme by charging the amount, $200, on the cash journal, to the account of William Toller, a depositor. No windfall came to Plotner that night or afterwards, and the amount still remained charged to the account of William Toller. Instead of having resources by which to make good the shortage, Plotner, apparently, was incurring continual drafts upon his resources, and a few days later drew another check for $100 and Kornfeldt carried out the same sort of a scheme to cover up the transaction. Kornfeldt seemed to be completely under the influence of Plotner, and ready to do anything the latter requested in the direction indicated, although he hoped and expected all the time, he said, that Plotner soon would make his shortages good. He endeavored at times to get Plotner to straighten out the trouble, and was put off with promises and plausible explanations. Plotner's chronic need of money caused a repetition of the transaction mentioned through a period of about three months, until his total peculations amounted to $9,800. Among the checks so drawn and paid was one for $200, dated September 11, 1914, drawn by Plotner, payable to Hoff, Meservey, German & Michael, which was charged to the account of William Toller September 14, 1914. This was the check and the false entry described in the information.

About the middle of January, 1915, the Mercantile Bank was merged with the Commerce Trust Company of Kansas City, and when negotiations looking to that merger began, and some time prior to the merger, Kornfeldt told Plotner about it, and Plotner began to figure some way to escape the inevitable discovery which would follow an examination of the Mercantile Bank's books. He suggested several methods to bluff the matter through, and finally advised Kornfeldt to go to Kansas until he (Plotner) could fix it up, and Kornfeldt went. Plotner then, acting, he said, as attorney for Kornfeldt, went to the officers of the Mercantile Bank and told them Kornfeldt had been embezzling funds of the bank, and had confessed the same to him in his capacity as counsel; he suggested that a settlement in some way should be arranged. Before any definite conclusion of that matter, Kornfeldt returned from Kansas, was arrested, and gave all the facts to the police officers. Finally Plotner substantially admitted his guilt; that he had got practically all the money he was charged with getting, by means of checks which he drew on his own account and which were charged by Kornfeldt to the accounts of others. It turned out that the $200 check, the entry in regard to which constituted the offense for which the defendant was convicted, was drawn to pay a claim against Plotner, a claim which he owed for an account he had collected for some person.

The entry under consideration was made in the "cash journal" of the bank. It never appeared on Toller's passbook, but the entry on the cash journal affected Toller's account, in that it reduced his deposit account $200, and thus reduced the obligation of the bank to him that much. It is not shown that this false entry relating to the $200 appeared on any other book kept by the bank. The purpose for which the "cash journal" containing the false entry was kept, the use to which it was put, and what was done with it, were explained by several witnesses for the state. Kornfeldt testified that after the entry was made in the book that it was intended to be delivered to "any one coming in who wished to look at it." He did actually deliver the book to the board of directors of the bank, and to the committee appointed by the bank as the auditing committee to check the book up.

"They came and asked me for it, and I took it to them. That is a delivery, as nearly as I can figure it out. I carried it into the directors' room and laid it down on the table."

He then said, if William H. Toller had come in there and inquired for the book, it was there for the purpose of delivery to him. This was for the purpose of inspection in the bank. Kornfeldt testified further that at the time of the merger of the Mercantile Bank and the trust company, before the delivery of the books of the bank to the trust company, he worked one whole day on Plotner's passbook in order to balance it up and deliver it to him. He did not say that any false entries were in that passbook, and it may be inferred from his testimony that he was working to get entries in it that ought to have been there at the time of the transactions mentioned.

George H. Ruddy, who was cashier of the Mercantile Bank at the time of the transactions mentioned, swore that the cash journal in which the false entries appeared was under the control of Kornfeldt, whose duty as a bookkeeper was to take charge of it, and to deliver it "to me or any other officer of the bank, or any of our directors, or to our examining committee, as provided by the statute, or the clearing house examiner, or any customer who desired to examine his account in good faith, or any stockholder who wished to make an examination." He testified, further, that in the transfer of the stock of the Mercantile Bank to the Commerce Trust Company the dealing was with one W. T. Kemper, and that the books of the bank, including the cash journal, were delivered to W. T. Kemper at the time of the transfer. The witness then explained that during all the time from the entry to the transfer to the trust company the books, including the cash journal, were there "for the inspection of people dealing with that bank." He then enumerated the people who might inspect the book:

"The officers of the bank; the stockholders of the Mercantile Bank; the auditing committee appointed by the directors of the Mercantile Bank; the clearing house auditor; the state bank examiner, whenever he chose to make an examination; any depositor that desired to examine his particular account, or any stockholder; and at this particular time, January 13th, on account of this merger of the two institutions, Mr. Kemper, president of the Commerce Trust Company or his representative."

Kornfeldt, on being asked if any of the officers of the bank requested him to bring the book, containing the false entry, to the Commerce Trust Company while the negotiation was pending, answered, "Yes." On being asked whether or not he delivered the cash journal, containing the false entries, to any members of the bank, "or others dealing with the bank," he answered:

"I carried the book over from the Mercantile Bank to the Commerce Trust Company under my arm."

It appeared that the witness was employed by the Commerce Trust Company at the time of the merger.

Stubbs & Stubbs and E. W. Sloan, all of Kansas City, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and S. E. Skelley and Henry B. Hunt, Asst. Attys. Gen., for the State.

WHITE, C. (after stating the facts as above). I. The conviction was under section 4653, R. S. 1909. It is urged by appellant that the information does not charge an offense under that statute and that the evidence will not support a conviction of guilt. The section is as follows:

"False Entries in Books of Corporations, Third Degree.—Every person who, with intent to defraud, shall make any false entries, or shall falsely alter any entry made in a book of accounts kept by any moneyed corporation within this state, or in any book of accounts kept by any such corporation or its officers, and delivered or intended to be delivered to any person dealing with such corporation, by which any pecuniary obligation, claim or credit shall be or shall purport to be created, increased, diminished or discharged, or in any manner affected, shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of forgery in the third degree."

intent to defraud; (b) there must be a false entry made in a book of accounts kept by the corporation; (c) by which some pecuniary obligation, claim, or credit shall purport to be increased, diminished, or discharged, or in some manner affected; (d) the book must be delivered or must be intended to be delivered; (e) to some person dealing with the corporation. There can be no serious question that the conditions (a), (b), and (c), were properly alleged and established by sufficient proof; there was undoubtedly an intent to defraud by the false entry in the cash journal, and the account of William Toller was affected by the entry.

[1, 2] It remains to consider what is meant by "any person dealing with the corporation," and "delivered" or "intended to be delivered." Kornfeldt and Ruddy swore those books were delivered and intended to be delivered to the officers of the bank, the examining committee of the directors. Such persons could not come within the definition of persons dealing with the bank in such examination as they conducted; they were acting for the bank—they were the bank. A person "dealing with the bank" in any transaction must be one who represents the other side. Doubtless the other persons mentioned in the evidence, the state bank examiner, the clearing house auditor, any stockholder or depositor, were "persons dealing with the bank," within the meaning of the statute.

[3] There was testimony that the cash journal was intended to be "delivered" to the depositors, stockholders, or clearing house examiner, whenever they desired to examine it; but in explanation of that it is said by Mr. Ruddy that they were the people who "inspected" and "looked at" the books. It is not stated anywhere that the cash journal was permitted to be taken away from the bank; in fact, the evidence indicates that it was not. It was kept by the bank, and the only liberty allowed the persons last mentioned was to examine it. There is no definition of "delivery," or "deliver," which does not involve at least temporarily a change of control or of possession. 18 C. J. p. 476; State v. Mills, 146 Mo. 195, loc. cit. 204, 47 S. W. 938; State v. Watson, 65 Mo. 115, loc. cit. 122; Chambers v. Chambers, 227 Mo. 268, 127 S. W. 86, 137 Am. St. Rep. 567; Thomas v. Thomas, 107 Mo. 459, 18 S. W. 27; Gartside v. Pahlman, 45 Mo. App. 160; In re Estate of Soulard, 141 Mo. 642, 43 S. W. 617; Sneathen v. Sneathen, 104 Mo. 201, 16 S. W. 497, 24 Am. St. Rep. 326; Standiford v. Standiford, 97 Mo. 231, 10 S. W. 836, 3 L. R. A. 299; Mudd v. Dillon, 166 Mo. 110, 65 S. W. 973; McNear v. Williamson, 166 Mo. 358, 66 S. W. 160.

[4] We cannot assume that the Legislature, in the use of a word in the enactment, intended to give it a meaning radically different from that which ordinarily attaches to it, without some explanation of such intention. If it had been the intention of the Legislature to declare a crime is committed in making a false entry in a book to be "inspected by," or "exhibited to," or "examined by," any person dealing with the bank, it would have been not only easy, but it would have been the obvious thing, to use such words in describing the crime. Of course we cannot say what reason actuated the Legislature in so restricting the operation of the statute. We can only give it effect as it reads.

Manifestly the definition under consideration would apply to passbooks kept and intended to be delivered to the customers of the bank. But there was no false entry nor alteration in the passbook of Mr. Toller. His passbook showed exactly the correct statement of his account. There is no definite testimony that there was a false entry in the passbook of Plotner, the defendant, although it may be inferred from the testimony of Kornfeldt that Plotner's passbook did not show the true state of his account because, when the transfer was made to the trust company, Kornfeldt worked all day on that passbook to get it to balance correctly. While it did not show the false entry in relation to the $200, the footings in the passbook probably were false. But the information does not charge that the false entry was made in his passbook.

[5, 6] It was not necessary, in order to come within the meaning of the term "deliver," to place the book permanently beyond the control or demand of the bank, as in case of gift or sale, as involved in some of the above cases. There may be a delivery for the purpose of inspection, or a conditional delivery; yet in any such case there would have to be temporarily a transfer of actual and absolute control of the book. Would the state bank commissioner, his deputy, and the bank examiners, in the examinations of the bank which the law required them to make, possess such control in any degree different from that enjoyed by stockholders and clearing house examiners? Undoubtedly yes. Under section 1080, R. S. 1909, amended Acts 1911, pp. 91, 92, the bank commissioner and subordinates are required to visit and examine every bank and trust company doing business under the laws of this state. They have power to cause proceedings to be instituted against any bank which they find mismanaged, and if they find its continuance in business will seriously jeopardize the safety of its depositors, they are authorized to "close said bank" and take charge of its property and effects (R. S. 1909, § 1081), and may appoint a special agent to take charge, pending the appointment of a receiver. Obviously, in making their examinations, the bank commissioner and examiners have absolute control of the books of the bank; the books must be "delivered" to them for that purpose. They are persons "dealing with the bank." Persons dealing with the bank, also, would include any one who might at any time purchase the bank, or negotiate with the bank for that purpose. Kemper and the trust company would come within that definition.

[7] Now the intention of the defendants in regard to delivery of the book is immaterial. The words "intended to be delivered," used in the statute, refer to the intention of the corporation which owns the book—the purpose for which the book is kept. The criminal must entertain an intention to defraud, but it does not matter against whom the intention would operate. Section 4921, R. S. 1909. Obviously the delivery of, or intention to deliver, the book in which the false entry is made, is no element of the crime, so far as it includes the intent and acts of the defendants. That is merely a description of the conditions under which the crime may be committed—the instrumentalities at hand which the criminal may use in the perpetration of his crime. The entry must be made in that kind of a book.

[8] It is not alleged that the bank intended to deliver the book to any person, or kept it for that purpose. While the proof is sufficient to show the commission of the crime by making a false entry in a book intended to be delivered to persons dealing with the bank, the information is defective in failing to make the necessary allegations concerning that element. For that reason the cause will have to be reversed.

II. It is claimed by the appellant that the crime is not proved, because Plotner directed Kornfeldt not to charge the particular check in question to the account of Toller, and therefore the false entry was made in direct violation of the defendant's direction. Plotner's checks, falsely charged to other accounts, had been coming through since August, and some of them charged to Toller's account. The check which caused the false entry mentioned in the information was drawn September 11th. On cross-examination Kornfeldt said that Plotner had told him to charge the check of September 11th to some account that he had not manipulated before. The reason was, as the witness explained, he had so much money off of other accounts that Plotner told him to pick out an account "that had some money that would stand that." After considering the various accounts to which he might make the charge, the witness said he could not run any chances by taking it off an account that might have a big pay roll at the end of the week and wipe off the balance. Therefore he charged it to Toller's account again, because he knew his account would be good for it.

[9] It will be borne in mind that Plotner in the first instance instructed Kornfeldt how to conceal the shortage by charging it to some one whose account would be good, and Kornfeldt carried out the instruction as best he could. The mere suggestion that he pick out some account that had not been manipulated was general; it did not particularly designate Toller's account as one to avoid, nor imply that Kornfeldt should not use any discretion in the matter. He was conforming to the desire of Plotner when he selected an account which, as Plotner indicated, "would stand it." The conspiracy between the two was clearly and perfectly shown. The general purpose of the conspiracy was to get the money and make false entries to conceal the act. What one conspirator did in carrying out the general purpose was the act of the other, even though they might differ in unimportant details as to how the scheme should be carried through. The particular account to be selected for the purpose of manipulation was necessarily left to the judgment of Kornfeldt.

[10] If two or more persons agree together to commit some crime, and enter upon the commission of the crime, and one of them, in pursuance of the common design and for the purpose of carrying it out, performs some criminal act different from that in contemplation of the parties at the outset, the others will be guilty of the criminal act. The doctrine is fully explained and illustrated in the case of State v. Darling, 216 Mo. 450, loc. cit. 458 to 464, 115 S. W. 1002, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 272, 129 Am. St. Rep. 526. See, also, People v. Friedman, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 55, note.

The point is without merit.

III. Appellant assigns error to the admission of evidence showing numerous other checks besides the one under consideration, all followed by false entries, drawn by the defendant. Other crimes of the same character may be proven for the purpose of showing the intent with which the act charged was done, when the crime is of a character such as is shown in this case. Several late cases fully elucidate the limits of the rule. State v. Hill, 273 Mo. 329, 201 S. W. 58, loc. cit. 60; State v. Cummins, 213 S. W. 969, loc. cit. 974; State v. Patterson, 271 Mo. 99, loc. cit. 110, 196 S. W. 3.

[11] IV. It is claimed by appellant that the case is barred by the statute of limitations. The false entry was made September 14, 1914, and the information on which the trial was had was filed September 26, 1917, more than three years thereafter. An information was filed charging the same offense September 10, 1917, within the three years. The point appellant makes is that the information on which the trial was had is not shown to be an amendment to the first information and bears a different number. However, there appears in the record an order of court to the effect that the state was given leave to file an amended information in case No. 15130, the number in which the first information was filed, and the order recites that by mistake the amended information was given a different number. The court thereupon entered an order correcting the number, so as to show the information upon which the case then being tried was the same case as that in which the first information was filed. Thus the record shows the statute of limitations does not bar the action.

V. Appellant makes the point that no offense was committed, because section 4653 uses the word "entries" in describing the crime, and therefore a single false entry would not be a violation of the law. Section 8053, R. S. 1909, is as follows:

"The Singular Included under the Plural.—Whenever, in any statute, words importing the plural number are used in describing or referring to any matter, parties or persons, any single matter, party or persons shall be deemed to be included, although distributive words may not be used."

Appellant points out that section 4653 as originally enacted contained the singular "entry," and in 1845 was amended making it plural, "entries," and argues that the amendment indicated an intention to change the meaning, and exclude the application of the act to a single entry. Section 8055, R. S. 1909, however, provides that the rules prescribed in section 8053 and section 8054 "shall apply in all cases unless it be otherwise specially provided, or unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction."

[12] That provision excludes the possibility of a construction which would limit the operation of the word "entries," as section 8053 says it shall not be limited. The construction which appellant desires to apply is not "specially provided," nor is there anything in the "subject or context" of section 4653, defining the offense, which is "repugnant to" the construction definitely required by section 8053. Section 8053 was enacted long before, and was the law at the time the amendment of section 4653 in 1845 changed the word "entry" to "entries." The Legislature must be presumed to have made the change with a full understanding of the construction which section 8053 would apply to it.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

REGAN et al. v. ENSLEY. (No. 20821.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 25, 1920.)

1. Homestead §5 — Construction of laws should not extend beyond plain purpose of enactment.

Though homestead laws are construed with great liberality, such construction should not extend beyond the plain purpose of their enactment, as evidenced by the usual and obvious meaning of the words employed, or dispense with the necessity of parties bringing themselves within the spirit and purpose of the laws unaided by judicial construction.

2. Homestead §139—Widow gets conditional life estate.

Under Rev. St. 1909, §§ 6704, 6708, homestead, on death of husband, vests as a conditional life estate in the widow.

3. Homestead §136—Under statute, husband may designate the heirs who will take on death of wife.

Under Rev. St. 1909, §§ 6704, 6708, providing that husband shall not sell, mortgage, or alienate the homestead, but permitting joint alienation, and that it shall descend to widow and children, and on death of wife it shall pass to the heirs of the husband, the husband may provide by will for unconditional life estate in widow, and then to designated heirs, thus cutting off heirs not mentioned; the word "alienate," being restricted by the words "mortgage and sell," and will giving greater estate than statute.

4. Statutes §235 — Mandatory statute not strictly construed if purpose of act is limited.

While a mandatory statute should as a general rule be literally construed and strictly applied, this rule becomes inoperative when its application will limit, if it does not destroy, the purpose of the act being construed.

5. Statutes §194—General words do not amplify particular terms.

General words in a statute do not explain or amplify particular terms preceding them, but are themselves restricted and explained by the particular terms.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Montgomery County; E. S. Gamt, Judge.

Suit for partition by Mary Alice Regan and another against William Ensley. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Claude R. Ball, of Montgomery City, for appellants.

W. C. Hughes, of Montgomery City, for respondent.

WALKER, J. This is a suit to partition certain town lots in New Florence, Montgomery county. Mary Alice Regan and Sarah Anderson, appellants, and William Ensley, respondent, are the children of Solomon and Rebecca Ensley, through whom appellants claim title by descent as tenants in common to the lots in question. A trial in the circuit court resulted in a finding that appellants had no title to the property and that the fee in same was in the respondent. From the judgment rendered thereon, appellants have prosecuted this appeal.

Solomon Ensley died testate in April, 1896, seized in fee of the lots, which at the time he occupied with his wife as a homestead. The pertinent portions of his will are as follows:

"1st. I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Rebecca Ensley, all the real estate and personal property I may have or own at the time of my death to have and to hold and use during her lifetime and at her death all of such real estate to descend to my son, William Ensley, to have and to be held and owned by him in fee simple to use and dispose of as he may see proper.

"2d. I give and bequeath to my two daughters, Sarah Anderson, the wife of Thomas Anderson, and Alice Regan, the wife of Jeff Regan, each the sum of ten dollars to be paid to them out of my personal estate or by my son, William Ensley, and in the event my son, William Ensley, pays to my two said daughters the said sums of ten dollars then and in that event it is my will and desire that my son, William Ensley, shall fall heir to any and own all of my personal estate which may remain in existence at the time of the death of my said beloved wife which has not been disposed of by her for use and support."

Rebecca, relict of Solomon, continued after his death to occupy the premises, not only during her widowhood, but after her marriage to one Austin, and until her death in March, 1917. The authority of the testator to devise the lots which constituted his homestead is the matter at issue. The applicable statute is the amendatory act of the homestead laws (Laws 1895, p. 185) in force at the time of the testator's death (Balance v. Gordon, 247 Mo. loc. cit. 131, 152 S. W. 358). Sections 6704 and 6708, R. S. 1909, are in no material features different from the relevant portions of the act of 1895, which in the first section prescribes the limitations upon the right of the disposal of a homestead as follows:

"Sec. 5435. The homestead of every housekeeper or head of a family, consisting of a dwelling house and appurtenances, and the land used in connection therewith, not exceeding the amount and value herein limited, which is or shall be used by such housekeeper or head of a family as such homestead, shall, together with the rents, issues and products thereof, be exempt from attachment and execution, except as herein provided; such homestead in the country shall not include more than one hundred and sixty acres of land, or exceed the total value of fifteen hundred dollars; and in cities having a population of forty thousand or more, such homestead shall not include more than eighteen square rods of ground, or exceed the total value of three thousand dollars; and in cities having a population of ten thousand and less than forty thousand, such homestead shall not include more than thirty square rods of ground, or exceed the total value of fifteen hundred dollars; and in cities and incorporated towns and villages having a population less than ten thousand, such homestead shall not include more than five acres of ground, or exceed the total value of fifteen hundred dollars. The husband shall be debarred from and incapable of selling, mortgaging, or alienating the homestead in any manner whatever, and every such sale, mortgage or alienation is hereby declared null and void: Provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the husband and wife from jointly conveying, mortgaging, alienating or in any other manner disposing of such homestead, or any part thereof."

And in the second section defines the manner in which such homestead shall pass and vest, as follows:

"Sec. 5439. If any such housekeeper or head of a family shall die, leaving a widow or any minor children, his homestead to the value aforesaid shall pass to and vest in such widow or children, or if there be both, to such widow and children, and shall continue for their benefit without being subject to the payment of the debts of the deceased, unless legally charged thereon in his lifetime, until the youngest child shall attain its legal majority, and until the death of such widow: that is to say, the children shall have the joint right of occupation with the widow until they shall arrive respectively at their majority, and the widow shall have the right to occupy such homestead during her life or widowhood, and upon her death or remarriage it shall pass to the heirs of the husband; and the probate court having jurisdiction of the estate of the deceased housekeeper, or head of a family, shall, when necessary, appoint three commissioners to set out such homestead to the person or persons entitled thereto."

[1] Under these statutes appellants contend that the inhibition therein upon the alienation of a homestead, whether by devise or otherwise, is absolute; and upon the death of the testator a life estate in the property vested in his widow with a vested remainder in the parties hereto, appellants and respondent, which ripened into a fee upon the death of the widow. While homestead laws are purely statutory in their origin, their salutary intent is such as to incline the courts to uniformly construe them with great liberality. Such construction, however, should not extend beyond the plain purpose of their enactment as evidenced by the usual and obvious meaning of the words employed, or dispense with the necessity of parties bringing themselves within the spirit and purpose of the laws unaided by judicial construction. Dalton v. Simpson, 270 Mo. loc. cit. 300, 193 S. W. 546; Keeline v. Sealy, 257

Mo. 498, 165 S. W. 1088; Sperry v. Cook, 247 Mo. 132, 152 S. W. 318; Hines v. Duncan, 79 Ala. 112, 58 Am. Rep. 580; Fred v. Bramen, 97 Minn. 484, 107 N. W. 159, 114 Am. St. Rep. 740; Charless v. Lamberson, 1 Iowa, 435, 63 Am. Dec. 457.

[2, 3] Mindful of these rules, the meaning of the statute as applied to the facts at bar should not be difficult of determination. That the homestead interest upon the death of the husband vests as a conditional life estate in the widow we have repeatedly held. Bushnell v. Loomis, 234 Mo. 371, 137 S. W. 257, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1029; Snodgrass v. Copple, 203 Mo. 480, 101 S. W. 1090; Hufschmidt v. Gross, 112 Mo. 649, 20 S. W. 679; West v. McMullen, 112 Mo. 405, 20 S. W. 628; Rhorer v. Brockhage, 86 Mo. 544. In this far, therefore, no question can arise as to the correctness of appellants' contention. That one of the conditions under the statute on which the widow's estate was terminable, viz. her marriage, need not concern us, as it did not the parties hereto. She continued in the possession and occupancy of the premises thereafter until her death, and if any conclusion is to be drawn as to the character of her tenure after her marriage it is that thenceforth she was holding under the will and not under the statute. In any view of this phase of the facts it cannot affect appellants' title.

A further provision of the statute is that the children of a householder or head of a family shall upon his death use and occupy the homestead jointly with his widow during her tenure and thereafter until each of such children reaches its legal majority. The effect of this statute is to create in said children an estate for years terminable upon each reaching full age as stated. This provision has no application here. Each of the children, the parties to this proceeding, had reached full age at the time of the death of their father, Solomon Ensley. This provision may therefore be dismissed from consideration, except as to the effect its elimination may, as contended by appellants, have upon the determination of their title.

Appellants' contention in this regard is that under the first section of the act (1895) the husband is debarred from alienating the homestead in any manner whatever, and under the second section of the act, there being no minor heirs and the life estate of the widow having terminated with her death, that the fee in said property vested in appellants under the provision that "it shall pass to the heirs of the husband." This conclusion necessitates a literal and mandatory construction of the statute, and it remains to be determined if it is in harmony with the rules of interpretation applicable hereto and as a consequence comports with the spirit and purpose of this character of legislation. We have repeatedly held that the nature of the homestead law is benign, and its purpose the protection of the widow and minor children from the vicissitudes of fortune, when they have been bereft by death of the strong arms and helpful hands of the husband and father. He, therefore, in whose kindly mind this statute had its origin, framed it in comprehensive terms, with a mandatory meaning that its beneficent purpose might not be thwarted and the objects of its tender care thus deprived of its protection.

From the nature of a will, as contradistinguished from a conveyance of real property, Rebecca Ensley cannot be said to have joined therein with her husband in such manner as is contemplated by the statute to render the alienation valid. Section 5435, supra. This portion of the statute must, in our opinion, from its terms, be held to have a more specific reference to conveyances than to wills. So far, however, as it was possible for her to join in the will, she did so. Not that any overt act of hers was necessary at the time of the death of her husband to complete her investiture of title, because the homestead comprised all of the real property of the estate, and did not exceed the value of this interest. Being in possession, she continued therein, and, while her right and title to the property terminated in law upon her remarriage, her peaceful possession continued until severed by death. This attitude, although not determinative, affords persuasive support to the conclusion that, while not joining in the will, which, as we have indicated, was not possible, she at least acquiesced in its provisions in accepting and enjoying the extended tenure if afforded.

We are not, however, and we should not be, limited to persuasive reasoning in determining the propriety of the husband's will. The statute itself and the purpose of its enactment, interpreted in the light of the rules stated, should furnish the safest measure as to its meaning. The husband's alienation by devise in no wise injuriously, but rather beneficially, affected the widow's use and occupancy of the property. She took a life estate coupled with a condition under the statute, and a like estate free from a condition under the will. Her last estate was therefore better than her first.

[4] It being apparent that the disposition of this property by the testator in his will helped rather than hurt the beneficent purpose of the law, we are of the opinion that the inhibition therein in regard to alienation as here exercised has not been violated. While it is true that a mandatory statute should as a general rule be literally construed and strictly applied, this rule becomes inoperative when its application will limit, if it does not destroy, the purpose of the act being construed. There is nothing in our ruling in Rockhey v. Rockhey, 97 Mo. 76, 11 S. W. 225, which militates against this conclusion. We simply held there that a husband could not by a will deprive his widow and minor children of their homestead right in his estate. This is consonant with the purpose of the homestead law, but furnishes no precedent for the determination of the matter at issue. Here there are no minor children, and the widow had no cause of complaint, and made none.

The ruling of this court in Kaes v. Gross, 92 Mo. loc. cit. 659, 3 S. W. 840, 1 Am. St. Rep. 767, to the effect that it is out of the power of a husband to devise the homestead, as much so as by his sole deed to convey or mortgage it, was under a statute (section 2693, R. S. 1879) which excepted a homestead out of the law relating to devises. This exception was eliminated by the amendment of section 2693 in 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 186). Moreover, the above conclusion, reached in the Kaes-Gross Case, was in Greer v. Major, 114 Mo. loc. cit. 155, 21 S. W. 481, declared to be obiter and expressly overruled.

All that was decided in Schorr v. Etling, 124 Mo. loc. cit. 46, 27 S. W. 395, and cases cited, pertinent to the matter at bar, was that a widow cannot by the will of her husband be deprived of rights secured to her under the law of 1875, and that the homestead passes to the widow by operation of law, and is expressly excepted from the operation of the will of her husband. This ruling, as stated in reference to the Kaes-Gross Case, was under the law of 1875, and has since been eliminated from the statute by repeal. These cases, therefore, are fallen timber so far as concerns the matter here seeking solution.

A further ruling is made in the Schorr-Etling Case as to the homestead law of 1865 concerning the widow's right of election, which is not relevant in the determination of the instant case; nor is anything in Ball v. Ball, 165 Mo. 312, 65 S. W. 552, which construed a will under the law of 1865, or in Armor v. Lewis, 252 Mo. 568, 161 S. W. 251, construing the homestead law of 1895, decisive of the question here demanding solution. The foregoing are all of the cases cited by appellants in support of their contention. It is apparent that they fall short of accomplishing this purpose.

[5] There is no dearth of technical reasons, based purely upon the canons of construction, to sustain the conclusion we have reached herein. The language of that portion of the statute (section 5435, supra) under discussion is as follows:

"The husband shall be debarred from and incapable of selling, mortgaging, or alienating the homestead in any manner whatever," etc.

A rule of construction provides that, where general words follow particular words, the former will be construed as applicable only to persons or things of the same nature or class as the latter; or, as we have stated it:

"General words do not explain or amplify particular terms preceding them, but are themselves restricted and explained by the particular terms." State ex rel. Pike County v. Gordon, 268 Mo. 321, 188 S. W. 88.

In the application of this rule to the statute quoted, the meaning of the general word "alienation" may properly be restricted to that embodied in the particular words "selling" and "mortgaging." A like construction may be given to that portion of the proviso of the same section that—

"nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the husband and wife from jointly conveying, mortgaging, alienating or in any other manner disposing of such homestead or any part thereof."

As we have shown, there could not well be a joint alienation by devise and the framers of the law evidently did not so intend. The reasonable construction of this proviso, therefore, is that such a joint alienation was authorized as is expressed by the words "conveying or mortgaging," and that the word "alienating" should be restricted in its meaning to that given to the preceding words, while the words "or in any manner disposing" may be construed as supplementary. Thus interpreted, the husband's power of alienation by devise is not prohibited by the statute. In the application of this rule the purpose of the homestead law is not to be lost sight of. This necessitates a modification of the foregoing rule of construction, which, while not prohibiting alienation by devise, limits the exercise of same to cases where the rights of the widow and minor children are not thereby affected.

Our rulings in Ball v. Ball, supra, and in Wetzel v. Hecht (not yet [officially] reported) 220 S. W. 888, while not precedents decisive of the instant case, on account of a difference in the issues, nevertheless recognize the right of the husband to alienate the homestead by devise, where the spirit and purpose of the law is not thereby violated. Of such is the instant case.

The right of alienation having been established under the facts at bar, the ruling of the trial court was not error, and its judgment should be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

All concur.

STATE v. ANGLIN. (No. 21943.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 25, 1920.)

1. False pretenses ⚡17—Larceny ⚡14(3)
—Obtaining money by matching coins held false pretense, and not larceny.

Defendant in obtaining the money of the prosecuting witness by matching coins and betting on the result was guilty of the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses, and not of the crime of grand larceny.

2. Larceny ⚡23—Defendant who fled with ring handed him as collateral security for payment of gambling debt held guilty of grand larceny.

Where prosecuting witness handed defendant, a stranger with whom he was matching coins and betting on the result, his diamond ring, worth $700, to hold as collateral security for the payment of $200 he had lost to defendant, and where defendant, having obtained possession of ring, fled with it, he was guilty of grand larceny.

3. Criminal law ⚡1172(7)—Instruction placing burden greater than that required by law on the state not reversible error.

In prosecution for grand larceny of money and a ring, where under the evidence the taking of the money constituted merely the offense of obtaining money under false pretenses, and not the offense of larceny, the giving of an instruction requiring state to prove the taking of both money and ring held not reversible error, being favorable and not prejudicial to defendant in that it imposed too great a burden on state.

4. Criminal law ⚡1162—No reversal except for prejudicial error.

The Supreme Court is authorized to reverse a conviction only for prejudicial error.

5. Criminal law ⚡775(3)—Instruction on issue of alibi held sufficient.

In grand larceny prosecution, where defense was an alibi, instruction to acquit defendant if jury had a reasonable doubt as to defendant's presence at the time and place where the crime was committed held sufficient on the question of alibi without a specific instruction that an alibi was a legitimate defense.

6. Larceny ⚡68(1)—Evidence held sufficient for submission to jury.

In grand larceny prosecution, evidence held sufficient for submission of the case to the jury.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Wilson A. Taylor, Judge.

Thomas Anglin was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant, Thomas Anglin, having been convicted of grand larceny upon an indictment in the circuit court of St. Louis county, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of five years, has duly appealed. The indictment, omitting the formal portions, alleges that defendant and another, "at the city of St. Louis aforesaid, $100, lawful money of the United States of the value of $100, and one diamond ring of the value of $700, all of the value of $800, of the money, goods, chattels, and personal property of William J. McCoshen, then and there feloniously did steal, take and carry away, with the felonious intent then and there to permanently deprive the owner of the use thereof, and to convert the same to their own use."

The evidence, so far as it is necessary to set it out, was substantially as follows: The prosecuting witness, a stranger in St. Louis, became engaged in conversation with the defendant, who was a stranger to him. In the course of a few minutes a third person appeared, one Kelly, who was also ostensibly a stranger to both the other two, and shortly thereafter the three were engaged in matching coins and betting on the result. The prosecuting witness speedily lost $100 in cash, which he paid, and also lost the additional sum of $200, which he was unable to pay. Thereupon, at the suggestion of defendant, the prosecuting witness handed defendant a diamond ring of the value of $700, to hold as collateral security for the payment of the $200 which remained unpaid. Having obtained the diamond ring, the defendant fled. The prosecuting witness reported his loss, and two days thereafter the defendant was arrested by the police and identified by the prosecuting witness. This is the substance of the evidence for the state. At the conclusion of the state's evidence, the defendant asked a peremptory instruction, which was refused.

The defense was an alibi. The defendant's wife, another woman, and the defendant himself testified that at the time when the alleged larceny occurred the defendant was in his own home in the city of St. Louis, far away from the place where the larceny occurred.

Complaint is made of instructions numbered 1 and 2 given in behalf of the state, which were as follows:

"(1) If you find from the evidence that at the city of St. Louis and state of Missouri, at any time within three years next before the finding of the indictment herein, the defendant, either alone or acting jointly with another person, did wrongfully take and carry away $100 lawful money of the United States and one diamond ring from the possession of William J. McCoshen with intent to fraudulently and feloniously convert the same to his own use and permanently deprive the owner thereof without his consent, and that the same was the property of William J. McCoshen and of the value of $30 or more, you will find the defendant guilty of grand larceny and assess his punishment at imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than two years nor more than five years. Unless you find the facts to be as stated above, you will acquit the defendant."

"(2) If you have a reasonable doubt of the presence of the defendant at the time and place where the crime was committed, if you believe and find any crime was committed, you will give defendant the benefit of such doubt and acquit him."

Thomas J. Rowe, Jr., and Henry Rowe, both of St. Louis, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and J. W. Broadus, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WILLIAMSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). It will be noticed that the indictment charged the appellant with having stolen $100 in money "and one diamond ring." Instruction No. 1 required the jury to find that appellant "did wrongfully take and carry away $100 lawful money of the United States and one diamond ring." It is urged upon our attention that this instruction is fatally erroneous. Learned counsel for appellant, however, seems to mistake the effect of this instruction; for he says that it "authorizes the jury to convict defendant of the offense of grand larceny if they find that he stole, took and carried away either the currency or the diamond ring." A reading of the instruction discloses the error of this statement. The jury was required by the instruction to find the defendant guilty only in the event that it found that he stole both the currency and the ring. In State v. Anderson, 186 Mo. 25, loc. cit. 38, 84 S. W. 946, 950, this court quoted with approval from Loomis v. People, 67 N. Y. loc. cit. 327, 23 Am. Rep. 123, as follows:

"While the element of trespass is wanting and the offense is not larceny, where consent is given, and the owner intended to part with his property absolutely, and not merely with a temporary possession of the same, even although such consent was procured by fraud, and the person obtaining it had an animus furandi, yet, as is well said by a writer upon criminal law: 'It is different where, with the animus furandi, a person obtains consent to his temporary possession of property, and then converts it to his own use. The act goes farther than the consent, and may be fairly said to be against it. Consent to deliver the temporary possession is not consent to deliver the property in a thing, and if a person, animus furandi, avail himself of a temporary possession for a specific purpose, obtained by consent to convert the property in the thing to himself and defraud the owner thereof, he certainly has not the consent of the owner. He is therefore acting against the will of the owner, and is a trespasser, because a trespass upon the property of another is only doing some act upon that property against the will of the owner.'" * * *

"There is, to be sure, a narrow margin between a case of larceny and one where the property has been obtained by false pretenses. The distinction is a very nice one, but still very important. The character of the crime depends upon the intention of the parties, and that intention determines the nature of the offense. In the former case, where by fraud, conspiracy, or artifice the possession is obtained with a felonious design, and the title still remains in the owner, larceny is established. While in the latter, where title, as well as possession, is absolutely parted with, the crime is false pretenses.' To the same effect is People v. Morse, 80 N. Y. 662."

[1-4] The doctrine of this case was approved also in the case of State v. Buck, 186

Mo. 15, loc. cit. 21, 84 S. W. 951. Applying the doctrine of these cases to the case at bar, it is apparent that in taking the currency the defendant was guilty only of the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses, but that in taking the ring he was guilty of the crime of grand larceny. The question then presents itself whether or not the giving of the instruction above quoted constitutes reversible error in this case. If under the facts and circumstances shown in this record the giving of this instruction was prejudicial to the rights of the appellant, then it was reversible error to give it, but was this error prejudicial to the appellant? The effect of the instruction was simply to impose upon the state a greater burden than that which the law imposed upon it. Otherwise stated, the jury was required to find more under the instruction than it was required to find under the law in order to convict the appellant. We do not perceive, and appellant's able and ingenious counsel has not pointed out, how the imposition of this greater burden upon the state could possibly have been injurious to the rights of the accused. It is only for prejudicial error that we are authorized to reverse a conviction. The doctrine, as most favorably stated in behalf of the accused, is found in State v. Brown, 188 Mo. 451, loc. cit. 464, 87 S. W. 519, 523, as follows:

"Whenever error is committed in the trial of a criminal cause presumptively it is prejudicial, and unless it is made manifest by the disclosures of the entire record that such error could not have reasonably resulted in any harm to the defendant, it will be so treated by the appellate court."

Had the instruction authorized the jury, as counsel for appellant contends that it did, to find the accused guilty if the jury believed that he had stolen either the currency or the ring, this cause would have to be reversed, but, as we have shown, the instruction contains no such language.

We think that it is manifest upon the face of this record that no harm could reasonably have resulted to the appellant in this instance, and we therefore conclude that there is no merit in this assignment of error.

[5] II. Appellant next assigns as error the giving of instruction No. 2, upon the question of alibi. The specific complaint made is that this instruction failed to inform the jury that an alibi is a legitimate defense. Appellant cites in support of this statement the case of State v. McGinnis, 158 Mo. 105, 59 S. W. 83. It is true that in the case cited the instruction there given did inform the jury that such a defense "is as proper and legitimate, if proved, as any other." That instruction was justly criticized because of the insertion of the words "if proved." But not in that case, nor in any other within our knowledge, was it held necessary to instruct the jury in so many words that an alibi is a legitimate defense. The instruction here complained of has been, in effect, approved in numerous cases. Such an instruction, in almost identical language, was given in the case of State v. Bonner, 259 Mo. 342, loc. cit. 348, 168 S. W. 591, and was expressly approved. An instruction to the same effect was approved in the case of State v. Shelton, 223 Mo. 118, loc. cit. 187, 122 S. W. 732, and substantially the same instruction was approved in State v. Brown, 247 Mo. 715, loc. cit. 728, 153 S. W. 1027. In the last-named case the general doctrine was thus stated:

"The principle to be deduced from the foregoing cases and many others is that the purpose of an instruction in regard to an alibi where that defense is interposed is that the jury may be told in plain terms that if upon a full consideration of all the evidence in the cause they entertain a reasonable doubt of the presence of the defendant at the time and place of the alleged commission of the offense, they should acquit him." State v. Brown, 247 Mo. 715, loc. cit. 728, 153 S. W. 1027, 1031.

We think the instruction in the case in hand is not subject to criticism.

[8] The evidence was unquestionably sufficient to carry the case to the jury, and that being true, the request for a peremptory instruction was properly refused.

The judgment of the trial court should be and is affirmed.

All concur.

CAMPBELL v. AETNA LIFE INS. CO. OF HARTFORD, CONN. (No. 21119.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2, June 4, 1929.)

1. Insurance ⇐147(2)—Contract governed by law of state where policy delivered.

A contract of accident insurance is governed by the laws of the state of the insured's residence, where the policy was issued and delivered in that state.

2. Insurance ⇐646(6)—Burden on plaintiff to show death was result of accident independent of other causes.

Where a policy insured against injury resulting solely from external violent and accidental means, the beneficiary, to recover, the contract being governed by the laws of California, has the burden of proving the incident claimed to be the cause of an internal rupture of insured, that it was accidental, and that the accidental injury caused death independent of other causes.

3. Courts ⇐108 — Later decisions of foreign state may be considered.

Where decisions of a foreign state were introduced in evidence as showing the law in that jurisdiction, later decisions, though not offered in evidence, may be considered in construing them.

4. Insurance §466—Rupture due to accident and cancer not result solely of accident "Independently of all other causes."

Where a policy governed by the California laws insured against loss resulting directly and independently of all other causes from bodily injuries effected solely by accidental means, death resulting from rupture caused by accidental strain is not "independently of all other causes," where a cancerous growth was ruptured and but for such growth the injury could not have occurred.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Independently of All Other Causes.]

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Kent K. Koerner, Judge.

Action by Anna Campbell against the Aetna Life Insurance Company of Hartford, Connecticut, a corporation. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bryan, Williams & Cave, of St. Louis, for appellant.

Jones, Hocker, Sullivan & Angert, of St. Louis, for respondent.

WHITE, C. This suit is brought to collect insurance on the life of plaintiff's deceased husband, Joseph C. Campbell. The petition filed in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis is in two counts, each based upon an accident policy which contains the usual stipulation in accident policies, as follows:

"Against loss, as herein defined, resulting directly and independently of all other causes from bodily injuries effected solely through external, violent, and accidental means, suicide (sane or insane) not included."

The answer in each count contains a general denial, and for a further defense alleges that Joseph C. Campbell was, at the time of the issuance and execution of each of the policies mentioned in the petition, a citizen of the state of California, and continued so at all times until his death; and that each of the policies mentioned in the petition became operative and in force in California and every premium was paid in California; that there was in force in the state of California the following statute (Pol. Code, § 4468):

"Common Law, When Rule of Decision.—The common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, or the Constitution or laws of this state, is the rule of decision in all the courts of this state."

The answer then proceeds:

"And that at the time of the death of the said Joseph C. Campbell he was afflicted with cirrhosis of the liver, cancer of the liver, and a cancerous tumor of the liver; that the immediate cause of his death was hemorrhage resulting from a rupture of said cancerous tumor; that if the insured suffered any accidental occurrence which contributed to cause said rupture (which the defendant denies), nevertheless said cirrhosis, cancer, and cancerous tumor also directly contributed thereto."

The allegation follows that under the law of California the manner of the insured's death was not accidental, within the meaning of the policies.

Campbell died at San Francisco, July 1, 1915, at the age of 63 years. He was a lawyer with a large practice. On June 4th, preceding his death, his son Robert Campbell arrived from Chicago on a visit to San Francisco. Saturday, June 5th, Joseph Campbell and his son played golf in the forenoon. The insured played hard; he was a strenuous player and strenuous in everything he undertook; he strained hard in making his strokes, was awkward about it—an inexperienced player. On Sunday forenoon, June 6th, Campbell and his son again played golf, 18 holes. After they had played to about the middle of the second 9, Campbell's ball lodged in a bunker toward the top. He took his mashie and stepped up to the side of the bunker to make a stroke and was thrown off his balance by catching his foot in something so that he almost fell, but by a violent effort recovered his balance and continued the game. After the game he took the usual shower and went home with his son, without making any complaint. The next morning, Monday, June 7th, he went to his office as usual, still making no complaint. The son returned Monday afternoon and found his father at home lying on a settee. A doctor was called. Campbell complained of distention of the stomach; for three or four days he was in bed and lounged around the house. On Wednesday, June 9th, his abdomen became very much distended; his physician introduced a cannula in the lower part of his abdomen and drew off 8 quarts of fluid, 15 per cent. blood. This operation was repeated three or four times, until about 40 quarts of fluid were drawn off. Campbell continued to grow weaker from day to day, and finally died July 1st. An autopsy showed that his aorta and arterial circulatory system was diseased, but not seriously; his pancreas was shrunken and atrophied; the spleen considerably enlarged, twice its normal size; his liver was contracted to one-half or three-fourths its normal size; there was cirrhosis of the liver, and on the right lobe was a tumor about four inches in its greatest diameter; it is described as a primary carcinoma, cancer of the liver, a malignant tumor. This tumor showed necrosis; on it was a nodule projecting sufficiently to cause friction against the adjacent parts of the body in case of movement; a piece of this projecting nodule was broken off, and that rupture, in the opinion of the physicians, caused insured to bleed to death. No other disturbance or condition of the internal organs was apparent to account for the hemorrhages.

The defendant introduced in evidence two California decisions: Rock v. Travelers' Insurance Co., 172 Cal. 462-468, 156 Pac. 1029, L. R. A. 1916E, 1196; Price v. Insurance Co., 169 Cal. 800-803, 147 Pac. 1175. The plaintiff in rebuttal offered a number of California decisions. Upon this evidence the court instructed the jury that under the law of the state of California, as applied to the case, plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and directed a verdict for the defendant. The verdict was accordingly returned and judgment rendered for the defendant, from which the plaintiff appealed to this court.

[1] I. The policies having been issued and delivered in the state of California, of which state the insured was a resident at all times, the law of California must be applied in the construction of the contracts.

Three principal propositions are formulated by the respondent, claiming either to be sufficient to defeat recovery: First, that there is no sufficient proof that the rupture and consequent hemorrhage which caused death was the result of the strain in the golf game when the deceased attempted to get his ball off the bunker. Second, the rupture, if caused by the exertion at that time, was not through "accidental means;" and, under the law of California as shown by the decisions introduced in evidence, the exertion which produced the rupture, if it was so produced, was an intended act and not an accidental one within the meaning of the policy. Third, under the law of California there is no liability on the part of the insured against accidents where pre-existing disease contributes to or co-operates with an accidental injury to produce the injury. In this case a cancer of the liver was a pre-existing disease and a contributing cause; therefore the death was not "effected solely" through the accident.

[2] Under the law of California there is no doubt that the burden was on the plaintiff to prove the death was caused by: (a) The incident in the bunker; (b) that the movement, effort, or strain of the deceased which caused the rupture was not intentional but accidental; and (c) that this accidental injury resulted in death "directly and independently of all other causes," as that phrase is understood and construed by the California court. If the plaintiff has failed to establish either one of the above propositions the demurrer to the evidence was properly sustained. Without determining, we may say it seems that the first two were sufficiently established; that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury tending to show the rupture and hemorrhage were caused by the strain on the golf links, and that the exertion of the deceased to recover his balance was accidental and not an intentional movement.

[3, 4] II. It remains, then, to inquire whether the death was produced by that accident "independently of all other causes." That the rupture was the immediate cause of the insured's death, there is no doubt, and that the rupture would not have occurred but for the existence of the cancerous tumor is equally certain.

Under the Missouri decisions, if the rulings in Missouri should be applied, there is no doubt but the evidence was sufficient to submit that issue to the jury. Fetter v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 174 Mo. 256, loc. cit. 267, 73 S. W. 592, 61 L. R. A. 459, 97 Am. St. Rep. 560; Belle v. Protective Association of America, 155 Mo. App. 629, loc. cit. 646, 135 S. W. 497; Young v. Railway Mail Ass'n, 126 Mo. App. 325, 103 S. W. 557.

It was said in the Belle Case:

"The fact that the physical infirmity of the victim may be a necessary condition to the result does not deprive the injury of its distinction as the sole producing cause."

Accident insurance, so far as the record in this case shows, is issued without regard or inquiry as to the physical condition of the insured, whether it is one which makes him more susceptible to a certain class of accidents than ordinary or not. An accident policy is issued to a one-legged man the same as to one who has two legs, although he may be likely to receive injury from some kinds of accidents which a two-legged man would not so easily incur. It is not shown that knowledge by the insurer of the existence of a cancerous liver would have prevented the issuance of the policies, although that condition necessarily made insured more susceptible to certain kinds of accidental injury; for instance, the injury which he actually received. The accident which thereafter produced his death is exactly what the contract insures against, whatever the condition of the insured may have been which made the injury possible. Such is the Missouri rule. The Missouri rule is mentioned here because cited and disapproved by the California courts.

Since the law of California must apply to the case, it is necessary to ascertain just what the common-law rule in California is in construing contracts of this character. In the case of Price v. Occidental Life Ins. Co., introduced in evidence by the defendant, the court said (169 Cal. 802, 147 Pac. 1175):

"In order to recover, the plaintiff was bound to allege and prove an injury of the kind covered by the contract."

And in the case of Rock v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 172 Cal. loc. cit. 466, 156 Pac. 1030, L. R. A. 1916E, 1196, the court makes the following statement as the approved rule in that state:

"We shall not take the time to review in detail the facts of the cases which we have cited. It will suffice to say, by way of illustration, that among them are decisions holding that death was not the result of bodily injury sustained through accidental means where an insured who was afflicted with tuberculosis died from a hemorrhage occasioned by a ruptured artery, the rupture of the artery being due to the act of the insured in standing on a chair and reaching out to close the shutter of a window (Feder v. Iowa State, etc., Ass'n, 107 Iowa, 538 [70 Am. St. Rep. 212, 43 L. R. A. 698, 78 N. W. 252]), or where the insured, convalescing from an attack of pneumonia, arose, and in attempting to remove his nightshirt made a more or less violent effort, which caused the rupture of a blood vessel resulting in his death (Smouse v. Iowa State, etc., Ass'n, supra), or where the insured died of appendicitis, caused, as the evidence tended to show, by his riding a bicycle over a rough road (Appel v. Etna Life Ins. Co., 86 App. Div. 83 [83 N. Y. Supp. 238]), or where the insured went to Colorado Springs and ascended the stairs of a hotel, carrying in each hand a traveling bag, his death resulting from paralysis of the heart caused by the high altitude and the strain of his exertions (Schmid v. Indiana, etc., Ass'n, 42 Ind. App. 483, 85 N. E. 1032)."

In this connection the court cites some Missouri cases, including the Belle Case, supra, and distinctly repudiates the Missouri doctrine.

It may be said that the Price Case and the Rock Case, introduced in evidence, turn upon the question as to whether the death of insured was through "accidental means" and not in construing the phrase "independently of all other causes." Nevertheless the statement quoted from the Rock Case shows the general principle announced by that court as applied to the latter proposition.

The court in the Price Case cites with approval the case of National Masonic Acc. Ass'n v. Shryock, 73 Fed. 774, 20 C. C. A. 3, in support of the position taken, so that the Shryock Case must be understood as expressing the proper rule to be followed by the courts of California, where the opinion says (73 Fed. loc. cit. 775, 776, 20 C. C. A. 5):

"The burden of proof was upon the defendant in error to establish the facts that William B. Shryock sustained an accident, and that that accident was the sole cause of his death, independently of all other causes. If Shryock suffered such an accident, and his death was caused by that alone, the association agreed by this certificate to pay the promised indemnity. But if he was affected with a disease or bodily infirmity which caused his death, the association was not liable under this certificate, whether he also suffered an accident or not. If he sustained an accident, but at the time it occurred he was suffering from a pre-existing disease or bodily infirmity, and if the accident would not have caused his death if he had not been affected with the disease or infirmity, but he died because the accident aggravated the effects of the disease, or the disease aggravated the effects of the accident, the express contract was that the association should not be liable for the amount of this insurance. The death in such a case would not be the result of the accident alone, but it would be caused partly by the disease and partly by the accident, and the contract exempted the association from liability therefor."

The Price Case and the Rock Case have been cited and construed by later decisions of the California Supreme Court. In Kellner v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 181 Pac. 61, loc. cit. 62, the court holds, citing the Rock and Price Cases, that the burden is on the plaintiff to prove that the injury and the death were caused by an accident independently of any disease or diseased condition. Kellner, the insured, had had an operation for appendicitis and two subsequent operations for hernia. He tripped on a rug in his office and fell, producing strangulated hernia, from which he died in a short time. One physician testified that the fall forced a large part of the intestine through the weak spot in the abdominal wall, so as to become strangulated and cause his death; another physician testified that there must have been a hernia sac existing before the time of the accident; that the fall alone could not have produced the result at the time. That issue was submitted to the jury on that evidence, and the jury found for the defendant. The judgment was affirmed.

An instruction was asked by plaintiff to the effect that—

If the jury "believed the fall was the 'sole and only direct cause' of Mr. Kellner's death, they must find for the plaintiff, notwithstanding a further belief that in previous years deceased may have had a reducible hernia, provided they further find that 'said Ernest F. Kellner would not have died at the time, under the circumstances, and in the manner he did die had it not been for said accident and fall.'" Loc. cit. 62.

This instruction, the court held, did not properly declare the law, and said:

"The last part of the offered instruction would ignore this part of the contract and make the criterion of recovery the shortening by the accident of the life of a person assured without any reference to the possible concurrence of disease in producing death. The court correctly instructed the jury that there could be no recovery under the policy for death caused partly by disease and partly by accidental injury."

The Supreme Court of California also, in the case of Clarke v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co., 179 Pac. 195, passed upon this same question. In that case Clarke, the insured, while crossing a street was struck by an automobile and incurred severe concussion of the brain. He was later operated upon for appendicitis and died in about a month. The immediate cause of his death was a disease of the heart, acute myocarditis. There was a verdict for the plaintiff and the judgment was affirmed, but the court, in considering the law of the case, said (loc. cit. 196):

"The court instructed the jury that if disease plays a part in the death of an assured person after an accident, it is essential to recovery that such disease was due to the accident."

This was held to be a correct instruction. And further the jury were instructed:

"If you shall find that the death was caused in part by the heart disease, and that this heart disease was not in fact caused by this accident, your verdict must be for the defendant."

And this was held to state the rule correctly. There was evidence by physicians to the effect that the heart disease was due to the lowered resistance caused by the concussion of the brain; that is, it was caused directly by the accident. In further commenting upon it, after citing a federal case (Maryland Casualty Co. v. Morrow, 213 Fed. 599, 130 C. C. A. 179, 52 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1213), the court said (loc. cit. 197):

"In that case the jurors were told, in effect, that although death might have resulted from two concurring causes—one being the injury and the other being pre-existing diabetes—the plaintiff would nevertheless be entitled to recover. This was very properly held to be error. But in the present case the theory of the plaintiff, supported by testimony which the jurors are entitled to accept, was that no heart disease existed before the accident, and that both the appendicitis and the myocarditis were results of the injury itself."

The court further said, on page 198:

"Undoubtedly, death from any independent cause, whether existing prior to or supervening at a time subsequent to the accident, would defeat the claim of plaintiff, but the instruction was dealing with one phase of the problem, namely, the existence or nonexistence of disease prior to the accident."

Appellant objects to a consideration of the decision in the Kellner Case and the Clarke Case, because they were not introduced in evidence, and would have us reverse the judgment and remand the case for trial, so that the defendant upon another trial could introduce them in evidence when the court would again have to direct a non-sult. While it may be said that the Price Case and the Rock Case are not as clear as they might be in expressing the rule subsequently stated by the California Supreme Court, still by reference to the federal case cited and approved the rule may be very well ascertained from those cases. This court has a right to consider the later decisions of the California Supreme Court in construing the cases which were offered in evidence.

In each of those later cases the issues were submitted to a jury because there was a conflict of evidence as to whether the pre-existing disease contributed to the death and whether in fact there was a pre-existing disease. In the present case there is no question of the existence of the malignant tumor growing on the liver of Campbell at the time of the accident. It is not contended that the fatal rupture, without the existence of the tumor, could have been caused by a strain of the kind mentioned in the evidence. In other words, it is undisputed that Campbell would not have met his death by the hemorrhage and there would have been no hemorrhage if the cancer had not been there, just as in the Kellner Case there would have been no injury but for the existence of the hernia, as the jury found. The only difference between the two cases is that the evidence was conflicting as to whether the hernia existed before the accident or was produced by it in the Kellner Case; whereas, in this case, it is undisputed that the cancer existed before the accident. If it had been conceded in the Kellner Case that there was hernia and a protruding intestine at the time he stumbled upon the carpet, although death was immediately produced by the accident, there would have been nothing to submit to the jury. In the Clarke Case the issue was submitted to the jury because there was evidence pro and con as to whether the heart disease from which death ensued was caused by the accident and concussion of the brain or whether it existed before and was simply aggravated by that accident. Under the California rule it is clear that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

The judgment is affirmed.

STATE ex rel. NORTH KANSAS CITY DEVELOPMENT CO. v. ELLISON et al.,
Judges. (No. 21571.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1,
June 2, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ¶302(4)—Motion for new trial for error in refusing instructions held sufficient for review.

A motion for new trial on the ground that the court erred in refusing instructions requested by defendant is sufficient to warrant review of such refusal.

2. Courts ¶91(1)—Court of Appeals should follow last determination of Supreme Court in banc.

The last determination of the Supreme Court in banc is binding on the various Courts of Appeals, although a division of the Supreme Court may have otherwise ruled.

Certiorari by the State of Missouri, on the relation of the North Kansas City Development Company, to Hon. James Ellison and others, Judges of the Kansas City Court of Appeals, to review a judgment of that tribunal affirming a judgment for plaintiff (209 S. W. 990) in an action by Arch Roy against the North Kansas City Development Company. Record of Court of Appeals quashed.

Kenneth McC. De Weese, of Kansas City, for relator.

Ellis, Cook & Dietrich and Fred W. Lewis, all of Kansas City, for Arch Roy.

GRAVES, J. Certiorari to the Kansas City Court of Appeals, which brings before us the opinion of that court in the case of Arch Roy (Plaintiff) Respondent, v. North Kansas City Development Company (Defendant) Appellant, 209 S. W. 990. That case originated in a justice of the peace court, and was an action for damages growing out of the fact that plaintiff was kicked by a mule owned by defendants. For the purposes of this case the details of that case are immaterial. Suffice it to say that from the court of the justice of the peace it got to the circuit court, and from there on the appeal of the defendant therein to the Kansas City Court of Appeals, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed in an opinion filed, which opinion is now before us on the charge that it conflicts with our rulings.

[1, 2] At the trial in the circuit court certain instructions asked by defendant were refused, and their refusal urged as error in the Court of Appeals. As to this assignment of error, the Kansas City Court of Appeals said:

"In addition to the foregoing, defendant has complained of the refusal of instructions offered by it. The motion for new trial is not sufficiently specific to permit an examination of such complaint. It reads that 'the court erred in refusing instructions as requested by

See State v. Dinkelkamp, 207 S. W. 770, 771.

It will be noted that the cases cited by the Kansas City Court of Appeals are all cases from Division No. 2 of this court, and they are cited as being "the later rulings of the Supreme Court." The question here involved was determined in Wampler v. Railroad, 269 Mo. 464, 190 S. W. 908, and determined adversely to the ruling of our learned brothers of the Court of Appeals. At the time the instant case was determined the Wampler Case, supra, was the last expression of the Supreme Court, because it was a ruling upon the exact point by the whole court, and not by a mere division thereof. This is made clear in the case of State ex rel. United Rys. Co. v. Reynolds et al., 213 S. W. 782. This is another expression of our court in banc, as was Wampler's Case. This ruling was made the very day that the writ of certiorari was granted in the instant case. It forced the granting of our writ. The same question had been just previously determined in Kilpatrick et al. v. Robert et al., 212 S. W. loc. cit. 886. In that case the ruling in Wampler's Case was specifically approved and followed by all of Division No. 1 of this court. The question is not an open question here, and has not been since the Wampler Case, and the opinion of our learned brothers not only conflicts with Wampler's Case, but with the other two rulings mentioned supra. The result is that the record of the Court of Appeals should be quashed; and it is so ordered.

All concur, except WOODSON, J., absent.

SEDBERRY v. GWYNN. (No. 21709.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1,
June 2, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ¶766—Lack of assignment of error supplied by points and authorities.

An appeal from an order refusing to vacate an order appointing a receiver will not be dismissed because the brief contained no assignment of error, where the points and authorities stated the court was without jurisdiction to appoint a receiver.

2. Receivers ¶6—Breach of contract no ground for appointment of receiver for business.

That defendant, who enjoyed a patent monopoly, broke his contract to sell plaintiff sufficient of the patented articles to fill plaintiff's orders, is no ground for appointing a receiver of defendant's manufacturing business; defendant alone being before the court, and there being no showing of insolvency or other ground which would render execution under Rev. St. 1909, §§ 2122 and 3881, or equitable remedies other than receivership, unavailing.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Victor H. Falkenhainer, Judge.

Action by Hervey H. Sedberry against William Gwynn. From an order refusing to vacate a previous order appointing a receiver to take charge of his business, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

J. D. Johnson, of St. Louis, for appellant.
D'Arcy & Neum and Rippey & Kingsland, all of St. Louis, for respondent.

GRAVES, J. This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, refusing to vacate a previous order appointing a receiver to take charge of defendant's business. The pertinent facts are few. March 15, 1918, the plaintiff filed a petition in said circuit court, in which he prayed:

"Wherefore, plaintiff prays judgment that defendant may be decreed to deliver to plaintiff all apparatus, appliances, and parts that may be ordered by plaintiff under said contract, and to otherwise fully comply with and carry out the terms of said contract; that the defendant be enjoined from selling any of said apparatus, appliances, or parts thereof to any person or persons other than plaintiff, or from disposing of said inventions and patents to any third party, or from otherwise placing it beyond his power to comply with his contract with plaintiff; that defendant be enjoined from enticing away or interfering with or employing plaintiff's salesmen or in any other way interfering with or injuring plaintiff's business; that defendant be ordered to account to plaintiff, as provided in said contract, for all sums to which plaintiff is entitled on sales of said goods made by defendant as above set forth and for all other sums of money which may be due to plaintiff under said contract and for all moneys due to plaintiff which defendant has collected; that plaintiff may recover his costs herein, and for such other and further relief as to this honorable court may seem proper."

By the petition it was charged that the defendant was the owner of certain letters patent from the United States government to use and vend certain vulcanizers, known as the "Gwynn-Bacon vulcanizers"; that plaintiff had a written contract as to the sale of the same with defendant, who was manufacturing them; that defendant had declared that said contract was void, and was threatening to sell his business, including his patent, to another, so that plaintiff could not get from him the vulcanizers to carry on his (plaintiff's) business in the sale thereof; that prior to defendant's cancellation or ignoring of such contract plaintiff had orders for goods which could not be filled by him, but were before filled by defendant with plaintiff's at the conduct of defendant was destroying plaintiff's business, which was dependent upon his contract with defendant.

The answer admitted that defendant was doing business under the name of "Gwynn-Bacon Vulcanizer Company," which was accompanied by specific denials of many things charged in the petition. The answer admitted the execution of the contract pleaded by plaintiff, but averred that certain provisions therein rendered said contract void as one in restraint of trade.

Motion was made to strike out portions of the answer, which was sustained, which is duly preserved in a term bill of exceptions. Reply was a general denial. Such is a very general outline of the case made by the pleadings.

On May 19, 1919, a trial of the issues under the pleadings was had, and the court entered the following decree:

"Now on this day come the plaintiff and the defendant, and this cause being called for hearing upon the issues raised under the pleadings herein as to the right of plaintiff to an injunction against, and an accounting by, defendant, and the evidence of both plaintiff and defendant upon said issues having been introduced and heard by the court, and arguments and briefs of counsel for plaintiff and defendant upon said issues having been heard and considered by the court, and said issues having been fully submitted to the court for adjudication, the court thereupon finds said issues in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant.

"The court further finds the facts to be as follows:

"(1) That plaintiff and defendant are residents and citizens of the city of St. Louis, state of Missouri, and that defendant, William Gwynn, has been since on and before the filing of the petition herein doing business in said city and state under the name and style of Gwynn-Bacon Vulcanizer Company.

"(2) That at all times mentioned in the second amended petition herein said defendant was and is the owner of a certain invention relative to pressure-closed electric switches covered by letters patent of the United States No. 1,015,225, dated January 16, 1912, by virtue of which defendant enjoys the exclusive right to make, use, and vend appliances or apparatus embodying said invention. That said invention was and is an essential feature of commercial appliances known as 'Gwynn-Bacon vulcanizers,' and that said vulcanizers cannot be made, used, or sold without the license or consent of said defendant and cannot be procured upon the open market by reason of the monopoly enjoyed by the defendant by virtue of the ownership by defendant of said invention and letters patent.

"(3) That on November 1, 1918, the defendant, being the owner of the exclusive right to make, use, and vend vulcanizers of the type referred to, as aforesaid, entered into a contract in writing with plaintiff, for a good and sufficient consideration, which contract was and is a lawful, valid, and subsisting contract as to all the terms and conditions thereof between plaintiff and defendant. A copy of said contract is annexed to the original petition herein and marked Exhibit A, and is hereby referred to and made a part of this decree. That in and by said contract defendant agrees, among other things, to sell to plaintiff, at the prices and on the terms specified in said contract, a sufficient number and amount of said vulcanizers, repair parts, and appliances therefor, mentioned in said contract, to fill all orders therefor sent by plaintiff to defendant.

"(4) That said contract further provides that upon receipt of an order for any of the goods covered by said contract the defendant would promptly execute the same by supplying the required goods, either direct to the purchaser or to plaintiff, as the latter might direct. That said goods should be boxed in first-class condition by the defendant and should be free from defects, thoroughly tested before leaving the factory, and should be guaranteed (in the case of vulcanizers) by the defendant for one year from date of purchase. That all goods should be delivered by the defendant to the transportation company in St. Louis at the expense of the defendant; also that the plaintiff in billing said goods to the consumer might bill them under his own name or under the name of any partnership or corporation he might organize, and that he shall have the exclusive right to use, in connection with said billing, the name Gwynn-Bacon vulcanizer, or of any of the other Gwynn-Bacon products covered by said agreement; also that the defendant should promptly forward to the plaintiff an invoice of all goods shipped, whether shipped to the plaintiff direct or to the consumer direct.

"(5) That said contract further provides that all goods shipped by the defendant, either to the customer or to the plaintiff, during any one calendar month, are to be paid for by the plaintiff on the 20th of the succeeding month. That failure of the plaintiff to pay the defendant for any goods within 15 days after the 20th of the month following date of shipment should entitle the defendant to cancel said contract; provided that the defendant should give the plaintiff written notice of said cancellation and the cause thereof within 7 days after the expiration of said 15-day period.

"(6) That said contract further provides that the defendant shall not during the life of said contract sell, or allow any third party to sell, any of the goods covered by said contract to any party or parties other than the plaintiff, and stipulates that it is the intention of said agreement that all sales to customers of the goods of the defendant are to be made by the plaintiff, whether the orders for said goods are secured by the plaintiff himself, or through agents, or by advertising, or whether said orders come to the defendant, either through his efforts or the efforts of others, or come through the mails or otherwise without solicitation, and that defendant shall promptly transmit to the plaintiff all orders for said goods which may come to him during the life of said agreement for such action thereon as the plaintiff may elect to take.

"(7) That said contract further provides that the plaintiff shall purchase from the defendant, at the prices and on the terms specified in said contract, during each year of the life of said contract, at least a minimum quantity of said goods sufficient to make up a total of $5,000 of gross sales of said goods to the customers of plaintiff during such year at the prices named in said contract.

"(8) That said contract further provides that the same should continue in force for one year from its said date, and that if during the first year of said contract the amount of gross sales made by plaintiff should be not less than $10,000, then said contract should be continued during each of the next succeeding four years; provided that during each of said four years the gross amount of sales made by plaintiff to customer should not be less than as follows:

|-------------------------------|-------------|
| Gross sales second year | $15,000.00 |
| Gross sales third year | 20,000.00 |
| Gross sales fourth year | 30,000.00 |
| Gross sales fifth year | 40,000.00 |

"That said contract further provides that after the expiration of five years from its said date it shall continue to remain in force from year to year so long as the gross sales by plaintiff to customers during each year shall be not less than $40,000.

"(9) That said contract further provides that either party shall have the right, at any reasonable time, to inspect and copy the books, papers, and records of the other, whenever such inspection is reasonably necessary or proper to effectuate the objects of said contract.

"(10) That said contract further provides that it shall be binding upon the heirs, representatives, and assigns of both plaintiff and defendant.

"(11) That immediately upon the making of said contract both plaintiff and defendant entered upon the performance thereof, and have so continued until on or about the 11th day of March, 1918, as hereinafter stated.

"(12) That plaintiff invested considerable sums of his own money in the development of said business and has advertised said apparatus, and has established a valuable custom and good will for said goods.

"(13) That the gross sales made by plaintiff of goods covered by said contract, during the first year of the life thereof, amounted to over $40,000. That plaintiff has in that and in all other respects fully complied with all the terms, conditions, and agreements in said contract contained and by him to be performed, and still stands ready and willing to comply with and to carry out the terms of said contract.

"(14) That on or about the 11th day of March, 1918, plaintiff received from defendant a notice in writing, whereby defendant wrongfully and unlawfully and without just cause or excuse notified plaintiff that he (the defendant) refused to comply further with the terms of said contract and that he considered said contract terminated.

"(15) That defendant did wrongfully and unlawfully and without just cause or excuse refuse, on said 11th day of March, 1918, and still refuses, to deliver to plaintiff the apparatus and appliances which defendant contracted to deliver under said contract, and refused and still refuses to comply with or in any manner to be bound by the terms of said contract, although defendant is fully able to perform and carry out said contract.

"(16) That defendant, prior to and since refusing so to deliver the apparatus called for by said contract to plaintiff, in violation of said contract, has secretly employed plaintiff's salesmen and has been and is now, in violation of said contract, selling appliances covered by said contract direct to plaintiff's customers and others, without transmitting said orders to plaintiff or accounting to plaintiff therefor, thereby securing for himself and for his own profit the result and fruits of plaintiff's expenditure of money and labor, which plaintiff was induced to expend by reason of said contract with defendant. That defendant is appropriating to himself and destroying plaintiff's business. That defendant has collected large sums of money on sales made by him of said articles to the customer direct, to which sums plaintiff is entitled, and that defendant now has on hand a large number of unfilled orders for said articles, for all of which defendant has failed and refused and still fails and refuses to account to plaintiff, but, on the contrary, has notified plaintiff as aforesaid that defendant will no longer be bound by the terms of said contract.

"(17) That plaintiff is wholly unable to obtain any of the apparatus, appliances, or parts covered by said contract from any other source except from defendant by reason of the exclusive monopoly enjoyed by the defendant to make, use, or vend said apparatus, appliances, and parts.

"(18) That by reason of plaintiff's inability to obtain said apparatus or appliances from said defendant, and by reason of the other unlawful and wrongful acts of defendant as above set out, plaintiff has suffered great and irreparable damages and injury and will continue to suffer great and irreparable injury and damage, but the exact amount of which it is impossible to state, until an accounting be had between plaintiff and defendant. That plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law. That the ascertainment of said damage to plaintiff requires a complicated accounting.

"Wherefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court as follows:

"(19) That the plaintiff herein be and he is hereby granted the relief prayed for in his second amended petition herein; and

"(20) That the defendant herein be and is enjoined and ordered to sell and deliver to plaintiff and to all parties claiming by, through, or under him, in accordance with the terms of said contract of November 1, 1916, all apparatus, appliances, and parts which he is called upon to sell and deliver to plaintiff under the terms of said contract, and to forthwith fully and completely comply with and carry out all the other terms and conditions of said contract; and

"(21) That the defendant herein, his agents, servants, or any one acting through or under him, either directly or indirectly, be and they are hereby enjoined and prohibited from selling any apparatus, appliances, or parts covered by said contract, or any of defendant's rights in the inventions and patent covering said apparatus, appliances, or parts, to any person or persons other than plaintiff, and from doing any act or acts placing it beyond defendant's power to comply with the said contract, and from in any way interfering with or injuring plaintiff's business carried on in accordance with the terms of said contract; and

"(22) That this cause be referred to Geo. F. Haid, Esq., as referee, for an accounting between plaintiff and defendant, and to hear, determine, and report his findings upon all issues of law and fact connected with said accounting, including in his report a statement of all sales made by defendant subsequent to March 10, 1918, of any of the apparatus, appliances, or parts covered or contemplated by said contract of November 1, 1916, and of all transactions and business of the defendant subsequent to March 10, 1918, relating to or connected with any of said apparatus, appliances, or parts covered by said contract, and showing also all amounts to which plaintiff may be entitled by reason of the violation by defendant of plaintiff's rights under said contract.

"The court retains jurisdiction of this cause pending final judgment herein to be entered subsequent to the filing of the referee's report."

Thereafter, on June 26, 1917, the plaintiff filed his motion for the appointment of a receiver for defendant's business and on June 28th following the same was sustained by the following order:

"Now at this date, the above-named cause coming on for hearing on the application of the plaintiff, duly verified, for an order for the appointment of a receiver herein, come the above-named parties, plaintiff and defendant, by their attorneys of record, and the evidence of plaintiff and defendant having been introduced, and the arguments of counsel heard by the court, and the court, being fully advised in the premises, does find that the facts stated in said application of plaintiff for the appointment of a receiver are true.

"Wherefore, it is by the court ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said application of plaintiff for an appointment of a receiver be and is hereby sustained, and the court appoints Edward E. Rudolph, of the city of St. Louis, as receiver in the above-entitled cause, to take charge of the assets and to operate the business of the defendant, for the manufacture, sale, and disposal of the vulcanizers, repair parts, and materials, covered and contemplated by the contract of November 1, 1916, between plaintiff and defendant, and to carry out and perform the decree of the court entered in this cause on May 19, 1919, and subject to such further orders as the court may hereinafter enter in this cause. Said receiver shall take charge immediately upon filing bond approved by the court in the sum of $5,000."

June 30th defendant filed his motion to vacate such order appointing a receiver, which motion was overruled by the trial court, and it is this order overruling the motion to vacate the order appointing a receiver which is now here for review. The cause was advanced as required by statute, and hence this early hearing thereof. Further details may well be left to the opinion.

I. We have a peculiar situation in this case. It will be noted that the judgment upon the merits of the case is not here. The only thing here is the legal propriety of the appointment of a receiver for defendant's business. The pleadings and judgment (whether such judgment be either final or merely interlocutory) may be, and we think are, competent upon the issues here involved, but the facts which superinduced such judgment under such pleadings are not here for review. It will be time enough to consider them when the case upon the merits reaches us. We have set out the findings of facts in the case upon the merits, but with the sole view of enabling us to determine the question of the propriety of the court in the appointment of the receiver, and for the further reason that such findings of facts are incorporated in and made a part of the interlocutory decree herein. We say interlocutory decree, because the court has appointed a referee, with full power to hear and report upon certain matters before final judgment could be entered. But to our mind it is really immaterial whether the judgment entered (quoted supra) be called an interlocutory or a final judgment. The sole purpose of it, and of the pleadings in this case, is to enable us to properly pass upon the propriety (legal) of a receivership in this case.

[1] The foregoing is suggested because it is urged that the appeal should be dismissed because the appellant has failed to comply with our rule as to assignments of error. In this case there could be but one assignment of error, and that is that the court erred in refusing to sustain the appellant's motion to set aside its order appointing a receiver for appellant's business. There is no formal assignment of error contained in appellant's brief. It goes from a statement of the case to "Points and Authorities," and then under head of "Brief of the Argument" is the printed argument. In other words the brief contains (1) statement of case, (2) points and authorities, and (3) arguments. But under the head of "Points and Authorities" we have these two (with others) specific statements:

"(2) The lower court had no power to appoint a receiver, as it did in this instance, for the purpose of executing the interlocutory decree for specific performance of the contract in suit. See," etc.

"(3) The lower court had no jurisdiction over appellant's property and business empowering it to legally appoint a receiver to take possession and operate the same as provided in said order. See," etc.

Under each of the above are cited cases to which we are referred. Whilst it is better for counsel to make formal assignments of error, we have continuously ruled that where the "Points and Authorities," as here, charged specific error to the trial court, that such would be considered as a compliance with our rule. With this ruling (and our cases are numerous and well known) we are satisfied. This contention of respondent is therefore overruled. Collier v. Lead Co., 208 Mo. loc. cit. 258, 259, 106 S. W. 971; Wallace v. Libby, 231 Mo. loc. cit. 344, 132 S. W. 685; Mugan v. Wheeler, 241 Mo. loc. cit. 379, 145 S. W. 462. These cases cover both Divisions of this court. Of late our Brothers in Division No. 2, have been a little more rigid in the enforcement of rule 15 (198 S. W. vi). Vahldick v. Vahl-

But neither of those cases, in our judgment, go to the extent respondents would have us go in this case. When in this case the record shows that the court did appoint a receiver, and the brief charges (as here) that the court was without power to appoint such, the assignment of error is sufficient. Our rules should be, and, in most instances, have been, liberally construed.

[2] II. As suggested above, we can and do consider the pleadings and judgment upon the merits in determining the legal propriety of the appointment of this receiver. The plaintiff sought and obtained (1) specific performance of his alleged contract, (2) injunctive relief, and (3) an order for an accounting as between the parties; the accounting to be had before a referee of the court. Nowhere in these pleadings is the business of the defendant placed or sought to be placed in the hands of the court, custodia legis. The facts pleaded and the facts found show that defendant had a business of his own, separate and distinct from that of the plaintiff. Defendant was manufacturing a patented article, and plaintiff, under contract, was selling such article for defendant. Plaintiff's contract gave him no control of defendant's business and property. Nor has the judgment so found or decreed. Defendant's business (as a business enterprise) was not before the court, nor in the charge of the court. Nor can it be said that plaintiff's business (as a business enterprise) was before the court, or in the hands of the court. The questions before the court were the three which we have set out above. If the plaintiff has a valid subsisting judgment, either (1) for the specific performance of a contract, or (2) for the stated injunctive relief, he has ample legal remedy for the enforcement of the same under our statutes. Vide sections 2122 and 3881, R. S. 1909. If he should get specific judgment for money upon the incoming of the referee's report, an execution would get full results, absent, as here, any charge of fraud or of insolvency.

This case has a state of facts all its own. Defendant, so far as the record goes, has a thoroughly solvent business, all his own. Personally he may have made a contract which ought to be enforced. And personally he may have threatened things which should have been enjoined. Of these matters our cognizance is limited, in the determination of the one question before us.

The alleged contract (ordered enforced) does not go to defendant's business as a going, solvent business concern, but it only goes to a contract as to the filling of certain orders out of the manufactured stock of this business. The business enterprise of the defendant has never been seized by the strong arm of the law and placed before the court, save and except as it might be through this receiver.

Up to the date of this judgment the business and property of the defendant was not before the court. The defendant was before the court, and its judgment is against defendant, and not against his property. Even the specific performance part of the judgment is personal in character, and does not reach the whole business of defendant, which the receiver is directed to take charge of by the order before us. The powers of a court of equity are very broad as to property involved in the litigation, and a receiver therefor may be appointed for divers reasons, but the rule is just as clear that there should be no receiver appointed for property which is not in litigation and thereby before the court. 23 R. C. L. p. 13.

The manufacturing business of this defendant (as a business and as his property) was not involved in the suit out of which this receivership grows. So that for the two reasons (1) the statutes furnish ample powers for the enforcement of the court's judgment, and (2) the property turned over to the receiver by the order was not involved in the litigation, the court erred in not vacating, upon defendant's motion, the order appointing the receiver.

We shall not discuss the merits of the case, even as they appear before us on the pleadings and judgment. The instant judgment or order should be and is reversed, with directions to the circuit court to vacate its order appointing the receiver. The merits of the case will no doubt reach us in due time.

All concur, except WOODSON, J., absent.

JOHN O'BRIEN BOILER WORKS CO. v.
THIRD NAT. BANK OF ST. LOUIS.
(No. 20795.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2,
June 4, 1920.)

Courts — 231(5)—Supreme Court is without jurisdiction of appeal by board of managers of state hospital, where amount is less than $7,500.

Under Const. art. 6, § 12, limiting the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to cases where the amount is less than $7,500, unless a political subdivision of the state or a state officer is a party, etc., as well as Rev. St. 1909, § 3937, as amended by Laws 1911, p. 190, relating to jurisdiction of Courts of Appeals, etc., the Supreme Court is without jurisdiction of an appeal by the board of managers of a state hospital from a judgment finding that plaintiff was entitled to a cashier's check for $2,800 as against the board; for, in view of Rev. St. 1909, §§ 1366-1408, it is apparent that members of the board are merely appointive administrative officials, so jurisdiction cannot be taken on the theory either that the state hospital is a political subdivision or that the managers are state officers.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Wilson A. Taylor, Judge.

Action by the John O'Brien Boiler Works Company against the Third National Bank of St. Louis, which filed an answer in the nature of an interpleader, and in which action the Board of Managers of State Hospital No. 1 at Fulton, Mo., intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff, the intervener appealed to the St. Louis Court of Appeals, and the cause was transferred to the Supreme Court. Cause transferred to the St. Louis Court of Appeals.

Leahy, Saunders & Barth, of St. Louis, for appellant.

Irwin & Haley, of Jefferson City, for respondent.

WALKER, J. The plaintiff brought suit in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis against the defendant, the Third National Bank of that city, to require the bank to deliver to plaintiff a cashier's check for $2,800 and for an injunction to prevent any other disposition of the check during the pendency of this action.

The board of managers of the State Hospital No. 1 at Fulton moved that it be permitted to intervene as a party defendant and to assert its ownership of the check. The motion was granted. The bank filed an answer, disclaiming any ownership in the check, alleging that it was a stakeholder without pay, and declaring its willingness to deposit the check in the registry of the court and abide any order or judgment of same. An order was made sustaining the prayer of this answer, and the check was impounded by the clerk of the trial court pending the determination of the case. The answer of the board of managers set forth its claim of ownership, on grounds not necessary to be stated here, on account of our view as to the proper disposition of this case, and that it was entitled to a judgment for the possession of said check. The trial court so found, and an appeal was granted to the St. Louis Court of Appeals on the application of the plaintiff. Upon the appeal being perfected, the latter court, on the 17th of July, 1917, made and entered of record an order transferring the case to this court for review and final determination, on the ground that the cause was not within the jurisdiction of said Court of Appeals.

The original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, as defined by the Constitution (section 12, art. 6, Const. Mo.), is limited to cases where the amount in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum of $7,500 (section 3937, R. S. 1909, as amended by Laws 1911, p. 190), to cases involving the construction of the Constitution of the United States or of this state, to cases where the validity of a treaty or a statute of, or authority exercised under, the United States is drawn in question, to cases involving the construction of the revenue laws of this state, or the title of any office under this state, to cases involving title to real estate, to cases where a county or other political subdivision of the state, or any state officer, is a party, and in all cases of felony.

This section must, under a reasonable construction of its terms, furnish the measure of this court's jurisdiction; the greater portion of it, being clearly inapplicable under the facts, may be dismissed from consideration without comment. It cannot be said with any degree of reason that a state hospital is in any sense a political subdivision of the state, nor that its managers are state officers. They are appointive administrative officials, clothed with such limited power, both as to its nature and extent, as is defined under article 6 of chapter 19, R. S. 1909. Moreover, they did not seek and were not granted leave to intervene as individuals, but in their quasi corporate capacity as a board. Thus appearing, a review of the claim made involves no jurisdiction of this court.

The sole question involved is: Who is entitled to the check? The Court of Appeals is clothed with ample power to determine whether or not the finding of the trial court in this regard was correct. The case should therefore be transferred to that tribunal for its final determination.

It is so ordered.

All concur.

STATE v. THOMPSON. (No. 21915.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 25, 1920.)

1. Larceny \S 64(1)—Unexplained possession of recently stolen property prima facie evidence of guilt.

The unexplained possession of recently stolen property is prima facie evidence of guilt.

2. Larceny \S 68(1)—Evidence held for jury.

In larceny trial, evidence of accused's guilt held sufficient to carry the case to the jury.

3. Criminal law \S 1159(2)—Verdict conclusive on appeal.

A jury verdict is conclusive on appeal, when there is substantial evidence to support it.

4. Criminal law \S 784(8)—Instruction on circumstantial evidence held sufficient.

Instruction on the weight to be given circumstantial evidence held sufficient.

5. Criminal law \S 823(4)—Instructions construed together held sufficient as requiring showing that stealing was from the owner.

In trial for larceny of automobile, instructions were not erroneous, in that they did not require the jury to find that the automobile was stolen from the owner, where the first instruction required the jury to find that accused stole the automobile "of the goods and property of" the prosecuting witness, naming him, and the later instruction required the jury to find beyond a reasonable doubt that the property had been stolen; for reiteration of the requirement that the machine should have been stolen from the prosecuting witness would have tended to confuse and not enlighten the jury.

6. Criminal law \S 761(9)—Instruction not error as assuming stealing.

In trial for stealing an automobile, an instruction which twice required the jury to find beyond a reasonable doubt that the property had been stolen was not open to the objection that it assumed that the automobile had been stolen; there being no dispute in the case concerning the state's claim that the property had been stolen.

7. Criminal law \S 787(1) — Instruction held not bad as commenting on accused's failure to testify.

In trial for automobile stealing, a portion of an instruction to the effect that the burden of satisfactorily accounting for his possession of recently stolen property was upon accused was not objectionable as a comment upon his failure to testify upon the point, where accused did, in fact, testify at length upon the question of how he obtained possession of the stolen automobile.

8. Criminal law \S 829(1)—Instructions need not be duplicated.

There was no error in refusing instructions in a larceny case, where they all related to questions upon which proper instructions had already been given; for duplication of instructions is not required.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; E. E. Porterfield, Judge.

Don Thompson was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant was convicted of grand larceny upon the following evidence:

A practically new Ford car, sedan type, was left upon the street in the downtown section of Kansas City at about noon. At about half past 3 o'clock that afternoon it had disappeared. Five days later the body of the car was found at a storage house in Kansas City, where defendant, under the name by which he was prosecuted, had stored it on the second day after the car was stolen. The motor number had been filed off and a new number had been substituted. When defendant stored the body of the car he took the chassis away with him. The bolts which fastened the body to the chassis had been cut when defendant took the car to the storage house. Some employes helped him to lift the body off of the chassis, and while doing so one of the employes raised the hood in order to look at the motor number, whereupon defendant, with an oath, demanded to know what the employe was about. After the body of the car had been found the defendant was arrested and questioned as to what had become of the chassis. He stated that he had bought the body only. At the time of his arrest he was in possession of a new car of a different manufacture. This car he said he had bought of a sales agent at Independence, Mo. Inquiry revealed that defendant had in fact taken the chassis of the stolen car to Independence and had traded it for the new car, paying the difference in cash. When confronted with this evidence defendant said to the chief of police, "It looks like you have got it on me." Both portions of the stolen car were identified by the owner, and the value was shown to be about $700. This is the material evidence, in chief, for the state.

Defendant testified that he bought the stolen car from one Carpenter on the day after it disappeared from where the owner had left it on the street; that he paid $650, in cash, for it; that the money was furnished, also in cash, by his sister-in-law; that he took an unacknowledged bill of sale for it, which he had on his person when arrested; that when he spoke to the storage house employe, when the body was being lifted off, he merely reproved him for failing to assist in lifting the body off; denied the admission attributed to him by the chief of police, and said, instead, that when informed that this was a stolen car he had said that it was "tough," as he had spent $650 for it. Carpenter was not present at the trial. Defendant's wife testified that she was with defendant when he was introduced to Carpenter on the day after the car was stolen; his sister-in-law testified she had loaned defendant the cash in question; a saloon keeper testified that the bill of sale was executed in his saloon and that he saw defendant pay to a man who said his name was Carpenter $600 in cash, and another witness testified that he introduced defendant and Carpenter at the time and place stated by defendant. This is the sum of the evidence in behalf of defendant.

In rebuttal, the state showed that defendant's reputation for truth and veracity was bad. The jury fixed defendant's punishment at two years' imprisonment in the penitentiary. He was sentenced accordingly, and has duly appealed.

John T. Barker, of Kansas City, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and George V. Berry, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WILLIAMSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is said that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. Error is assigned in the giving and in the refusal of instructions and in a failure to instruct upon the whole law of the case. No other errors are alleged.

[1-3] I. The unexplained possession of recently stolen property is prima facie evidence of guilt. This has so long been the settled law of this state that a citation of authorities is unnecessary. We have set out the facts with sufficient fullness to show that there was abundant evidence on this point to carry this case to the jury. The verdict of the jury is, of course, conclusive on appeal, when there is substantial evidence to support it. Hence there is no merit in the contention that the verdict is not supported by the evidence.

[4] II. Appellant asserts that the instructions failed to define circumstantial evidence, and claims that that is fatal error. State v. Hubbard, 228 Mo. 80, loc. cit. 84, 122 S. W. 694, is cited in support of this assertion. We have read that opinion very carefully, but have been unable to find in it any reference to a definition of circumstantial evidence. What is there said, in substance, is that where circumstantial evidence alone is relied upon an instruction upon the weight of such evidence should be given. Such an instruction was given in this case. Instruction No. 5, upon that point, was as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that the guilt of the defendant cannot be presumed, but must be proven by direct or circumstantial evidence, and the court instructs the jury that there is no direct evidence of the guilt of the defendant in this case. Before you can convict the defendant on circumstantial evidence alone, the facts and circumstances must all form a complete chain, and all point to his guilt, and must be irreconcilable with any reasonable theory of his innocence; and before the jury can convict the defendant on circumstantial evidence alone the circumstances must not only be consistent with his guilt and point directly thereto, but must be absolutely inconsistent with any reasonable theory of his innocence."

This instruction was sufficient. State v. Maggard, 250 Mo. 335, loc. cit. 342, 157 S. W. 354; State v. David, 131 Mo. 380, loc. cit. 398, 33 S. W. 28.

We overrule this assignment of error.

[5] III. Instructions numbered 2 and 4 are said to be erroneous, in that they do not require the jury to find that the automobile in question was stolen from the owner.

Instruction No. 2, in pointed terms, required the jury to find that the appellant "feloniously did steal, take, and carry away" the automobile in question "of the goods and property of one Victor Martino," the prosecuting witness. Instruction No. 4 twice required the jury to find beyond a reasonable doubt that the property had been stolen, but did not expressly say that the jury must find that it had been stolen from the prosecuting witness. Instructions numbered 2 and 4, taken together, in plain terms required the jury to find both that the property in question had been stolen and that it had been stolen from the prosecuting witness. The jury could not have been misled by a failure to reiterate these requirements, nor could appellant have been prejudiced thereby. Such reiteration would tend to complicate the instructions and to confuse rather than to enlighten the jury. This criticism is devoid of merit.

[6] Instruction No. 4 is also criticized, in that, as it is said, it assumes that the automobile had been stolen. This instruction, as we have stated, tells the jury twice in plain language that it must first be found beyond a reasonable doubt that the automobile had been stolen before the appellant could be found guilty. In the case of State v. Lee, 272 Mo. 121, 182 S. W. 972, loc. cit. 974, cited by appellant in support of this contention, the question of whether or not the property there involved had been stolen was a vital issue, and the instruction assumed that it had been stolen. The court said:

"In a case where there was no dispute concerning the state's claim that the property in question had been stolen, this assumption would, perhaps, not be considered as harmful. * * *

There was no such dispute in this case, and, as stated, the instruction criticized twice told the jury that it must find that fact before returning a verdict against appellant. Appellant's complaint in this particular is not well founded.

[7] The concluding paragraph of this instruction is to the effect that the burden of satisfactorily accounting for his possession of recently stolen property was upon appellant, and this is said to be a comment upon his failure to testify upon this point. That such burden is upon the accused, under appropriate circumstances, admits of no doubt, and we do not think that he could prevent the jury from being so instructed by the simple device of refusing to testify on this issue. But in view of the fact disclosed by this record that appellant did testify at great length upon the question of how he obtained possession of the stolen property, we do not think this instruction can be condemned upon the ground urged.

[8] Various other alleged errors are assigned by appellant, but after careful consideration we think them lacking in substantial merit. The court gave ten instructions which fully covered the applicable law. It refused four asked by appellant. The refused instructions all related to questions upon which proper instructions had already been given. Duplication of instructions is not required. We think that the appellant was afforded a fair trial, and was awarded very moderate punishment.

The judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

All concur, except WILLIAMS, P. J., not sitting.

DAVENPORT et ux. v. CASEY et al. (No. 29888.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Brokers \S 31 — Broker to whom owners conveyed as trustee to sell could not purchase land.

When broker took from owners a deed to their property to enable him to transfer it for them on making authorized trade or sale, he was not only their agent, but held property as trustee for them, and could not purchase himself nor sell or trade them any property in which he was interested without fully informing them and securing full value.

2. Brokers \S 102—Exchange of broker's for principal's property subject to rescission.

Transaction wherein broker took deed from owners to effect sale for $2,000, but instead conveyed to them without their consent or knowledge property in which he was interested, worth only $1,200, whereas owners' was worth at least $1,800, held open to rescission by owners as in violation of broker's duty as trustee.

3. Appeal and error \S 174 — Objection that plaintiff had parted with title must be raised below.

In suit by owners of land to rescind transaction whereby broker to sell conveyed to them in exchange property in which he was interested, if fact that before bringing suit plaintiff owners had made a quitclaim deed of half of the land to two of their attorneys was material, broker and other defendants waived it by not presenting some objection on such account in lower court.

4. Brokers \S 102—Owners entitled to rescind exchange with broker, though they had disposed of half their land.

In suit by owners of land to rescind transaction, whereby their broker to sell conveyed to them in exchange property in which he was interested, though owners had made quitclaim deed conveying to two of their attorneys south half of property, they were still owners of north half, and entitled to relief sought.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Stoddard County; W. S. C. Walker, Judge.

Suit by James Davenport and Melvina Davenport, his wife, against F. E. Casey and Sarah E. Casey, his wife, and others. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. Munger, of Bloomfield, for appellant F. E. Casey.

Wammack & Welborn and J. W. Farris, all of Bloomfield, for respondents.

SMALL, C. I. Suit in equity to set aside a deed to 80 acres of land in said county. The substance of the petition is: That plaintiffs, being the owners of said real estate, and desirous of selling the same for $2,000 in cash, employed the defendant F. E. Casey as their agent to sell the same for that price; that on or about the 5th of July, 1915, said defendant informed the plaintiffs that he could exchange their land for a lot in the town of Essex in said county 100 by 200 feet in dimensions; that plaintiff James Davenport examined said real estate and informed said defendant that he would not make the exchange; whereupon said defendant F. E. Casey informed the plaintiffs that he would sell said Essex real estate for $2,000, and would deposit the money to their credit in the Citizens' Bank of Dexter in said Stoddard county in payment for their land; that on the 28th of July, 1915, said defendant F. E. Casey fraudulently represented to plaintiffs that in order to do so it was necessary that plaintiffs should make a deed for their said 80-acre tract to the said defendant F. E. Casey; that said defendant, in fact, had made no such arrangements, but relying on the truth of such statement, plaintiffs were induced to and did make a warranty deed to their said 80-acre tract to said defendant, but not for the purpose of conveying title to him as owner, but only for the purpose of enabling him to complete the alleged arrangements that he had made for procuring $2,000 in cash for the plaintiffs for their said land, and that he was not to record said deed until he had procured said sum in cash for the plaintiffs; that plaintiffs were unlearned and ignorant in business transactions, and said defendant F. E. Casey was a shrewd business man; that plaintiffs inquired of him whether or not he meant in any way to cheat or defraud them, and he assured plaintiffs that he was their friend, and would under no circumstances do anything to injure or defraud them, and plaintiffs believed and had full confidence in him when they made and delivered to him their said deed; that afterwards, on September 23, 1915, for the purpose of cheating the plaintiffs, and without their knowledge and consent, and in violation of his agreement, said defendant F. E. Casey caused said deed to be recorded in the recorder of deeds office in said county, and also on the same day said defendant executed a deed of trust upon said property to the defendants, Asa Norman and E. L. Casey, to secure a note of $1,200 made to them by said defendant F. E. Casey; that in said month of July, 1915, said defendant F. E. Casey had himself obtained title to said parcel of land in the town of Essex from one P. W. Crowley, subject to a deed of trust for $2,200 in favor of said defendants Asa Norman and E. L. Casey; that plaintiffs were ignorant that said

F. E. Casey had any interest in said land, and that for the purpose of keeping them in ignorance thereof said defendant F. E. Casey represented that said land was owned by said Crowley, and that he would sell the same and obtain $2,000 in cash with which to pay the plaintiffs for their 80-acre tract and thereupon convey their land to said Crowley; that on the 21st of September, 1915, said F. E. Casey and wife, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiffs, executed a warranty deed purporting to convey said parcel of land at Essex to the plaintiffs, and caused the same to be recorded on the 23d of September, 1915; that afterwards said F. E. Casey handed said deed to the plaintiff James Davenport, who did not understand the purpose of said deed, or that defendant F. E. Casey had violated the purpose for which he had received the deed from the plaintiffs, and that said plaintiff James Davenport did not by receiving said deed from said Casey intend to become the owner of said lot at Essex, or to relinquish the ownership of the 80 acres belonging to the plaintiffs; that the plaintiffs relinquish all claim to said deed and said land at Essex, and deposit said deed in court for the defendants F. E. Casey and Sarah E. Casey, his wife.

The prayer is for the court to set aside and cancel said deed of July 28, 1915, given by plaintiffs to defendant F. E. Casey, and to cancel and set aside the deed of trust given by said defendant F. E. Casey on the plaintiffs' property to the other defendants, and that the court render personal judgment against said defendant F. E. Casey for any damages caused by his act which cannot be fully compensated by the cancellation of said deed, and for general relief.

The answer was a general denial.

There is no dispute with reference to most of the principal facts in the case. That the plaintiffs owned the land as alleged is not denied. That defendant F. E. Casey received the deed from them for their land in the first place for the purpose of enabling him to sell it or trade it for them is not denied. Plaintiffs testify that he was not to record their deed, and was not to trade it for the piece of property in the town of Essex mentioned in the petition, unless he first procured a purchaser for said Essex property, so as to obtain $2,000 in cash for them for their property, and that, if he could not do this, their deed to him was to be returned to them; that under no circumstances would they take the Essex property for their land. At the time plaintiffs made their deed to said Casey, he admits that he told them that he had a deed from Mr. Crowley, the owner of the Essex property, so he could handle it for Crowley, and he wanted their deed for the same purpose. He also admits that he did not notify the plaintiffs that he had any interest, directly or indirectly, in the property of Crowley, except merely to handle it for Crowley for the purpose stated to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs' deed to said defendant, was dated July 28, 1915. Crowley's deed to said defendant F. E. Casey was dated July —, 1915.

A few days after making their deed, the plaintiff Mrs. Melvina Davenport became uneasy, and the plaintiff James Davenport thereupon visited the defendant F. E. Casey and told him that his wife was uneasy, and he wanted Casey to go up to their home and assure her that everything was safe. Accordingly said defendant F. E. Casey went to the plaintiffs' house, August 3, 1915, accompanied by Miss Bond, a relative. While there, said F. E. Casey dictated, and Miss Bond wrote, the following document:

"Dexter, Mo., 8-3-15.

"This contract entered into by and between James Davenport and Melvina Davenport, parties of the first part, and F. E. Casey, party of the second part, under the consideration that, if F. E. Casey, party of the second part, conveys to James Davenport and Melvina Davenport a certain parcel of real estate lying and being in the city of Essex herein not described for twenty hundred or more dollars, then this deed dated 7-28-1915 will stand the proved; otherwise these deeds are null and void and will revert to the parties of the first part for disposery.

"James X Davenport.
mark
"Melvina Davenport.
"F. E. Casey.

"Elsie Vaughn in witness."

Plaintiff James Davenport could neither read nor write. His wife could write her name and could read a little. She did not attempt to read the document. They heard what said defendant F. E. Casey told Miss Bond to write. She read it to them, and they thought she read what he had dictated. Both of them, however, testified that at and before the time the writing was signed Casey assured them that, unless they obtained $2,000 in cash for their property, he would not put their deed on record and it was to be returned to them. This testimony was objected to by the defendants as contradicting the writing, which objection the court overruled, and defendants excepted. Defendant F. E. Casey denied that he so stated at that time in portions of his testimony. But on cross-examination he said:

"Q. That was the understanding, was it? A. Yes, sir. Q. That at any time the money could be realized for this Essex property the old man, Davenport, would make the deed? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that is what you understood about it? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did you go back there on the next morning for, to draw up this contract? A. It was for their satisfaction."

When the contract was read to plaintiffs, Casey testifies, he asked them how it sounded, and they said, "All right," and then he said:

"I don't want you to go worrying about this deed, because until I pay for it, it don't belong to me."

Said defendant Casey made several attempts, after this contract was made, to sell the Essex property for $2,000. He says:

"Q. You were all the time trying to find a buyer for $2,000 or make a deal by which he could get $2,000 for his property all this time, were you not? A. Yes, sir."

But nothing came of these attempts to sell the Essex property to others.

It appears from the evidence that said defendant Casey had an interest in this Essex property. Defendants' witness Crowley, who owned the property, testified that he made the deed for the property to Casey and put it in the Dexter Bank, to be delivered to Casey when Casey should procure a credit for him of $1,800 on a note for $2,200 which defendants Asa Norman and Ed L. Casey held against him; that said defendant F. E. Casey, on account of said $1,800 credit, delivered to Crowley a team of mules worth $200, which left $1,600 to be credited on the $2,200 note. Crowley did not remember the exact date, but some time in the fall of 1915 defendant Asa Norman (who was connected with the bank) told him that his deed had been turned over to defendant F. E. Casey and his note had been credited. "The deed was to be in Norman's hand till I got my credit, and then turned over to Ed Casey (F. E. Casey). That was my instructions, which was wrote down." Defendants Norman and Ed L. Casey obtained this note of $2,200 from Crowley, as the balance due on a farm which they had sold said Crowley. Defendant F. E. Casey acted as agent in effecting this sale, and the understanding between them was that for his services after they had received $1,800 out of this $2,200 note, he could have the balance.

On September 23, 1915, without any notice or knowledge of the plaintiffs, F. E. Casey put their deed to himself on record, and made a deed to them for the town property in Essex, and put it on record. On the same date he made a deed of trust upon the plaintiffs' property in favor of defendants Asa Norman and Ed L. Casey to secure his note for $1,200, and delivered it to them in pursuance of a previous understanding that they were to release the Essex property conveyed to the plaintiffs by him from their $2,200 deed of trust.

This suit was brought on the 29th of October, 1915. Said F. E. Casey did not convey the plaintiffs' property to said Crowley until nearly a year after the suit was brought, to wit, September 2, 1916, when he made a quitclaim deed to it. This quitclaim deed, however, was made to Crowley, not in pursuance of any agreement he had with said Casey with reference to the transaction in question in this suit, but in pursuance of a trade made in September, 1916, in which Crowley conveyed another piece of property to said defendant F. E. Casey for plaintiffs' land. The arrangement between the defendants F. E. Casey and Norman and E. L. Casey by which he secured a credit for Crowley of $1,600 on their note against Crowley by giving them his note for $1,200 secured on the plaintiffs' property was made because they "didn't care" if F. E. Casey did get the difference. Shortly after the deed from defendant F. E. Casey to the plaintiffs for the Essex town property was recorded he delivered it to the plaintiff James Davenport. Said plaintiff says he, being unable to read, did not know it was a deed, and did not understand that it was given him in exchange for plaintiffs' farm. But defendant F. E. Casey testified, he told him it was for his deed for the Essex property, and one or two other witnesses corroborate Casey. But plaintiff James Davenport says that, if anything of the kind was said, he did not hear it, and that he did not know that plaintiffs had transferred their farm, and had become the owners of this town property, until shortly afterwards, when he went to pay his taxes. He then learned of it and had the matter looked up. Thereupon plaintiffs instituted this suit.

There was testimony pro and con as to the defendant F. E. Casey's reputation for truth and veracity and honesty and fair dealing. The evidence showed that the town property which Casey transferred to plaintiff was worth about $1,000 or $1,200, and that the plaintiffs' farm was worth $1,800 or $2,000. The evidence further showed that plaintiffs were ignorant and confiding people and likely knew nothing of the value of this town property. Whereas defendant F. E. Casey was an experienced trader in real estate and capable business man. There is no evidence that plaintiffs had any independent advice when they signed the contract shown in evidence or made the deed. And plaintiff James Davenport testified that he told defendant F. E. Casey that he would not take the Essex property unless it could be first sold for $2,000 cash and the cash paid to him; while defendant F. E. Casey testified, in which he is corroborated by one of his witnesses, that plaintiff James Davenport said he would take the town property in trade whether he could get the $2,000 cash for it or not.

The court found for the plaintiffs and against the defendant F. E. Casey, and rendered judgment cancelling the deed from the plaintiffs to said defendant, and also the deed from said defendant to the plaintiffs for the property in Essex. But the court found the defendants, Asa Norman and E. L. Casey were bona fide holders without notice of the $1,200 note and deed of trust on plaintiffs' property given them by said defendant F. E. Casey. In lieu of canceling said note, and to compensate the plaintiffs on account thereof, the court rendered personal judgment for the amount of the note against the defendant F. E. Casey in favor of the plaintiffs.

After unsuccessfully moving for a new trial, defendant F. E. Casey brought the case here by appeal.

[1] II. We hold that when defendant F. E. Casey took from the plaintiffs a deed to their property in order to enable him to transfer it for them, upon making a trade or sale, which they might authorize, he was not only their agent, but held the property as trustee for the plaintiffs. He thereby established a highly confidential relation between himself and the plaintiffs, and could not purchase said property from the plaintiffs, nor sell or trade them any property in which he was interested, without at least fully informing the plaintiffs in regard to his interest, and securing for the plaintiffs the full value of their property.

In Meek v. Hurst, 223 Mo. loc. cit. 698, 122 S. W. 1024, 135 Am. St. Rep. 531, this court said:

"To allow one acting in the fiduciary relation of agent to buy from or to sell to himself is a solecism in the realm of law; for the moral stamina of the average man is inadequate to preserve a fine glow of fidelity to his trust and confidential relation in such transaction; and the interdiction is enforced with a strong hand in courts of justice. Montgomery v. Hundley, 205 Mo. loc. cit. 148 et seq.; Moore v. Mandlebaum, 8 Mich. 434; Grumley v. Webb, 44 Mo. 444; Evans v. Evans, 196 Mo. loc. cit. 23."

And to like effect are Martin v. Baker, 135 Mo. loc. cit. 503, 36 S. W. 369; Cornet v. Cornet, 248 Mo. loc. cit. 234, 154 S. W. 121; Ryan v. Ryan, 174 Mo. loc. cit. 286, 73 S. W. 494; Dingman v. Romine, 141 Mo. 466, 42 S. W. 1087; Cohron v. Polk, 252 Mo. loc. cit. 278, 158 S. W. 603; Murdock v. Milner, 84 Mo. loc. cit. 103; Jones, Ex'r, v. Storm, 236 Mo. loc. cit. 487, 139 S. W. 394.

In Perry on Trusts, vol. 1, § 195, it is laid down as elemental law:

"The trustee is in such a position of confidence and influence over the cestui que trust that the contract or bargain will either be void or he will be a constructive trustee, at the election of the cestui que trust, unless the trustee can show that the contract was entirely fair and advantageous to the cestui que trust. * * *

The general rule is that the trustee shall not take beneficially by gift or purchase from the cestui que trust, even although the supposed trustee and purchaser is a mere intermeddler, and not a regularly recognized trustee. The question is not whether there is fraud in fact. The law stamps the purchase by the trustee as fraudulent per se. * * * But there are exceptions to the rule, and the trustee may buy from the cestui que trust, provided there is a distinct and clear contract ascertained after a jealous and scrupulous examination of all the circumstances; that the cestui que trust intended the trustee to buy, and there is fair consideration and no fraud, no concealment, no advantage taken by the trustee of information acquired by him in the character of trustee. The trustee must clear the transaction of every shadow of suspicion. * * * Lord Eldon said he admitted that the exception was a difficult case to make out. And it may be said generally that it is difficult to find a case where such a transaction has been sustained. Any withholding of information, or ignorance of the facts, or of his rights on the part of the cestui, or any inadequacy of price, will make such a purchaser a constructive trustee. The cestui que trust must know that he is dealing with the trustee. Therefore, if the trustee purchases through an agent or third person, and the cestui que trust does not know the trustee in the transaction, the contract will be void." (The italics are ours.)

[2] Tested by the foregoing rules, the acquisition of plaintiffs' property by defendant F. E. Casey must be condemned. It appears from the practically undisputed evidence, and we find, that said Casey was interested in the Crowley property; that he did not notify plaintiffs of such interest; that he did not fully inform them as to the value of the Crowley property; that they were ignorant, confiding people, and relied altogether on him to take care of their interests; that they had no independent advice; and that the Crowley property was worth much less than their property. A trustee and agent's sale of his own property to the cestui que trust, or principal, or purchase of their property by him, under such circumstances, will not withstand the scrutiny of a court of equity, but will be set aside upon timely application, such as was made in this case. It is not necessary to pass, therefore, upon any other questions raised and discussed by learned counsel relating to the merits of this appeal.

[3, 4] III. It also appears in evidence that, before bringing this suit, the plaintiffs had made a quitclaim deed conveying to two of their attorneys the south half of their property. No special point was made, as shown by the record in the court below on this account, except to bring out the fact on cross-examination of plaintiff James Davenport. If such fact was material, defendants waived it by not pressing some objection on account thereof in the lower court. But, however that may be, plaintiffs are still the owners of the north half of the property and entitled to the relief sought on account thereof without regard to their having disposed of the south half of the property. There is no merit in appellants' contention in this regard.

The judgment of the learned chancellor below was without error, and it is affirmed.

BROWN and RAGLAND, CC., concur.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of SMALL, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

All concur, except WOODSON, J., absent.

REEVES et al. v. GREEN. (No. 19925.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 628(2) — Direction, with payment of fees, to file transcript sufficient to prevent dismissal.

A showing by appellant that he directed the clerk of the circuit court to file the transcript of judgment in the appellate court in time, and that he paid the docket fee in the appellate court and thought transcript had been filed, is sufficient showing to prevent dismissal of the appeal for delay in filing the transcript.

2. Appeal and error \S 20—Circuit court acquires no jurisdiction from a county court which had none.

Where a cause is appealed from the county court to the circuit court, the circuit court acquires no jurisdiction unless the county court had jurisdiction, but errors in county court after it acquired jurisdiction do not affect the jurisdiction of the circuit court.

3. Appeal and error \S 20—Sufficient petition for road gives county court jurisdiction over proceedings.

Where a petition for a public road contained every necessary averment of Rev. St. 1909, \S 10435, and was accompanied with a list of land-owners and other matters required by the section, and the notice accorded with the petition, county court acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties sufficient to give circuit court jurisdiction on appeal from the county court.

4. Appeal and error \S 1088—On appeal from trial de novo in circuit court errors in county court are immaterial.

Where the county court had acquired jurisdiction of proceedings to open a road, so that the circuit court could obtain jurisdiction thereof by appeal, errors committed in proceedings by the county court are immaterial on appeal from the judgment of the circuit court, in which the cause was tried de novo.

5. Highways §29(5)—Omission from petition of name of one township held immaterial.

Where a petition for public road correctly described its route, but stated it was in two townships, when in fact it was partly along the dividing line between one of the named townships and an unnamed one, and the circuit court correctly found the route to be in the three townships, in which all the petitioners resided, the omission of one township from the petition could not have misled the parties, and does not require reversal of judgment opening the road.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ripley County; J. P. Foard, Judge.

Proceedings by Frank Reeves and others against I. E. Green and others for the opening of a public road. From the judgment of the circuit court on appeal from the county court ordering the road, Green appealed to the Court of Appeals, which transferred the cause to Supreme Court (185 S. W. 218). Motion to dismiss appeal overruled, and judgment affirmed.

Chas. B. Butler, of Doniphan, for appellant.
Borth & Ferguson and J. F. Fulbright, all of Doniphan, for respondents.

GRAVES, J. After the rejection of one opinion here, this cause has been reassigned to the writer. It involves the establishment of a public road in Ripley county. The appeal was taken to the Springfield Court of Appeals (185 S. W. 218), and by that court certified here on the ground that title to real estate is involved. Plaintiffs (respondents) were petitioners for the establishment of a certain public road in Ripley county, a proceeding instituted in the county court of Ripley county. The road was ordered, and a part of the appellant's land will be required and taken therefor. Upon appeal to the circuit court the road was ordered, appellant's damages assessed, and from such judgment is this appeal. The questions urged by the assignment of error in the brief go to the jurisdiction of the county and circuit courts of said county. The pertinent facts can best be stated with the points made and in the course of the opinion.

[1] I. A preliminary question presents itself. There was a motion filed in the Springfield Court of Appeals to affirm the judgment for a failure to file therein a transcript of the judgment within the time prescribed by law, and for a failure to comply with the rules of that court in filing an abstract and brief. The appeal was granted more than 60 days prior to the October term of the Springfield Court of Appeals, but no transcript of the judgment was filed there until October 20th of the year of the appeal. The appellant filed in that court an affidavit showing that he had directed the circuit clerk, to make out and forward a transcript of the judgment to the Springfield Court of Appeals, and had paid the docket fee of that court ($10), and thought the clerk of the circuit court had attended to the matter. The transcript when filed shows that the docket fee of $10 was paid to the clerk of the Springfield Court of Appeals by the circuit clerk of Ripley county. The Springfield Court of Appeals, finding itself without jurisdiction, has certified the whole matter here, including this motion to affirm the judgment and the showing contra. We need not go further than to say that, under our statute, appellant made a good showing as against the motion to affirm the judgment, and this motion is therefore overruled.

II. As suggested, the attack is upon the sufficiency of the showing as to jurisdiction, both in the county court and the circuit court. In the circuit court there was a motion to dismiss the proceeding for want of jurisdiction. The petition for the road (as filed in the county court) in part said:

"We, the undersigned citizens of said county, at least 12 duly qualified and competent adult petitioners, residents of and in own proper right owners of land in the municipal townships hereinafter named, that is to say, at least 12 freeholders of the municipal townships hereinafter named, 8 of whom reside in the immediate neighborhood of the following described proposed road, respectfully represent and aver that the proposed public road hereinafter described is 40 feet in width, and situated in the municipal townships of Thomas and Washington, in the county of Ripley and state of Missouri, and is of sufficiently great utility to the general public, and is not a change of a previous location, and that the beginning, courses, and termination thereof, with not less than two points named on the direction of said public road, are as follows, to wit. * * *

"And we further aver that said public road is entirely practicable and a public necessity. And we further aver that the said public road is, whenever practicable, along government surveys, and that this petition is accompanied by the names of all residents and other persons owning land through which said proposed public road shall run, with the amounts of damages claimed by each of them so far as can be ascertained, and also by the names of all those who are willing to give the right of way for said proposed public road. And we further aver that as and for public notice of this application not less than three triplicate original written handbills were by said petitioners duly put up in not less than three distinct, separate, and independent public places in said municipal townships, one at the proposed beginning of said public road, and one at the proposed termination of said public road, and one at Naylor post office, in said Thomas township, in said county, more than 20 days before the first day of the regular term of said county court at which this application is presented, to wit, before and on Monday, the 3d day of August, 1914, and there maintained to this date, and that a duplicate original copy of one of said public notices is herewith filed with return thereof duly entered thereon, and that by said means public notice of this application has been duly given, and said county court has duly obtained jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of all parties herein, and that the facts herein justify the establishment of said public road at the expense of said petitioners.

"Wherefore, said petitioners pray an order for the establishment of said proposed public road, and for all proper relief.

"Dated at said county this 8d day of July, 1914, as witness our respective hands, full names, and proper signatures."

Then follow the signatures of 19 persons. The foregoing is the entire petition, except the description of the proposed road. At the August term of the county court the following order was made:

"The court orders the highway engineer to survey and report at the next regular term of this court, commencing in the municipal township of Thomas at the center of section 2, in township 22 north, range 4 east, and run thence north on the half section line across section 35, township 23 north, range 4 east, and to the center of section 26, township 23 north, range 4 east, and run thence east on the half section line to the county line between Butler and Ripley county and terminating at the northeast corner of the southeast quarter of said section 26, same township and range, in the municipal township of Washington, and the said petition coming on to be heard and having been publicly read in open court and being proven by two witnesses, namely, to wit, Frank Reeves and O. H. Scott, to the satisfaction of the court, that due legal notice had been given according to law and that the signers thereto are 12 freeholders residing in Ripley county and that 3 of them live in the immediate neighborhood of said proposed road. The court therefore orders the highway engineer to survey and mark out said proposed road, 40 feet wide, as set forth in said petition, between the points as set forth as herein set forth, and make due report of his proceedings at next regular term of this court."

At the November adjourned term, 1914, the court entry shows the following:

"Frank Reeves et al., Petitioners. In the Matter of a Petition for the Location of a Public Road.

"Court orders same established when cut out and received by highway engineer."

At the regular February term following, the appellant filed his exceptions, giving as his reasons the following:

"Your exceptor therefore excepts to said road and the report of the commissioners aforesaid for the following reasons: (1) Said road is not a public necessity; (2) that the right of way has not been legally secured; (3) that the amount of damages awarded by the commissioners appointed by the court to exceptor is inadequate for the injury done.

"Wherefore your exceptor prays that a jury be summoned according to law to try the question of damages to exceptor herein.

"I. E. Green, Exceptor.

"Chas. B. Butler,

"Attorney for Exceptor."

Trial was had and the jury in the county court allowed exceptor $118 in damages.

At the same term (February, 1915), the county court made the following order:

"It is ordered by the court that the report of the highway engineer be and is hereby approved and road ordered established, and the road overseer through whose district the said proposed road runs proceed, under direction of the highway engineer, to open the same, and that the owners of land condemned shall have five months in which to erect the necessary fences for the opening of said road."

On the same day appeal was granted to the circuit court, wherein the motion to dismiss the appeal, mentioned supra, was filed.

Upon a trial in the circuit court de novo, that court by its judgment, after reciting the verdict of the jury, which found the issues for petitioners and fixed the appellant's damages at $200, found the following fact:

"And it appearing to the court in the trial of this cause that on the 5th day of August, 1914, there was presented to the Ripley county court at its regular August, 1914, term, a petition for the establishment of a new county road, 40 feet wide, in Thomas, Washington, and Varner townships, commencing at the center of section 2, in township 22 north, range 4 east, in Thomas township, and running thence north on the half section line across section 35, township 23 north, range 4 east, to the center of section 26, township 23 north, range 4 east, and running thence east on the half section line to the line between Butler and Ripley counties and terminating at the northeast corner of the southeast quarter of section 26, township 23 north, range 4 east, in the municipal townships of Washington and Varner; and it further appearing to the satisfaction of the court by two witnesses, namely, Frank Reeves and O. H. Scott, that notice of said intended application had been given by written handbills put up in three public places in said municipal townships of Thomas, Washington, and Varner, that one of the said notices was put up at the proposed beginning and one at the proposed termination of said road, more than 20 days before the first day of the regular August, 1914, term, of the Ripley county court; and it further appearing to the court that said petition is signed by more than 12 freeholders of the municipal townships of Thomas, Washington, and Varner, through which said proposed road runs, and that 3 of whom live in the immediate neighborhood of said road, and that said petition is accompanied by the names of all resident persons owning land through which said proposed road runs, with the amount of damages claimed by them so far as was ascertained and the names of those who are willing to give right of way for said proposed road; and it further appearing to the court that said proposed road is practical and a public necessity: It is therefore ordered that all the proceedings herein had for the establishment of said proposed road, 40 feet wide, between the points as set forth herein, be confirmed and are hereby adjudged in full force and effect.

"And it further appearing to the court from the petition herein filed that the said petitioners prayed for the establishment of said public road at the expense of said petitioners and that said petitioners have paid into court $120, it is ordered, considered, and adjudged that said proposed road be established in the manner provided by law, and that said exceptor, I. E. Green, have and recover of Ripley county, Mo., the sum of $200 as his damages and all costs herein expended."

It should be noted that prior to the trial the circuit court, upon application of the petitioners for the road, directed the county court to correct its record so as to conform to the facts and recertify its record to the circuit court.

[2] From the judgment of the circuit court, as above set out, this appeal was taken. As the jurisdiction of the circuit court, in proceedings of this character, is dependent upon the jurisdiction of the county court in the first instance, it is a question first to be determined as to whether or not the county court had jurisdiction of this proceeding. It is trite law that, absent jurisdiction in the county court, the circuit court acquires no jurisdiction by appeal. But there is a broad distinction between jurisdiction and errors of record in the county court. A failure of jurisdiction is one thing, and errors in the record after the proper acquisition of jurisdiction is another thing. The above outlines the record sufficiently for us to determine the basic question, i. e., Did the county court acquire jurisdiction?

[3] III. If this petition for a public road, set out above, be compared with section 10435, R. S. 1909, it will be found to contain every necessary averment. The petition was accompanied with list of landowners and other matters required by this section. The notice accorded with the petition. The only thing to be noted is the fact that it speaks of only two townships, i. e., Thomas and Washington. The description of the road, as given in the petition, is in detail, as follows:

"Commencing in the municipal township of Thomas at the center of section 2, in township 22 north, range 4 east, and run thence north on the half section line across section 35, township 23 north, range 4 east, and to the center of section 26, township 23 north, range 4 east, and run thence east on the half section line to the county line between Butler and Ripley county and terminating at the northeast corner of the southeast quarter of said section 26, same township and range, in the municipal township of Washington."

The petition and notice stated all the necessary jurisdictional facts for the establishment of the road in the petition described. When the petition was acted upon by the county court, it was found that the signers thereof were "12 freeholders residing in Ripley county and that 8 of them live in the immediate neighborhood of said proposed road." It was also found that "due legal notice had been given according to law." The order establishing the road at November adjourned term makes no further findings. There is no special finding of a public necessity in the county court, but there is a petition stating all required jurisdictional facts, including public necessity, and a finding of legal notice having been given.

Whatever may have been the early rulings in this state, it is now settled doctrine that the filing or presentation of a proper petition, of which due notice has been given, confers jurisdiction upon the county court in these road cases. Bennett v. Hall, 184 Mo. loc. cit. 414 et seq., 83 S. W. 439; Stutz v. Cameron, 254 Mo. loc. cit. 358 et seq., 162 S. W. 221; Ripley v. Binns, 264 Mo. 505, 175 S. W. loc. cit. 208; Davis v. O'Bryant, 175 S. W. loc. cit. 932.

The latter two cases were not officially reported, because they followed the Bennett and Stutz Cases, supra. However, Williams, C., in the Binns Case, supra, so concisely states the present rule that we borrow from the opinion the following:

"The county court acquired jurisdiction when the petition, in due form, accompanied by the names of the resident landowners, was filed, and the required statutory notice given. Irregularities, if any, occurring in the proceedings in the county court after jurisdiction is once acquired, will not deprive the circuit court of its jurisdiction on appeal. Stutz v. Cameron, 254 Mo. 340, loc. cit. 358, 359, 162 S. W. 221; Bennett v. Hall, 184 Mo. 407, loc. cit. 415-421, 83 S. W. 439."

[4] We are dealing with a judgment of the circuit court where there was a trial de novo, and we judge the sufficiency of that judgment, and not the judgment in the county court. As to the county court, we are only concerned in the matter of a sufficient petition and proper notice. With a sufficient petition and proper notice the county court acquired jurisdiction. This would sustain the derivative jurisdiction of the circuit court upon appeal. We then are interested (upon appeal from the circuit court) only in the proceedings and findings there. So go all our recent rulings. There was therefore no error in overruling the motion to dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction.

IV. Complaint is urged as to a nunc pro tunc order by the county court in conformity to a direction of the circuit court to make its record show the facts. This is beside the case. If, as we rule, the county court acquired jurisdiction of the cause by the filing of the proper petition and the giving of a sufficient notice, the circuit court became possessed of the cause upon appeal, and we are only interested in the course of the case there.

See authorities cited, supra.

[5] V. We reach now the real crux of this case. The judgment of the circuit court must be considered. The circuit court cannot change the petition filed in the county court. This is the very basis of the case. This petition averred that the proposed road was to be 40 feet in width, and was situated in the municipal townships of Thomas and Washington, in Ripley county. The petition averred that it terminated at the county line between Butler and Ripley counties, "in the municipal township of Washington." There is an apparent conflict between these allegations and the specific description of the road as given in that portion of the petition which gives the lines upon which the road (40 feet in width) should run. By its judgment the circuit court found that the line of the road as set out in the petition made it run through Thomas, Washington, and Varner townships, instead of Thomas and Washington townships, as averred in one portion of the petition. It seems that the dividing line between Washington and Varner townships is the half section line of section 26, so that when the 40-foot road ran east a half mile from the center of section 26 it ran upon this dividing line, and the south 20 feet of this half mile portion of the road would be in Varner township. The circuit court found and located the road on the exact line set out in the petition and notice, but this 20-foot strip of a half mile was in fact in Varner township, and the road, or this 20-foot portion of it, terminated in Varner township, and the north half of the road (20 feet in width) terminated in Washington township. But, whilst this is true, the road terminated at the northeast corner of the southeast quarter of section 26, in Washington township, as averred in the petition. This particular corner was the center of the road at its termination. The circuit court judgment finds all the facts necessary to establish a road on the designated lines in the petition, but finds that it involved three townships instead of two, and found that the petitioners came from the three townships. We are impressed with the idea that, as the petition gave the width of the road and the exact lines upon which it was to run, and as the petitioners came from the three townships interested (according to the findings of the circuit court) no harm came from the omission of Varner township (by name) in the petition. This for the reason that the width of the road and its fixed line showed that this small portion was in fact in Varner township. No person was misled.

Let the judgment be affirmed.

HODDE v. HAHN et al. (No. 20478.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2
June 4, 1920. Motion for Rehearing
Denied June 25, 1920.)

1. Corporations §562(1)—Receivers may sue for amount unpaid on stock.

A receiver of a corporation may, under order of court, institute and maintain an action against stockholders to recover the amount unpaid on their stock.

2. Corporations §77—Implied promise that subscriber for stock will pay therefor in full.

A subscriber to corporate stock impliedly promises to pay in full therefor, so that the corporation or its assignee or receiver, after the conditions of the subscription have been performed, may, in an action, recover the amount due and unpaid thereon.

3. Estoppel §52—Defined.

Estoppel is a preclusion in law which prevents a man alleging or denying a fact in consequence of his own previous act; allegation or denial of a contrary tenor.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Estoppel.]

4. Corporations §247—Creditors not estopped to sue stockholders by electing to take over business.

Creditors of a corporation were not estopped from suing stockholders for the amount unpaid on their stock by reason of having taken over the assets, by trustee, of the corporation and operating the business at a loss, although at the time the trust deed was executed the assets were sufficient to pay the entire indebtedness, where there was no fraud and the continuation of the business was suggested by the stockholders.

5. Corporations §269(1)—Creditors entitled to rely on statement that stock was paid up in money.

The creditors of a corporation had a right to rely on a statement in the articles of incorporation that $50,000 of the capital stock had been paid up in lawful money, and therefore, where it appeared in an action against stockholders that the incorporators had merely transferred to the corporation property worth $7,000 and the good will of a business, the duty devolved upon defendants to show that the good will was a real asset and had a value of $43,000.

6. Good will §2—"Good will" of failing business an imaginary quantity.

Since "good will" is the advantage or benefit acquired by an establishment beyond the mere value of the capital stock, funds, or property employed therein in consequence of the general public patronage, where in consequence of the general public patronage, such declared advantage or benefit turns out to be a disad-vantage and a loss, then the good will is purely an imaginary quantity and has no money value.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Good Will.]

7. Corporations — 244(1) — Sales of unpaid stock does not relieve of liability to creditors.

Sales by incorporators of their unpaid stock did not relieve them from liability to the creditors of the corporations; articles of incorporation reciting that the stock was paid up.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Thos. C. Hennings, Judge.

Action by Cyrus E. Hodde, receiver, against Peter Hahn, James H. Roach, and Victor Diering. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

O. F. Karbe and S. C. Rogers, both of St. Louis, for appellants.

Grant & Grant, of St. Louis, for respondent.

WALKER, J. This is an action against appellants, and others not appealing, for alleged unpaid stock subscriptions. In January, 1909, the George Henseler Oil Company, a $10,000 corporation, was doing business in oils and kindred commodities in the city of St. Louis. None of these appellants were stockholders in this company. It enjoyed a lucrative business. The Mercantile Supply Company was a $50,000 corporation, having $30,000 of its capital stock paid up. All of these appellants were stockholders therein. A suggestion of merger or consolidation of the two companies was made, agreed to, and consummated in January and February, 1909. The Mercantile transferred all its assets and good will to the consolidated corporation, the Henseler Mercantile Oil & Supply Company, for stock issued to the several shareholders thereof to the extent of $25,000. The merged or consolidated company did business with varying success until in 1914. Some time in 1912 appellant Diering, while the corporation was solvent, disposed of his stock. Appellant Hahn disposed of all of his stock to his wife, who was a defendant below, saving four shares. In March, 1914, the directors realized the company was in financial straits, and attempted to settle with their creditors. As a result there was a meeting of the creditors held on the 26th day of March, 1914, when there was presented to them an expert accountant's statement of the condition of the company. It was proposed to do anything the creditors might direct. The creditors finally appointed a committee of three to determine the course to be pursued. It decided to transfer the assets and property of the company to a trustee. In the meantime the creditors had charge of the affairs of the company. They prepared a deed, named their trustee, the transfer was made to him, and he took charge without bond or the taking of an inventory or appraisal of the assets, and attempted to operate the business. The first two months he made a profit of $3,145. Thereafter the creditors enlarged the business, created various liabilities, and the assets began to depreciate and decrease and the liabilities increase until in October or November, 1914, when the trustee advised discontinuance, but the creditors were obdurate, and a substitute trustee was appointed at the request of the Union Petroleum Company, one of the largest creditors. The new trustee attempted to operate the business until in March, 1915. The result was disastrous financially, and the Union Petroleum Company applied for the appointment of a receiver, and the present plaintiff was appointed as such. According to the books of the company in March, 1914, the assets exceeded the liabilities; that is, the assets were in excess of $37,000 and the liabilities less than $34,000. During the operation of the trusteeship under the direction of the creditors the entire assets were dissipated, lost, or squandered, and the liabilities increased, with the result that when the receiver sold the assets on hand there was not enough to pay the liabilities incurred during the trust. Thereafter the receiver brought this suit against the then and former stockholders for balances due on their unpaid stock.

The petition alleges the appointment of a receiver; sets forth the facts upon which the liabilities of the defendants were based, to wit, the amounts due and unpaid by each upon their respective shares of stock, the assets on hand, the debts, the order authorizing the receiver to institute this action, the allowance of claims amounting to $27,037.94, and that there remained but $1,300 in the receiver's hands with which to pay the same; that the defendants were liable as subscribers for their unpaid stock, the incorporation of the Henseler Mercantile Oil & Supply Company; that the two former corporations had been so operated that their capital stock was impaired, and that on the 30th day of January, 1909, there was but $7,253.72 as assets on hand in payment of the capital stock of the Henseler Mercantile Oil & Supply Company; that said articles represented $50,000 of the stock was paid up and all of it subscribed; that there were no assets of the value of $50,000 paid in in payment of the capital stock; and that the difference between the value of the property paid over to said corporation and the face value of the stock was therefore due. An account was prayed to be taken of the amount due the creditors and costs and the amount paid by each of defendants on account of the subscriptions and the stock issued to them, and that judgment be entered for the amount due, respectively, from each of the defendants on unpaid stock and for other relief. The answers, which were several, were: First, general denials; and, second, pleas of estoppel. Other defenses were also pleaded, but the assignment of errors does not render a reference to them necessary; there being no question as to the sufficiency of the pleadings. The reply was a general denial.

A hearing was had before the court, in which it was decreed that plaintiff have and recover from defendants Frederick Nobbe, Peter Hahn, Belle Gregory, Victor Diesing, James H. Roach, and William Grafeman the sum of $27,037.94, and that execution issue against said defendants as follows: Against Frederick Nobbe, $21,793.58; Peter Hahn, $874.06; Belle Gregory, $1,748.12; Victor Diesing, $874.06; James H. Roach, $874.06; William Grafeman, $874.06. If for any reason any one or more of said apportionments could not be made out of the defendants, then such apportionment so in default was to be levied out of the property of the other defendants in proportion to their respective liabilities as hereinbefore set forth. After unavailing motions for new trial and in arrest, this appeal was perfected.

Much of the foregoing statement, seemingly irrelevant, is inserted that a clearer understanding may be had of the grounds of appellants' defense.

Error is assigned in the trial court's holding that the receiver was not authorized to maintain this action. The attitude assumed by appellants is best stated in their own language, which is as follows:

"Where the creditors of a financially embarrassed or insolvent corporation, after being duly advised of its condition, take over its business and assets while there is a dispute as to the amount of the liabilities and the value of the assets, without adjusting that question, and also the question as to whether the assets, if disposed of and the proceeds applied to the debts, were sufficient to satisfy the debts, and they continue the business of the company after being warned by the receiver of the inadvisability of such a course, and they refuse to heed his warnings, and upon his resignation secure the appointment of another trustee, and thereafter there is an utter failure of the business as conducted by the trustee, and none of the original debts are paid, but all of the assets dissipated, the creditors cannot disregard the assets they had in their possession, and which they squandered or dissipated, but which might have been applied by them on the liabilities, and then hold the stockholders for their unpaid stock, if there remained, when the creditors took charge of the assets, sufficient funds to pay the liabilities then extant."

In short, it is contended that the receiver is but the creditors, whose conduct has been such as to estop him from prosecuting this action.

[1, 2] I. The right of the receiver, under the order of the court, to institute and maintain an action of the character here under review is too well established to require discussion. Lyons v. Corder, 253 Mo. loc. cit. 559, 162 S. W. 606, and cases. Nor is it necessary, in defining the legal status of a stockholder who has not paid for stock subscribed for by him, to say more than that the prevailing rule is that, upon his having made the subscription, such a promise is implied that he will pay for the stock in full as to authorize an action against him by the corporation or its assignee or receiver, after the conditions of the subscription have been performed, to recover the amount due and unpaid thereon. Berry v. Rood, 168 Mo. 316, 67 S. W. 644; Shields v. Hobart, 172 Mo. 491, 72 S. W. 669, 95 Am. St. Rep. 529. The reason of this rule becomes apparent when we consider the relation which the stockholder and the receiver bear to the corporation. Upon the failure of the former to pay a stock subscription there is created a liability on his part in the nature of debt to the corporation; and the latter, by his appointment being invested with the title of the property and the rights of action of the corporation, becomes the proper party to enforce obligations due to it, by legal proceedings. Coleman v. Hagey, 252 Mo. 102, 158 S. W. 829; Thompson v. Greeley, 107 Mo. loc. cit. 590, 17 S. W. 962.

[3] II. This brings us to the affirmative defense that the receiver is estopped from prosecuting this action on account of the conduct of the directors. Preliminary to a consideration of this contention it is not inappropriate to refer briefly to what has been declared necessary to constitute estoppel. Our reports, as well as those of other jurisdictions, are replete with definitions of this defense. Among others are the following: A preclusion in law which prevents a man alleging or denying a fact in consequence of his own previous act, allegation, or denial of a contrary tenor. Reid's Adm'r v. Bengel, 112 Ky. loc. cit. 814, 66 S. W. 997, 57 L. R. A. 253, 99 Am. St. Rep. 334; Coogler v. Rogers, 25 Fla. loc. cit. 873, 7 South. 391; Gavin v. Graydon, 41 Ind. loc. cit. 566. A conclusive ascertainment of a fact by the parties, so that it can no longer be controverted between them. Wilkins v. Suttles, 114 N. C. loc. cit. 556, 19 S. E. 606. A fictitious statement treated as true. Gen. Financ. Co. v. Liberator, etc., Co., 10 Ch. Div. 15. The conclusion of a truth. Moore v. Willis, 9 N. C. loc. cit. 558. Where a man has done some act which the law will not permit him to gainsay or deny. South v. Deaton, 113 Ky. loc. cit. 320, 68 S. W. 137, 1105. Where one is concluded from speaking against his own act or deed. Demarest v. Hopper, 22 N. J. Law, 619. Our rulings are in effect the same as the foregoing. De Lashmuth v. Teetor, 261 Mo. 412, 169 S. W. 34; Osburn v. Court of Honor, 152 Mo. App. 652, 133 S. W. 87; Spurlock v. Sproule, 72 Mo. 503; Acton v. Dooley, 74 Mo. 63; Hart

v. Giles, 67 Mo. 175; and numerous other cases cited in 16 Cyc. p. 679, note 1.

[4] As concisely applying the foregoing definitions, the St. Louis Court of Appeals in Henson v. Mercantile Co., 49 Mo. App. 224, holds that to constitute an estoppel three things must occur: First, fraudulent representations, or withholding the truth when it is one's duty to speak; second, reliance upon such representations; third, the consequent act by the defrauded party to his disadvantage. Let the facts determine, therefore, whether the doctrine can be applied here. It is conceded that the management of the business of the company under the trusteeship created by the directors was a losing venture. The creditors, however, did nothing or made any false representations which misled the defendants, including appellants, which caused them to execute the trust deed whereby the loss was incurred in their attempting in this manner to continue the business. The proposition and plan pursued did not originate with the creditors, but with the defendants.

As it now appears, a mistake was made by the defendants, as well as the creditors, in attempting to continue the business. But the record discloses no act of the latter essential to sustain the plea of estoppel. The assets were such, due to the nature of the business, that they were practically worthless, except to a going concern. If, therefore, the business was discontinued, the property practically ceased to have any commercial value, and if subjected to sale would have commanded no greater price than the separate value of the wood and iron it contained, classified by the respondent as "junk." This will apply to the filling stations and other equipment. Moreover, a large proportion of the accounts receivable were afterwards shown to be uncollectable. If under this state of facts the affairs of the company had been liquidated, the assets, if any had been realized from a sale, would have been nominal. The receivership inaugurated by the directors, therefore, viewed from any vantage, was a mistake, but it does not appear that another course would have brought a different pecuniary result or have resulted in any greater advantage. In no sense was the conduct of the creditors such as to justify the plea of estoppel now sought to be interposed by appellants, whose legal relation to the company is nothing more than that of debtors made so by their own obligations.

III. The liability of a stockholder for unpaid stock, if not made clear by what has been said, is too well defined to admit of question. Our statutes (section 3350, R. S. 1909) provide explicitly that capital stock shall be paid up in lawful money of the United States. The articles of this company provided that this had been done, and that it was in the custody of the board of directors. It now appears that this statement was false, and the receiver, to sustain this action, was only required to establish this fact and the several liabilities by reason thereof of the appellants, when it became their duty to show, if payment was pleaded otherwise than in money, that the substitute therefor was equal in money value to the extent of the par value of the stock.

As we said in Van Cleve v. Berkey, 143 Mo. loc. cit. 136, 44 S. W. 750, 42 L. R. A. 593:

"The proposition that the stock of a corporation must be paid for 'in meal or in malt,' in money or in money's value, is not a mere figure of speech, but really has the significance of its terms. It may be paid for in property, but in such case the property must be the fair equivalent in value to the par value of the stock issued therefor. That it is the duty of the stockholders to see that it possesses such value. That when a corporation is sent forth into the commercial world, accredited by them as possessed of a capital in money, or its equivalent, in property, equal to the par value of its capital stock, every person dealing with it, unless otherwise advised, has a right to extend credit to it on the faith of the fact that its capital stock has been so paid, and that the money or its equivalent in property will be forthcoming to respond to his legitimate demands. In short, that it is the duty of the stockholder, and not of the creditor, to see that it is so paid."

[5] IV. In the case at bar the incorporators of the Henseler Mercantile Oil & Supply Company stated in the articles of incorporation, in the language of the statute, that $50,000 of the capital stock of this company had been paid up in lawful money of the United States. The creditors had a right to rely upon that statement. Therefore, when the receiver showed that this statement was false, and that the incorporators had not paid up the $50,000 in lawful money of the United States, but in truth had merely transferred to the new company property with a real value of some $7,000 and good will, in payment of the remainder of the $50,000, then the duty devolved upon appellants to show that what was called good will was in fact a real asset, and had a value equal to the value placed on it in their books, to wit, $30,433.10 (afterwards increased to $34,268.73). A portion of the $50,000 capital stock was never paid up, even by good will. This is evident from the following facts: Some of the defendants were owners of the Geo. Henseler Oil Company, others were owners of the Mercantile Oil & Supply Company. The two sets got together. As a result, all the assets of the two companies were transferred to defendants, including appellants, and these in turn transferred them to the new company, and received back 500 shares of its stock as full paid. The assets of the Geo. Henseler Oil Company were set out in the books of the new company as amounting to $25,000, in which was included good will at a valuation of $14,143. However, in the agreement by which these assets were turned over to the new company it was further provided that the new company should pay the debts of the Geo. Henseler Oil Company, amounting to $7,606.75. Some of these accounts receivable were worthless. When these accounts and the amount of liabilities assumed by the new company of the Geo. Henseler Oil Company were deducted from the real assets, it left net assets actually turned over to the new company by the Geo. Henseler Oil Company, good will, of course, excluded, of only $2,219.56.

The assets of the Mercantile Oil & Supply Company, also transferred to the new company, were entered on the books of the Henseler Mercantile Oil & Supply Company at $25,000, and include good will, $16,290, and other assets, $8,710, but included in these assets are a number of accounts worthless at the time, and subsequently charged to good will so as to increase the amount of good will on the books. Deducting these bad accounts from the real assets left net real assets of $5,592.55. From this is to be deducted a dividend paid to the stockholders of the Mercantile Oil & Supply Company by the new company, under an agreement to that effect, amounting to $800, making real net assets received by the new company from the Mercantile Oil & Supply Company of only $4,792.55. We have therefore, in the first instance, capital stock to the extent of $30,483, represented by alleged good will of the two constituent companies, afterwards, to the extent of $34,268.73, being the aggregate debts of the Geo. Henseler Oil Company, the dividend paid to stockholders of the Mercantile Oil & Supply Company, worthless accounts receivable of the Mercantile Oil & Supply Company, and the remainder, $7,012.11, which represents tangible assets of approximately that value.

[6] Conceding, therefore, that the capital stock of the corporation may be represented by good will of constituent companies where no money passes, and that all the stockholders of the constituent companies become stockholders of the new company, did these constituent companies have any real good will? There was no competent proof offered of the value of the good will of either of these companies. One witness, it is true, testified that he thought the good will of the Mercantile Oil & Supply Company was worth $15,000, because that company had always paid a dividend, and had also paid its debts. In this statement he evidently ignored the fact that these dividends had been paid out of the capital stock, as is sometimes done in mushroom organizations, to which class none of these companies, it is but fair to say, belonged. The position of the receiver was that the good will of a company can only be estimated by the results of its business operations from the time it commences until it ceases to do business; and, where the consolidated company, as here, was controlled and managed by the same people as those who managed and controlled the constituent companies, good will may also be shown by the results of the business operations of the consolidated company. The books of these companies showed that the Geo. Henseler Oil Company started out with a paid-up capital stock of $10,000, and that after five years' operation it wound up with assets of only $2,219.56. The Mercantile Oil & Supply Company commenced business with a paid-up capital of $30,000, of which $15,000 was preferred and $15,000 was common stock. The common stock paid no dividends, but during the five years of operation the preferred stock paid a dividend of 8 per cent. At the close of these five years of business the net assets of this company amounted to only $4,792.55. Inasmuch as during that period the company paid out to its stockholders $5,200 in dividends, it is proper, in order to arrive at the total loss, to add this to the assets above stated, making $9,992.55. Deducting this from the $30,000 assets with which the company started, leaves a balance of $20,006, which represents the net loss of the company in five years of operation. The two companies, therefore, during their business lives show an operating loss in the one case of 77 per cent. and in the other case 66 per cent. of their respective capitalizations. Under this state of facts the companies can hardly be said to have had a good will which can be represented by dollars and cents when the continued business was managed by the same persons as when operated at the loss stated. It was further shown that the consolidated business with the added good will of the former companies, when operated by the same persons who had owned and operated said former companies, resulted in no profit, but, on the contrary, suffered a net loss in its five years of business.

We have defined good will to be "the advantage or benefit * * * acquired by an establishment beyond the mere value of the capital stock, funds, or property employed therein, in consequence of the general public patronage," etc. Milling Co. v. Hanebrink, 247 Mo. loc. cit. 221, 152 S. W. 357, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 875. If in consequence of the general public patronage such declared advantage or benefit turns out to be a disadvantage and a loss, then the good will becomes nothing more than a purely imaginary quantity. Paraphrasing a Pauline mysticism, it is neither "the substance of things hoped for nor the evidence of things not seen." Heb. 11:1.

V. During the five years of business, although this company possessed wagons, horses, tools, oil stations, etc., yet it charged nothing off for loss, depreciation, or waste, except $90 for the loss of a horse. Everything else it owned or possessed was carried during the five years of business at original cost. The loss which, according to its books, was due to operation, is much less than the actual loss. An expert accountant found that there was an actual deficit or difference between assets and liabilities of $13,302.68. As we have shown, the company commenced business with real assets of about $7,000. Five years later, when the books were examined, not only had the capital stock been dissipated, but the company owed $13,000 more than it had assets. Therefore there was a total loss during this period of $20,314.79. While this was but the estimate of an experienced accountant, the events proved it to be fairly accurate, and tallied with that made by the receiver two years afterwards.

[7] VI. The sale of their unpaid stock by certain of the appellants before the institution of this suit will not relieve them from liability to the creditors of the company for their respective balances due on such stock. Eyerman v. Kriekhaus, 7 Mo. App. loc. cit. 457; Epstein v. Clothing Co., 87 Mo. App. loc. cit. 228.

We have thus reviewed the facts to enable it to be determined whether there was a payment in any manner by these appellants of the amounts they respectively obligated themselves to pay upon their subscription for and the issuance to them of the shares of their stock. We do not find that the stock was paid for either "in money, meal, or malt;" and, if good will be held to be property, however its existence may be ascertained, it constitutes no factor in the determination of the matter at issue because it did not exist; if it did exist its value was negligible.

Under no view of the facts in this case have appellants interposed a meritorious defense, and the judgment of the trial court is therefore affirmed.

All concur.

COSHOW et al. v. OTEY. (No. 20942.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Evidence §278—Admissions of decedent as to gift admissible to characterize defendant's possession.

In ejectment by devisees against defendant, a negro, claiming to have been given the land by testator, and to have acquired title by adverse possession, testimony as to testator's declarations or admissions that the land was defendant's, and that he (testator) had given it to him, held admissible as characterizing defendant's possession.

2. Adverse possession §64—Possession under parol gift is adverse.

Possession under a parol gift is adverse, not permissive.

3. Adverse possession §106(4)—Ten years gives title.

One who holds open, notorious, continued, uninterrupted, adverse, and actual possession of realty for 10 years or more acquires legal title as fully as if he held deed from the owner.

4. Adverse possession §55—Death of owner does not interrupt adverse possession.

If defendant had adverse possession of realty owned by plaintiff's predecessor prior to such predecessor's death, and after the death continued in such possession and held it for the 10 years last before commencement of plaintiff's ejectment suit, defendant acquired title, as the death did not stop the running of the statute.

5. Adverse possession §116(5)—Instruction held not erroneous, as authorizing finding title passed by gift.

In ejectment by devisees against defendant, a negro, claiming by adverse possession, instruction that if testator gave the property to defendant absolutely, and defendant, before testator's death, took possession pursuant to the gift, and such possession was adverse and continued for 10 years last before commencement of suit, defendant acquired title, was not erroneous, as authorizing the jury to find that title passed to defendant by the gift.

6. Trial §260(1)—Instruction need not be repeated on request.

An instruction, fully and completely covered by another given at the party's request, was properly refused.

7. Trial §243—Instructions presenting conflicting theories of proof not in conflict.

Two lines of instructions, following conflicting proof, and presenting fully the two theories of the case, are not in conflict.

Appeal from Circuit Court, St. Charles County; Edgar B. Woolfolk, Judge.

Action in ejectment by John W. Coshaw and others against Orlaney Otey. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

C. W. & J. W. Wilson, of St. Charles, for appellants.

Theodore C. Bruere, of St. Charles, for respondent.

GRAVES, J. Action in ejectment for two small tracts of land (aggregating less than 45 acres) in St. Charles county. The petition is in usual form, alleging ouster of plaintiffs by defendant on March 2, 1916, and alleging rents and profits to be $10 per month, and damages at $50. The answer upon which the trial was had was a third amended answer, and consisted of the following defenses: (1) An admission of possession and a denial of all other matters of the petition; (2) plea of the 10-year statute of limitation; (3) plea of the 24-year statute of limitation; (4) title in defendant by open, notorious, continuous, and adverse possession for a period of 10 years. Whilst there are some reiterations, the foregoing cover the defenses made. Reply was a general denial. Upon a trial before a jury the defendant had a verdict in his favor, and from the judgment entered upon such verdict the plaintiffs have appealed.

No formal assignments of error are made in the brief for appellants but under their heading of "Points and Authorities" it is said that the court committed "reversible error" in the following particulars: (1) In admitting the evidence to the effect that Alonzo B. Howell under whose will plaintiffs claim title stated in his lifetime that he had given the property to defendant; (2) in giving instructions Nos. 1, 2, and 3 for defendant; (3) in giving conflicting instructions; and (4) in refusing instruction No. 8 as asked by plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs in this case are trustees under the will of Alonzo B. Howell, by the terms of which he gave:

"All the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, both real, personal and mixed, I give, devise and bequeath to Wm. M. Stewart, Mike Sutton, John W. Coshow, Isaac N. Howell, and John Burton, as trustees, and to their successors in office and trust forever, for the purpose of organizing and incorporating themselves into a cemetery association under the laws of the state of Missouri, said trustees and their successors to set apart such of my real estate as in their judgment may be necessary, including the old family burial ground, where my father and mother and many of their descendants and relatives are buried, for cemetery purposes. And said trustees and their successors are hereby empowered to make such rules and regulations in reference to said cemetery as in their wisdom and judgment may be just and proper. And I hereby give and grant to said trustees authority and power to use the net income, rents and profits arising from my said estate for the purpose of improving, decorating, adorning and enlarging said cemetery grounds. And for all services rendered by them, or any of them, in their capacity as such, they are to be paid out of said income, so that no part of the principal of my estate shall be encroached upon at any time, unless the same be required for such improvements."

By a codicil this was later modified thus:

"Now, I, the said Alonzo B. Howell, do make this codicil to my said will, and I do hereby revoke said provision in reference to said cemetery association as a corporation under the laws of the state of Missouri and also as to Isaac N. Howell as one of the trustees, and I hereby appoint Wm. M. Stewart, John W. Coshow, Mike Sutton and John Burton as trustees for the care, improvement and such maintenance of said cemetery as is directed in my said will, except that they shall not be required to organize as a cemetery association under the laws of the state of Missouri. And I direct that my executor shall, as soon as convenient after my decease, pay to said trustees, Wm. M. Stewart, Mike Sutton and John Burton, for their services as said trustees, fifty dollars each, and to John W. Coshow five hundred dollars for his services as such trustee."

The paper title to the land in dispute was in Alonzo B. Howell at the date of his death in January, 1902, and his estate was finally settled in May, 1904. The instant suit was brought May 4, 1916. There is no dispute as to the fact that the property described in the petition is in the possession of the defendant. On the other hand the proof for the defendant tends to show that defendant had been in the open, notorious, hostile, and adverse possession of the land for much more than 10 years. The defendant is a colored man, and the son of a former slave of the said Alonzo Howell, and whilst living upon the land in dispute worked more or less for Mr. Howell. There is much substantial evidence showing that defendant has had the land fenced for more than 25 years, and has lived upon, cultivated, and improved it during that time. He paid no rent during the lifetime of Howell, and none since although there was a slight attempt to show payment of rent a time or two since the death of Howell; but there is not much substance to this portion of the evidence. The evidence is ample to support the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the court in the cause should be affirmed, unless there is some substance in the assignments of error. These, and the pertinent facts pertaining thereto, we leave to the opinion.

[1] I. The plaintiffs in this case stand in the shoes of Alonzo B. Howell. The evidence to which plaintiffs objected, and of which complaint is now made, is in the nature of admissions by Howell that he had given the land to Otey. There is no question that Otey went into possession and made valuable improvements thereon in the lifetime of Howell. A sample of the testimony now complained of will serve a good purpose here. Witness Huning was on the stand for defendant, and said:

"Q. Now, Mr. Huning, I will ask you whether you had any conversation with Mr. Howell with reference to the property that was on the eastern side of this fence that ran along the west boundary of this in controversy.

"Mr. Bruere: Mr. Wilson takes the position as to adverse possession. It's clear that, if the ancestor disclaims any right to this property and makes the statement that the property does not belong to him, but belongs to the other man, and disclaims any right of ownership, that it is admissible.

"The Court: If that is what you propose to show, the court will overrule the objection.

"Mr. Bruere: That is what I want to show by this witness.

"Mr. Wilson: We except to the ruling of the court for the reasons indicated.

"The Court: Proceed.

"Q. Just state what that conversation was. A. My father was cutting board timber over there and only was to get the black oak.

"Mr. Wilson: That's not giving the statement or conversation with Mr. Howell. We object to it.

"The Court: Sustained. State what was said.

"A. Of course, on the west side of Uncle Alonzo's house, that was in the pasture, the black oak timber was without, and, of course, he had told him not to take anything but black oak, and—

"Mr. Wilson: We object to that.

"The Court: State what was said—what Mr. Howell said. A. He asked Mr. Howell whether he could get the black oak on the other side of the house—

"Q. What do you mean by that? A. Over across the fence.

"Q. That is where Otey was? A. Yes, sir; and he said not to take anything there; that belonged to Otey and wasn't his, and not to go over there to cut any.

"Q. Who said that? A. Mr. Howell."

And further the same witness said:

"Q. Now, you say, when you went to see Mr. Howell, to ask permission to cut board timber directly over across the fence, it was the fence as it existed at that time? A. There was a fence there at that time when I went there.

"Q. And he told you not to go across the fence that was Otey's? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And that occurred Otey was living there on that place that time, was he? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And that occurred how long ago; 25 or 30 years ago? A. That was the last year I was living there; that's about 27 or 28 years ago."

Another witness said:

"The Court: Just state the conversation, whatever it was. A. Well, I was trading with him on some corn there, and he made me a price, and I told him that I couldn't haul that corn at the price, unless he would take off enough to pay me to haul it, and he said he couldn't well do that; and I said, 'Haven't you got any one to haul it?' and he said, 'I have no one but a nigger, and he is busy now, and I couldn't get him;' and I said, 'What nigger?' and he said 'Orlaney Otey, that lives over here on a piece of land I gave him.' That was the conversation."

The foregoing has reference to a conversation with Mr. Howell at Howell's place.

A brother of the defendant testified:

"Q. Did you ever have a talk with Alonzo Howell with reference to this place—the ownership of this place? A. Yes, sir.

"Mr. Wilson: If the court please, we object to this testimony for the reasons already interposed.

"The Court: Overruled. (To which ruling of the court the plaintiffs, by counsel, then and there duly excepted, and saved their exceptions.)

"A. I went over there to work on Orlaney's place one time. Orlaney couldn't go, and he sent me to work in his place, and when I started away 'Marse Alonzo,' as we always addressed him, told me, he says, 'Now,' he says, 'I have given Orlaney a home,' he says; 'that's his, and I have nothing to do with it.'"

The foregoing is the character of the testimony to which the appellants lodge their assignment of error. Evidence of this character was recognized as proper in the case of Allen v. Mansfield, 108 Mo. loc. cit. 348, 350, 18 S. W. 901. That was an action in ejectment, as here, and among other defenses was that of adverse possession. Black, J., in discussing the matter at page 348 of 108 Mo., at page 902 of 18 S. W., supra, said:

"It is to be observed in the first place that there is no evidence of improvements made by the alleged donee, or other circumstances to take the alleged parol gift out of the statute of frauds. As stated by counsel for the defendant, it is title by adverse possession, not by gift, which will defeat the plaintiff. Continuous adverse possession under a parol gift for the statutory period will not only constitute a perfect defense, as against the donor and those claiming under him, but it will confer title upon the donee. Campbell v. Braden, 96 Pa. St. 388; Moore v. Webb, 2 B. Mon. (Ky.) 282; Outcalt v. Ludlow, 32 N. J. L. 239; Sumner v. Stevens, 6 Metc. (Mass.) 337; Clark v. Gilbert, 39 Conn. 94."

In the Allen Case the judgment for the defendant was reversed and the cause remanded, but not upon the point involved here. And in that case at page 350 of 108 Mo., at page 903 of 18 S. W., this court quotes approvingly from the Supreme Court of Connecticut thus:

"As said in Clark v. Gilbert, supra: 'Much has been said about an open, notorious possession, but such expressions are not applicable to a case like this. Possession taken under a parol gift is adverse in the donee against the donor, and, if continued for 15 years, perfects the title of the donee as against the donor. The donor in such cases, not only knows that the possession is adverse, but intends it to be, and there is no occasion for any notoriety. Notoriety is only important where the adverse character of the possession is to be brought home to the owner by presumption. Of course, where it is shown that he had actual knowledge that the possession was under claim of title, and therefore adverse, openness and notoriety are unimportant, for no other person has any legal interest in the question or right to be informed by notoriety or otherwise.' See, also, Sedg. & Wait on Trial of Land Titles (2d Ed.) § 735. On these grounds the Rannels Case can stand without question or doubt, for there was, as against the donor, sufficient actual possession of the whole tract, and color of title was not necessary to a complete defense, and that case stands on no other grounds."

So in the case at bar. For long years before Howell's death, defendant had the land in question under fence and in his possession. Howell lived close by, and was advised of what defendant was doing. He saw defendant improve and use the property, and these admissions of the deceased characterized the possession of defendant, and were proper.

[2] II. To follow the question above discussed a little further: The defendant had the right to show the character of his possession by the admissions of the donor, if there was in fact a parol gift. These admissions were made in the very presence of the defendant's possession. The evidence fixes the time of the possession as being more than 10 years prior to the death of the alleged donor, and for more than 10 years after his death. In the case of Int. Bank of St. Louis v. Fife, 95 Mo. loc. cit. 126, 8 S. W. 244, it is said:

"Where an absolute and unqualified donee in fee takes possession of lands under a parol gift, his possession is thenceforth adverse to the donor. Authorities are numerous to that effect, and among others the case of Rannells v. Rannells, 52 Mo. 109, where it is said that the donee is to be regarded as holding adversely to the donor 'from the very inception of her entry under the parol gift.'"

So that in this case the admissions of deceased were certainly proper, under the pleadings before us, to characterize the possession of the defendant, as suggested, supra. These admissions tended to show adverse rather than permissive possession, because possession under a parol gift is adverse and not permissive.

III. The three instructions given for the defendant, which are complained of in this court read:

"Defendant's Instruction No. 1.—The court instructs the jury that one who holds the open, notorious, continued, uninterrupted, adverse, and actual possession of real estate for a period of 10 years or more acquires the legal title to the property as fully as if he had acquired the same by deed from the owner; therefore, if you believe from the evidence that the defendant has held the open, notorious, continuous, uninterrupted, adverse, and actual possession of the premises described in the petition prior to the death of Alonzo Howell, and that such possession continued, and the defendant was in the visible, notorious, continued, actual, and adverse possession of the premises described in the petition, for a period of more than 10 years preceding the institution of this action, you must find for the defendant.

"Defendant's Instruction No. 2.—If the jury believe from the evidence that Alonzo Howell gave the property in question to the defendant absolutely and unqualifiedly, and that the defendant, prior to the death of Alonzo Howell, took possession, pursuant to such gift, of the premises described in the petition, claiming title according to such gift, and that such possession was visible, notorious, continued, adverse and actual, and that such possession continued for a period of 10 years next before the commencement of this suit, and that such possession was visible, notorious, continued, adverse, and actual for that period, then the jury should find for the defendant. (Given.)

"Defendant's Instruction No. 3.—If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant had the exclusive, visible, notorious, continued, and actual adverse possession of the premises in controversy prior to the death of Alonzo Howell, and that the defendant, after the death of Alonzo Howell, continued in such possession, and had and held the visible, exclusive, notorious, continued, and actual adverse possession of the premises in controversy for a period of 10 years next before the commencement of this suit, they will find for the defendant. (Given.)"

[3, 4] Instructions 1 and 3, supra, are proper declarations of law, where there is evidence tending to show continuous adverse possession for the statutory period. As we have suggested there is such evidence: (1) To show continuous adverse possession for the statutory period prior to Howell's death; and (2) to show continuous adverse possession for the statutory period after his death. The death of Howell did not stop the running of the statute, and instruction No. 3 was intended to make that matter clear. These are stock instructions on adverse possession. The plaintiffs by their own instructions, Nos. 1, 2, 5, 6, and 7, recognized that the question of adverse possession was one for the jury, by the use of such clauses as:

"Unless the defendant has acquired title by adverse possession of the said tract of land, as explained in the instructions in this case, for a period of 10 years next before the commencement of this suit."

The argument before this court was not in criticism of these two instructions, but was directed to instruction No. 2, supra. There is a bit of testimony tending to show that the possession of the defendant was merely permissive, and that he held under the grantor of plaintiffs. This should be borne in mind in the discussion of this instruction. In fact, this permissive character of defendants' possession was submitted to the jury by plaintiffs' instructions, and the fact found against them.

[5] The portion of this instruction 2, which is complained of here, is that part which authorizes the jury to consider the fact as to whether or not the deceased had given the land to defendant. As used in this instruction, this clause simply meant that the oral gift would make the possession taken thereunder adverse, and not permissive. The whole instruction, when read, so indicates. It is clear that the instruction did not authorize the jury to find title in defendant by and through the oral gift, but only authorized the jury to determine the matter of an oral gift, as bearing upon the questions of adverse or permissive possession. The instruction was proper, as was the evidence as to a gift, and for the same reason, supra.

[6] IV. The refusal of instruction No. 8 for the plaintiffs was proper. It was fully and completely covered by their instruction No. 3, already given by the court. The two instructions have but to be read, to show that they cover the same questions.

[7] Nor is there substance in the charge that there was a conflict in the instructions. There were two lines of instructions, as there would be on conflicting proof; but they present fully the two theories of the case. Plaintiffs contended that defendant's possession was under the deceased, and not adverse. Defendant contended that the possession was adverse. The two lines of instructions properly presented the respective theories, and were not in any sense conflicting.

There was no error in the trial, and the judgment is affirmed.

All concur, except WOODSON, J., who is absent.

STEWART v. OMAHA LOAN & TRUST CO. et al. (No. 20879.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2,
June 4, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 25,
1920.)

1. Judgment \S 248—Relief in suit to quiet title measured by pleadings.

In view of Rev. St. 1909, §§ 2535 and 2536, the rules of procedure in suits to quiet title are the same as in other civil actions, and the relief afforded is to be measured by the pleadings in each particular case.

2. Quietling title \S 43—Defense should have been limited to issues raised by pleading.

In an action to quiet title, where defendants' answer denies plaintiff's ownership and alleges deed of trust to secure defendants' note is a prior lien over plaintiff's claim, right, and title, and asks its foreclosure, the defense should have been limited to such issues which did not authorize the issue of the postponement of trust deed under foreclosure of which plaintiff claims title by purchase on foreclosure to that of defendant.

3. Appeal and error \S 232(1½)—Objection that pleadings did not warrant determination held not raised by objection to documentary evidence.

In suit to quiet title, objection that the pleadings did not warrant a determination as to the priority of trust deeds was not made by mere objection to documentary evidence which did not bear on such question.

4. Appeal and error \S 171(3)—Theory of case below adhered to.

Where parties proceeded as though pleadings in suit to quiet title warranted determination of priority of trust deeds, case on appeal will be tried on same theory.

5. Mortgages \S 151(2)—Of two trust deeds by same grantor that securing note maturing first had priority.

Where two mortgages or deeds of trust are simultaneously executed by the same grantor to secure different notes to the same grantee, the effect is the same as if one mortgage or deed of trust had been executed to secure the notes maturing at different times so that the trust deed securing the first maturing note has priority.

6. Mortgages \S 372(1)—Agreement as to which of two trust deeds shall be prior not binding upon purchaser on foreclosure.

Plaintiff, claiming under purchaser on foreclosure of trust deed, is not bound by any agreement between the original payee of the notes and grantee of such deeds as to priority, where neither purchaser at foreclosure nor any subsequent purchaser, including plaintiff, had knowledge of such agreement, and the burden was upon defendants to show notice.

7. Mortgages \S 275—Where purchaser upon foreclosure excepted from covenants in his deed another trust deed, his successor was not estopped thereby.

Where purchaser of land, upon foreclosure of one of two trust deeds simultaneously executed by grantor to same grantee, excepted in covenants of a warranty deed to another the other deed of trust, such act only operated to except it from such covenants, and did not estop plaintiff from contesting the lien of such excepted trust deed.

8. Evidence \S 383(7)—Plaintiff not bound by deeds to which he is not a party.

Plaintiff seeking to quiet title is not bound by recitals in deeds to which he was not a party and under which he does not claim.

9. Mortgages \S 171(1)—Mortgages whose note matures subsequent to that under trust deed of equal date has constructive notice of priority.

Where grantor granted the same grantee deeds of trust securing notes maturing at different times, the record of the trust deeds constituted notice of the matters recorded, and, where there was nothing to indicate which was given priority, the party purchasing the last maturing note took with constructive notice of the other's priority.

10. Quietling title \S 30(3)—Prior deed of trust holder not required to make owners of later trust deed parties.

Plaintiff, claiming through purchaser under foreclosure of prior deed of trust, was not required to make owners of subsequent deed of trust parties to action to quiet title.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Texas County;
L. B. Woodside, Judge.

Suit to quiet title by John D. Stewart against the Omaha Loan & Trust Company and others, in which a judgment was rendered by default, and within three years thereafter James Corbett, as administrator of the estate of Eliza J. Leverich, deceased, petitioned to set aside the judgment finding plaintiff the owner in fee, and alleged that deceased held a note secured by deed of trust on the land. On hearing the judgment was set aside, and the administrator permitted to plead to plaintiff's petition. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Barton & Impey and Hiatt & Scott, all of Houston, and H. H. Baldrige, for appellants.

Lamar, Lamar & Lamar, of Houston, for respondent.

WALKER, J. This is a suit to quiet title to certain land in Texas county. The plaintiff prevailed below, and the defendants have appealed. In April, 1901, Edwin McNinch and wife, the owners of the land in question, executed certain notes of even date to the Omaha Loan & Trust Company, three aggregating $140, due respectively April 1, 1902, April 1, 1903, and April 1, 1904, and one other note for $1,000 due April 1, 1908. To secure the payment of these notes the makers executed to the payee two separate deeds of trust, one to secure the payment of the three notes aggregating $140, and the other to secure the payment of the note for $1,000. The same person was named as trustee in each. These deeds were acknowledged on the same day, and subsequently they were simultaneously filed for record in the office of the recorder of deeds for Texas county. In neither is there any reference to the other, nor is there anything other than the respective dates of maturity of the notes therein described, if such can be so construed, to indicate a priority of lien of one over the other. On the 13th day of August, 1904, the deed of trust securing the payment of the three notes for $140 was foreclosed, the land sold, and one W. F. Cunningham became the purchaser. Two years later he conveyed the land by deed of general warranty to Byron De Forrest and Frank Mautz. The grantor covenants in this deed "against all claims, etc., except a deed of trust to the Omaha Loan & Trust Company and to G. P. Rodgers and judgments in Housedon suits." In December, 1909, Frank Mautz and wife conveyed the land by quitclaim deed to Byron De Forrest. This deed contains no reference to any incumbrance. Some 10 or 12 days thereafter Byron De Forrest and wife conveyed the land by warranty deed to John D. Stewart, the plaintiff, who instituted the suit on which the appeal herein is based. After service by publication against unknown parties, a judgment by default was rendered, and within three years thereafter, under section 2103, R. S. 1909, the administrator of the estate of Eliza J. Leverich petitioned the court to set aside the judgment in which it had been found that the plaintiff was the owner in fee of the land in question for reasons, among others therein alleged, that Eliza J. Leverich was the owner of the note for $1,000, and the deed of trust on said land to secure the payment of same given April 25, 1901, by Edwin McNinch and wife to the trustee of the Omaha Loan & Trust Company; that said Eliza J. Leverich died testate in New York in February, 1907; that no service in the suit brought by John D. Stewart, the plaintiff herein, in any wise affecting her interest in said land, was ever had upon her or any one representing her other than the attempted service by publication upon unknown parties; that no knowledge concerning said proceeding was ever had by said Eliza J. Leverich; and that the petitioner, her administrator, was not apprised of said suit until a short time before the filing of this petition to set aside the judgment. In brief, the petition contained other allegations appropriate and proper to a pleading of this character, not necessary to be set out herein. The petition prayed in conclusion that all parties in interest, referring specifically to those who had acquired title to portions of said land through the plaintiff, be made parties to this suit, and that the judgment be set aside, and that the petitioner be permitted to plead to plaintiff's petition theretofore filed upon which the judgment of default had been entered. Upon a hearing the court set aside the judgment and permitted the administrator to plead to plaintiff's petition. He thereupon filed an answer and a cross-bill alleging that the note for $1,000 was still due and unpaid, and that the deed of trust to secure the payment of same constituted a prior lien or claim upon said land to the right, title, and claim of plaintiff, and that the deed of trust to secure the payment of the $1,000 note be foreclosed on account of its alleged priority as a lien. The sufficiency of the pleadings is not a matter at issue except in so far as plaintiff's contention is concerned that the answer does not plead any facts which would authorize a court of equity to subordinate the lien of the deed of trust under which plaintiff claims to that under which the defendant claims. Aside from this contention, the vexing question is as to which of the two deeds of trust is entitled to priority.

The appellant relies for a reversal upon the following errors:

(1) The court erred in finding the issues for the plaintiff and in rendering judgment accordingly.

(2) The court erred in excluding evidence offered by defendant to prove that the deed of trust under which defendant claims is a first deed of trust, and that the deed of trust under which plaintiff claims is a second deed of trust.

(3) The court erred in rejecting testimony to prove that when the deed of trust claimed by defendant was sold to Eliza J. Leverich it was represented to her to be a first mortgage.

[1] I. The rules of procedure in suits to quiet title are the same as in other civil actions. This is clearly contemplated by section 2535, R. S. 1909, and is expressly so provided in section 2536, R. S. 1909. This being true, the relief afforded in a proceeding under this statute is to be measured by the pleadings in each particular case. To rule otherwise, as Bond, J., tersely said in Toler v. Edwards, 249 Mo. loc. cit. 160, 155 S. W. 27, would be "to destroy the symmetry of the law." Confirmatory of this conclusion, Lamm, J., said in effect in Wotz v. Venard, 253 Mo. loc. cit. 86, 161 S. W. 765, that this statute is "to be administered in conformity to the code of civil procedure, that is, within the lines of scientific pleading and practice. * * * Any other view would make of that remedial act a fruitful womb of confusion and wrong." The ruling seemingly to the contrary in Noble v. Cates, 230 Mo. loc. cit. 202, 130 S. W. 304, "that defendants in an action based upon this statute may, under a general denial, show as a defense any title, legal or equitable, vested in themselves," does not therefore correctly state the law.

[2-4] The defendants' answer herein denies plaintiff's ownership of the land and alleges generally that the deed of trust thereon to secure the payment of the $1,000 note is a prior lien over plaintiff's claim, right, and title. The remainder of the answer is descriptive of the deed of trust and prays for a foreclosure. The defense should have been limited to the issue thus made. This was not done, and it is now contended by the plaintiff that no facts were pleaded by the defendants which would authorize a court of equity to postpone the lien of the deed of trust under which plaintiff claims to that alleged to be held by defendant administrator, and that he should have been limited in his defense to that made by his answer. As an abstract statement of the rules of procedure this is correct. But the limitation now sought to be imposed is not timely, and was waived by the plaintiff in not objecting at the time to the claim of priority thus interposed. During the trial the plaintiff contented himself with technical objections to the introduction of certain evidence, principally documentary, but having no tendency to determine the question of priority between the two deeds of trust. The trial was conducted as though the answer had set up the equitable defense now objected to by the plaintiff. The case will be reviewed, therefore, upon the theory sanctioned by the parties and recognized by the trial court. McMurray v. McMurray, 258 Mo. loc. cit. 416, 167 S. W. 513; Honea v. Railroad, 245 Mo. loc. cit. 645, 151 S. W. 119; Brier v. Bank, 225 Mo. loc. cit. 684, 125 S. W. 469; Williams v. Railroad, 233 Mo. loc. cit. 675, 136 S. W. 304; Degonia v. Railroad, 224 Mo. loc. cit. 588, 123 S. W. 807; Riggs v. Metro.

Ry. Co., 216 Mo. loc. cit. 304, 115 S. W. 969; Hof v. Transit Co., 213 Mo. loc. cit. 470, 111 S. W. 1106; Taylor & Sons v. Railroad, 213 Mo. loc. cit. 726, 112 S. W. 59; Earls v. Earls (App.) 182 S. W. 1020.

When a case has been tried without the objection that the pleadings did not raise a certain issue, this objection, when made for the first time in the appellate court, will not be entertained. But two exceptions may be noted to this rule, one that of the court's jurisdiction, and the other that a cause of action has not been stated. These cardinal defects are not affected by waiver, and may be raised at any time. Williams v. Keef, 241 Mo. loc. cit. 375, 145 S. W. 425; Jackson v. Johnson, 248 Mo. 692, 154 S. W. 759. In view of all of which we need not further concern ourselves with the limitations now sought by plaintiff to be placed upon the defendants' right to persist here in the attitude which, free from plaintiff's challenge, was maintained in the trial court. 3 C. J. § 621, p. 725.

[5] II. Under well-established principles of law there can be no controversy as to the purpose for which the deeds of trust were given, which was to secure the payment of the notes described in each. Anderson v. Baumgartner, 27 Mo. loc. cit. 87; Potter v. Stevens, 40 Mo. 229; Allen v. Goodrich, 111 Mo. App. 61, 85 S. W. 910; Watson v. Hawkins, 60 Mo. 550. To effect this purpose it was provided in each of these deeds in the conventional terms employed in instruments of this character that upon default in the payment of the notes therein described the land should be sold to satisfy same. These provisions, in the absence of prior equities or any express condition to the contrary, gave the deed of trust securing the notes first maturing priority. Otherwise the purpose for which the deeds were given would be rendered ineffectual. This for the reason that a note constitutes the obligation and defines its terms, while a deed of trust is merely collateral and is intended to secure the payment of the note. Morgan v. Martien, 32 Mo. 438; Owings v. McKenzie, 133 Mo. 323, 33 S. W. 802, 40 L. R. A. 154; Frye v. Shepherd, 173 Mo. App. loc. cit. 209, 158 S. W. 717; Board of Trustees v. Pelsol, 161 Mo. 270, 61 S. W. 811. This conclusion as to priority is based upon what is termed the earlier maturing rule, recognized as controlling in this state as contradistinguished from the pro rata and prior assignment rules which obtain in some other jurisdictions. The earlier maturing rule was first definitely promulgated in this state in Mitchell v. Ladew, 36 Mo. 526, 88 Am. Dec. 156, to the effect that notes secured by the same deed of trust have priority in the order in which they fall due. Subsequent rulings under which the minor facts are different conform to his rule. To illustrate: In Thompson v. Field, 88 Mo. 320, several notes, in the hands of different assignees, were secured by the same mortgage and fell due at different times. They were held to be payable out of the proceeds of the sale of the property in the order in which they fell due. In Hurck v. Erskine, 45 Mo. 485, we held that the assignee of an earlier maturing note was entitled, as against the mortgagee holding other notes, to priority in the proceeds of the sale of trust property, even though the latter's notes had become due by their own terms before the action was commenced. Ellis v. Lamme, 42 Mo. 153, does not announce a contrary doctrine. In that case there was an express provision in the deed that a later maturing note should be first paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the property, thus showing that the primary object of the deed was to protect the independent sureties on the later maturing note. Following the earlier maturing rule, the Kansas City Court of Appeals, in Freeman v. Elliott, 48 Mo. App. 74, held that, where two notes secured by the same deed of trust are made payable to two separate payees, the rule of priority in the order of maturity will apply, despite the terms of the deed that both notes become due on default in the payment of either. The St. Louis Court of Appeals, in Weary v. Wittmer, 77 Mo. App. 546, held that priority of maturity authorized a presumption of priority of payment; and, to overthrow this presumption, the burden was on the appellant to show that the notes first maturing had been paid, or that the plaintiff was estopped to assert priority of payment.

In these cases a single mortgage or deed of trust was given to secure several notes. The rule of priority cannot, however, be held in reason to be different where, as here, separate deeds of trust were given, each to secure the notes therein described. We held in the early case of Thayer v. Campbell, 9 Mo. 280, where a mortgage was executed to secure three distinct debts, that although there was but a single deed of conveyance, yet, as it was executed to secure three several and distinct debts due to three several individuals, it must be regarded as clearly several in its nature, as if those several instruments had been simultaneously executed. The nature of the security afforded is the same whether one mortgage be given to secure each debt or one be given to secure several, if it be kept in mind that the terms of the obligation must be determined from the note, and that the mortgage or deed of trust is collateral and simply intended to secure payment.

The legal situation, therefore, in the instant case is exactly the same as if McNinch and wife had only executed one deed of trust securing all of these notes. Had the latter been done, it would scarcely be contended, in the face of our uniform rulings on the subject, that if the land described in the deed of trust had been sold after maturity of the first note, the purchaser would have obtained a complete title. The case of Isett v. Lucas, 17 Iowa, 503, 85 Am. Dec. 572, is so nearly parallel in all its material features with the case at bar that a statement of the facts and the conclusions reached by the court in regard thereto are not inappropriate. The proceeding was to foreclose a mortgage. One Hall purchased of Patterson certain land, giving his two notes payable in one and two years and mortgages to secure each of same. Patterson assigned one of the notes to Tufts. Patterson subsequently obtained judgment of foreclosure against Hall, the maker, on the note first due, no other persons being parties to the proceeding. He assigned this judgment to Lucas. Tufts sold the note last due to Isett and Brewster, who brought this suit to foreclose against Hall and Lucas, claiming that the agreement between Hall and Patterson was that the two mortgages were to be equal liens, and that neither was to have priority over the other. The court, in ruling upon these facts, said:

"Independent of any legal and binding agreement, where a mortgage is executed to secure two or more notes maturing at different times, the proceeds arising from a foreclosure of the mortgaged premises should be applied to the payment of the notes in the order in which they fall due. The different installments in a mortgage securing such notes are regarded as so many successive mortgages, each having priority according to the time of its maturity; and where, instead of one mortgage being executed to secure several notes given for the same indebtedness, a separate mortgage is given to secure each note, the rights of the parties are identical. [Citing cases.] Whether the notes thus secured are retained by the payee and mortgagee, or are assigned to different parties, the right of priority of payment still attaches to them; nor does the time of or order in which they are assigned affect such right of priority.

"The legal effect, then, of executing two mortgages to secure installments of the same debt, being to give priority as to the proceeds of the mortgaged property to the installments first due, such legal effect cannot be altered or varied by parol testimony, any more than the language of the written instrument itself. [Citing cases.] The parol testimony of Hall, therefore, as to the agreement between him and Patterson in relation to the two mortgages being equal liens, neither to have priority over the other, which is contrary to the legal effect of the mortgages themselves, is incompetent, and cannot be considered for the purpose of altering or varying such legal effect and priority."

Under this ruling, which is in accord, in principle, with our own cases, the conclusion is authorized that, where two mortgages or deeds of trust are simultaneously executed by the same grantor to secure different notes to the same grantee, the legal effect is the same as if one mortgage or deed of trust had been executed to secure notes maturing at different times. Schultz v. Plankinton Bank, 141 Ill. 116, 30 N. E. 346, 38 Am. St. Rep. 290;

Alden v. White, 32 Ind. App. 671, 66 N. E. 509, 67 N. E. 949, 102 Am. St. Rep. 261; 1 Jones, Mortgages (5th Ed.) § 607.

[6] III. Granting, as we have on account of the manner in which the case was tried, the defendants' right to insist here upon the postponement of the lien of the deed of trust securing the notes first maturing to that securing the payment of the $1,000 note, the plaintiff cannot be held to be bound by any agreement which may have been made between the original payee in all of said notes, the Omaha Loan & Trust Company, as to the priority of the deeds securing such notes. Neither the purchaser of the land at the foreclosure sale or any subsequent owner, including the plaintiff, had any knowledge of this agreement. Absent actual notice, the title of a purchaser at a foreclosure sale of land cannot be affected by secret equities between third parties. Hume v. Hopkins, 140 Mo. 65, 41 S. W. 784; Powers v. Kueckhoff, 41 Mo. loc. cit. 431, 97 Am. Dec. 231; Beatie v. Butler, 21 Mo. 313, 64 Am. Dec. 234. The agreement referred to seems to have been sedulously withheld from the knowledge of the public until March, 1913, or three years after the foreclosure sale, when its first pronouncement is made in the petition for review and the answer filed by the administrator of Eliza J. Leverich. At the time, therefore, of the foreclosure sale and the purchase of the land by Cunningham, no one other than the parties to the agreement having had any means of knowing that any other than the original payee in all of the notes, to wit: the Omaha Loan & Trust Company, was the owner of same, and the burden being upon the defendants to establish such notice (Hendricks v. Calloway, 211 Mo. loc. cit. 561, 111 S. W. 60; McMurray v. McMurray, 258 Mo. loc. cit. 417, 167 S. W. 513), which they have failed to do, no probative force, as affecting plaintiff's rights, is to be given the testimony in regard to said agreement (Potts v. Smith, 178 S. W. 881).

[7] IV. The excepting of the deed of trust securing the $1,000 note from the covenants of warranty in the deed made by the purchaser, Cunningham, to the land only operated to except it from such covenants, and did not estop plaintiff from contesting the lien of the deed thus excepted. Brooks v. Owen, 112 Mo. loc. cit. 260, 19 S. W. 723, 20 S. W. 492, and cases; Wood v. Broadley, 76 Mo. 23, 43 Am. Rep. 754; Livingstone v. Murphy, 187 Mass. 315, 72 N. E. 1012, 105 Am. St. Rep. 400; Weed Sewing Mach. Co. v. Emerson, 115 Mass. 554; Stough v. Badger Lbr. Co., 70 Kan. 713, 79 Pac. 737; Gerdine v. Menage, 41 Minn. 417, 43 N. W. 91; Calhoun v. Copley, 29 Minn. 471, 13 N. W. 904; Boyer v. Price, 45 Wash. 667, 88 Pac. 1106; Bennett v. Keehn, 67 Wis. 154, 29 N. W. 207, 30 N. W. 112.

ranty to the deeds of trust made by Cunningham to G. P. Rodgers is subject to the same rule, so far as its application to the plaintiff is concerned, as that in regard to the exception in the covenant of warranty in the deed of trust securing the payment of the $1,000 note. Furthermore, the plaintiff was not a party to these deeds, does not claim under them, and cannot be bound by their recitals, nor can the defendant, as the administrator of Eliza J. Leverich, not being a party to these instruments, set up these recitals in his favor. Jones on Mortgages (5th Ed.) § 746, and cases.

[9] The deed of trust given to secure the payment of the $1,000 note upon being recorded, constituted constructive notice of its contents, but the rights of the parties were affected by such notice only to the extent disclosed by the record. There was nothing in the latter to indicate that this deed of trust was to be given priority over the deed under which the foreclosure was had and the land purchased by Cunningham. Powers v. Laffler, 73 Iowa, 283, 34 N. W. 859; Robinson Bank v. Miller, 153 Ill. 244, 38 N. E. 1078, 27 L. R. A. 449, 46 Am. St. Rep. 883.

The two deeds of trust were of record when Eliza J. Leverich is alleged to have purchased the $1,000 note, and she took the same with constructive notice of the priority of the deed securing the notes first maturing. Smith v. Boyd, 162 Mo. 146, 62 S. W. 439; Patton v. Eberhart, 52 Iowa, 67, 2 N. W. 954.

In Patton v. Eberhart, supra, the doctrine is explicitly announced that a mortgagee of real estate is a purchaser within the meaning of the recording laws, and his mortgage, when taken in good faith, is subject only to such prior liens as are of record at the time of the execution of the mortgage. The doctrine thus announced, so far as it relates to the character of the mortgagee's or trustee's interest in the land, is too broadly stated to accord with our rulings. Here a mortgage or a deed of trust, until entry by the mortgagee or trustee for condition broken, is a mere lien for the debt; the substantial ownership remaining in the mortgagor or trustor. Jackson v. Johnson, 248 Mo. 680, 154 S. W. 759; Standard Leather Co. v. Mutual Ins. Co., 131 Mo. App. 701, 111 S. W. 631. When, therefore, the statement appears in our cases, and it is not infrequent, that the legal title after condition broken is vested in the mortgagee or trustee, we do not mean an unlimited investiture of title, but one for effectuating the purpose of the mortgage or trust. Feller v. Lee, 225 Mo. loc. cit. 332, 124 S. W. 1129; Benton Land Co. v. Zeitler, 182 Mo. 251, 81 S. W. 193, 70 L. R. A. 94. However, the latter part of the doctrine as announced in the Patton-Eberhart Case, supra, viz, that within the meaning of the recording laws when a mortgage or deed of trust is taken in good faith it is subject only to such prior equities as are of record at the time, applies with full force in the instant case. There were no prior equities of record, nor did either the purchaser at the foreclosure sale or any subsequent owner of the land in the chain of title through which the plaintiff holds have any knowledge of such equities as were sought to be established at the trial. This conclusion, however, is but a reiteration of that before reached when reviewing the facts from another point of vantage.

[18] The plaintiff was not required to make the parties to the deed of trust to secure the $1,000 note defendants. Thayer v. Campbell, 9 Mo. 280.

Defendants established no equities authorizing a decree in their favor. There were no errors authorizing a reversal, and the judgment of the trial court is therefore affirmed.

All concur.

SPRADLING v. SPRADLING. (No. 21271.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Trusts \S 81(3)—Resulting trust in favor of wife on purchase by husband with her money.

Where a husband purchases land, and pays for it partly with his wife's money, title taken in his own name is held in resulting trust for her in proportion.

2. Trusts \S 89(5)—Resulting trust must be clearly proved.

To establish a resulting trust, the evidence of it must be clear, unequivocal, and so definite as to leave no room for doubt.

3. Trusts \S 89(1)—Evidence held to call for money decree for wife seeking to establish resulting trust.

In a wife's suit against her husband to establish resulting trust in lands in his name as purchased with her funds, evidence held to call for decree for the wife for $220, in lieu of any interest in the realty.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Butler County;
J. P. Foard, Judge.

Suit by Marie Spradling against H. S. Spradling. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

This is a proceeding in equity, brought in the circuit court of Butler county, Mo., to establish a resulting trust in the real estate hereafter described. The petition alleges that on August 18, 1912, plaintiff and defendant were married, and ever since that time have been husband and wife; that for more than a year before the filing of this petition plaintiff and defendant have not lived together as husband and wife, and that a divorce suit is now pending between them; that at the time of said marriage plaintiff was seized and possessed of 80 acres of land in Butler county, Mo., to wit, the north half of the southeast quarter of section 7, township 24 north, range 5 east, of the value of $1,200; and was the owner of personal property in said county of the value of $800; that immediately after said marriage defendant took charge of said property, and was permitted by plaintiff to use and handle the same for her; that on December 8, 1913, at the instance of defendant, said farm was sold, and defendant took charge of the proceeds thereof, amounting to $1,200; that thereafter defendant purchased 80 acres of land in Butler county, Mo., to wit, the east half of the northeast quarter of section 11, township 24 north, range 4 east, and 80 acres of land in Ripley county, Mo., to wit, the east half of the southeast quarter of section 5, township 24, range 4 east; that he took title or bond for title to all of said land in his own name, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, when she was not present; that he disposed of plaintiff's property and paid for said land out of the proceeds thereof. It is further alleged that plaintiff never at any time gave defendant permission, either written or oral, to invest the proceeds of her said property in the land above described and take title thereto in his own name, but, on the contrary, all of said transactions were had without plaintiff's knowledge or consent; that defendant has never reimbursed plaintiff for any of her said property. The petition concludes with a prayer for a decree, declaring a resulting trust as to said land in favor of plaintiff, divesting defendant of the title thereto, vesting the same in plaintiff, and for general relief.

On April 10, 1918, defendant answered with a general denial.

On July 6, 1918, the court entered judgment for defendant. Plaintiff in due time filed her motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and the cause duly appealed by her to this court.

As this is a proceeding in equity, and we are required to pass upon the evidence, in order to avoid repetition, we will consider the testimony and rulings of the court in the opinion.

Henson & Woody, of Poplar Bluff, for appellant.

Hill & Phillips, of Poplar Bluff, for respondent.

RAILEY, C. (after stating the facts as above). 1. This is not a proceeding at law, in which plaintiff seeks to recover a judgment for the value of her property alleged to have been converted by defendant to his own use without her consent. It is not a proceeding in equity, calling for an accounting of trust property belonging to plaintiff, and alleged to have been converted by defendant to his own use without her consent. On the contrary, under the pleadings, this is an action in equity, brought by plaintiff against her husband to establish a resulting trust in the two 80-acre tracts of land described in petition. It is asserted in the latter that defendant acquired possession of plaintiff's personal property and the proceeds of her Butler county real estate; that out of such assets he paid for said 160 acres of land sought to be charged herein. The answer of defendant is a general denial. The case was tried in the circuit court upon above theory, and must be disposed of here in the same manner.

[1] It may be conceded generally in passing that, where a husband purchases land and pays for it partly with the money of his wife, the title thereto, if taken in his own name, is held in trust for her in proportion as the amount of her separate money thus used by him bears to the whole of the purchase price. Holman v. Holman, 188 S. W. 623; Haguewood v. Britain, 273 Mo. loc. cit. 94, 199 S. W. 950; Moess v. Ardrey, 260 Mo. 595, 169 S. W. 6; McLeod v. Venable, 163 Mo. 536, 63 S. W. 847; Jones v. Elkins, 143 Mo. 647, 45 S. W. 261.

[2] 2. It is equally as well settled that, in order to establish a resulting trust in real estate, the evidence of such trust must be clear, unequivocal, and so definite and positive as to leave no room for doubt in the mind of the chancellor. Davis v. Cummins, 195 S. W. loc. cit. 754, 755; Aeby v. Aeby, 192 S. W. loc. cit. 99; Hunnell v. Zinn, 184 S. W. loc. cit. 1156; Ferguson v. Robinson, 258 Mo. 113, 167 S. W. 447; Northrip v. Burge, 255 Mo. loc. cit. 655, 164 S. W. 584; Easter v. Easter, 246 Mo. 409, 151 S. W. 413; Waddle v. Frazier, 245 Mo. 391, 394-396, 151 S. W. 87; Williams v. Keef, 241 Mo. 366, 145 S. W. 425; Smith v. Smith, 201 Mo. 533, 547, 100 S. W. 579; Reed v. Sperry, 193 Mo. loc. cit. 173, 174, 91 S. W. 62; Viers v. Viers, 175 Mo. 444, 75 S. W. 395; Philpot v. Penn, 91 Mo. 38, 3 S. W. 386; Jackson v. Wood, 88 Mo. 76; Forrester v. Scoville, 51 Mo. 268; Johnson v. Quarles, 46 Mo. 423.

3. Turning to the evidence, we find that plaintiff and defendant were married in 1912, and separated in 1916. She claims to have owned, at the time of their marriage, the 80 acres of land in Butler county, Mo., traded to O. J. Livingston, for a stock of goods; also seven or eight head of hogs, harness, some chickens, household goods, and kitchen furniture. Defendant testified that at the time of their marriage he owned a mule and a calf, and had $50 or $60 in his pocket. Plaintiff owned the 80 acres aforesaid, described in her petition, and, with the assistance of defendant, traded the same to O. J. Livingston for said goods, but not the building in which they were located. The land was taken at $1,200. The goods invoiced $2,327.96, and were in a country store building in the western part of Butler county. The difference between the value of the farm and goods was $1,127.96. Plaintiff and defendant executed and delivered to Livingston their joint note for said difference, and secured the same by chattel mortgage on the goods. Plaintiff testified that she bought the store and regarded it as belonging to herself and husband. When defendant was not making ties or engaged in other work, he assisted plaintiff at the store. She testified, that they ran the store for about two years, and that she lost money every month they operated it.

It appears from the evidence that there was paid on the Livingston note during said two years about $500. Livingston then took the remnant of goods back on his indebtedness in March, 1916, at about $900.

Plaintiff testified:

That they lived on part of the proceeds of said goods; that "the money that was deposited in the Farmers' Savings Bank came from the sale of merchandise in the store and was deposited in the name of H. S. Spradling. He said he didn't have any money of his own deposited there at the time." (Italics ours.)

The trade for the store was made in December, 1913. Defendant admits that after they acquired the store the money which he earned, as well as that which was derived from the sale of goods, was deposited in the bank in his name until August, 1915, when he then deposited his money separately. He further testified:

"I saw what was coming, and I had to look out for myself. That was in August [1915] before we separated in February [1916]. I had been depositing my money with hers, you know; just put the money in the bank and then wrote out a check for $20 to the Munger people. * * * We put our money together until August, 1915, and then I didn't put any more in the bank for her. * * * Both accounts were in the name of H. S. Spradling, the store account and the one I opened later. The account at the bank was run in my name. These checks that were charged were charged in my name."

The evidence shows that Sidney Spradling and defendant bought the 160 acres in controversy from Munger Securities Company of Kansas City, Mo., on the installment plan; that after Sidney had paid $70, defendant took the contract off his hands, and became the owner of his interest. The contract price of the 160 acres in controversy was $1,200. Defendant testified that he paid on said land for the years 1914 and 1915 about $440. This amount was evidently paid out of the funds in the bank belonging to plaintiff and defendant jointly.

The contracts for sale of land to defendant were not recorded.

The defendant testified as follows:

"The contract says that, if I should die, the deed would be made to her; would be made to my heirs. The deed was to be made to me and her; in case I died before it was paid out, it was to be made to her."

Plaintiff testified that:

"At the direction of defendant, I drew checks on the bank to make these payments on the land. The account in the bank was in his name." (Italics ours.)

Defendant further testified that:

"At the time we separated I still owed something like $760 on this land."

We are of the opinion that the evidence shows the above sum of $760 has been paid out of the separate earnings of defendant, in which plaintiff had no interest.

[3] While it is a difficult matter to determine what ought to be done in a case of this character, we have, after reading the records and briefs carefully, reached the conclusion that the lower court should enter a decree in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $220, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from March 1, 1916, in lieu of any interest in the real estate in controversy.

It appearing from defendant's brief that he has finished paying for said land and has a deed therefor, we reverse and remand the cause, with directions to the trial court to set aside its decree and to enter a new decree in favor of plaintiff for the amount and interest aforesaid, to be paid within a reasonable time, and declaring therein that said decree shall be a first lien on said 160 acres in controversy.

MOZLEY, C., absent.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of RAILEY, C. is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court.

All concur.

WOODARD v. STOWELL et al. (No. 20871.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Specific performance §39—Court of equity may enforce oral contract to convey land.

In order to prevent the statute of frauds from accomplishing or being used to accomplish the very purpose which it was enacted to prevent, courts of equity may, under certain circumstances, permit specific performance of oral contracts to convey land, though made with one since deceased.

2. Specific performance §121(11)—Evidence insufficient to show that plaintiff complied with contract.

In an action against the estate of a decedent for specific performance of an agreement to will land and a certain income in return for personal services, evidence held insufficient to show that plaintiff complied with the contract as alleged in her petition.

3. Specific performance §121(7)—Contract to convey land not proven.

In an action against the estate of a decedent for specific performance of an agreement to will land and a certain income in return for personal services, evidence held not to satisfactorily prove the existence of such contract.

4. Specific performance §121(2)—Oral contract to will land must be proven beyond reasonable doubt.

In an action against the estate of a decedent for specific performance of an oral contract to will land, the existence of the contract must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

5. Wills §58(1)—Mere intent to will not enforceable.

Proof that a decedent intended to will property to reward one for services rendered, independent of any contractual obligation, gives the intended beneficiary no rights, even though it be shown that the decedent would have carried out such disposition and made a will if he had not died suddenly.

6. Appeal and error §1048(6)—Error in cross-examination harmless in equity case.

If it was error for counsel on cross-examination of witnesses to inquire as to their testimony in depositions without showing them the depositions, such was not reversible error in an equity case, since the appellate court will simply disregard the alleged testimony in the deposition.

7. Appeal and error §1047(3)—Striking evidence in equity case harmless.

Errors, if any, in striking testimony in an equity case is not reversible error, as the appellate court will read it as if not stricken out.

8. Appeal and error §205—Excluding testimony not reviewable in absence of statement of nature of evidence.

Objection that lower court erred in refusing to allow plaintiff to testify as to conversations had with defendant did not show reversible error, where no statement was made to show the nature of the conversation nor with which of several defendants it was had.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Thomas B. Buckner, Judge.

Suit by Alice Woodard against Albert Stowell, administrator of the estate of George W. Main, deceased, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin S. McCrary and L. A. Laughlin, both of Kansas City, for appellant.

Francis M. Hayward, of Kansas City, for respondents.

SMALL, C. I. This is a suit for specific performance of an oral contract alleged to have been made by George W. Main, deceased, in his lifetime, to will the plaintiff certain real estate in Kansas City, Mo., and an annuity of $400. The defendant Albert C. Stowell is administrator of the estate of George W. Main, deceased, and defendant Carrie Byram is the sister and sole heir of said Main.

The allegations in the petition as to the contract and the performance thereof by the plaintiff are as follows:

"That in the year 1906 plaintiff resided in Kansas City, Mo., and said George W. Main came to her house and shared a room with another man. That at the time he had some employment which paid him small wages, but stated to plaintiff that he would inherit a considerable sum of money some day, and meanwhile, if plaintiff would give him his board and take care of him, he would repay plaintiff when he came into his inheritance by giving her a home with enough to live on besides to compensate her for caring for him and making a home for him. That plaintiff accepted such offer and made said agreement with said George W. Main, and, relying upon said promise, plaintiff furnished board to said George W. Main, and also did his washing, ironing, and mending, all without compensation, during all the time that he lived with her; that said George W. Main, with the exception of one year, lived at plaintiff's house from 1906 until his death in 1916.

"That in the year 1911 the father of said George W. Main came to Kansas City from Illinois and purchased and gave to said George W. Main the following described real estate in Jackson county, Mo., to wit: The south 4.39 feet of lot 92 and the north 21 feet of lot 93, Oglesbay's First addition to the city of Kansas, now Kansas City.

"That, immediately after said real estate was purchased for him by his father, said George W. Main reiterated his promises to plaintiff and specifically agreed verbally with plaintiff at her home in Kansas City that in consideration of what she had done and was doing for him he would will her said real estate at his death, and the sum of $400 per year as long as she should live; that in January, 1913, the father of said George W. Main died, and in January, 1914, his mother died intestate, leaving real and personal property to said George W. Main of the value of $35,000.

"That from that time until his death said George W. Main remained at the home of plaintiff, doing nothing but consuming inordinate quantities of intoxicating liquors; that he finally became blind and utterly helpless, and was confined to his bed for months before his death, during all of which time he required the attention of plaintiff day and night.

"That, relying upon the promises of said George W. Main to will her said real estate and to further provide for her as above stated, plaintiff provided a home for him and furnished him board and did his washing, ironing, and mending, and when he was sick plaintiff waited upon him and nursed him day and night until his death, all without compensation.

"That, though plaintiff has fully kept and performed said agreement on her part, said George W. Main died without specifically performing the said contract on his part and without conveying said real estate or otherwise vesting the title to the same in her and without bequeathing to her by will the sum of $400 per year as long as she should live, and neither of said contract promises have been performed either wholly or in part, though said George W. Main died possessed of said real estate and of personal property of the value of $30,000.

"That the defendant Carrie Byram is a sister of said George W. Main and his only heir at law, and said Claude Byram is the husband of said Carrie Byram. * * *

"Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment," etc.

The answer put the allegations of the petition in issue. It also alleged that the contract sued on was not in writing, as required by the statute of frauds, and that said real estate was mortgaged by said Main in his lifetime for $500 to the knowledge of the plaintiff, and after his death the defendant Carrie Byram, believing she was the sole heir of said Main and entitled to said real estate, paid off said note for $500, and that the plaintiff stood by and permitted her to do so without any claim to said property.

The reply admitted the execution of said deed of trust, but denied that plaintiff had knowledge thereof, and alleged that the deed of trust was paid off by said defendant with the money received from her brother's estate as his heir.

After hearing the plaintiff's evidence, the lower court found for the defendants, and dismissed the petition. Plaintiff appealed to this court.

Plaintiff's testimony was substantially as follows:

Mrs. Todd Mason, the daughter of the plaintiff, testified on direct examination:

That she knew said Main in his lifetime. That in 1906 she and her mother, the plaintiff, were living at 1522 Lydia avenue, and that said Main came to their house to room. He was out of work at the time. He continued to room there until March 27, 1916, when he died. That he did not come there to board, but only to room, but "we fed him; he was out of work." He paid for his room a short time.

"Q. Just tell, as near as you can recollect, what he did say to your mother in regard to paying for the room and board after he became unable to pay for it. A. He said that some day he would pay up for this. He would give mother a home, if she would take care of him, and feed him, and let him room there, and be one of the family. He said some day he would have some money. He continued to live at our home and take his meals there. He got his money when his mother died. He just said some day he would have some money. He continued to live at our home and take his meals there. He actually came in possession of his money. He said that Mother should have a good home and money besides, about a year after he first came there. His father and mother were then living. His father died first. He was at our house two or three times. Mr. and Mrs. Main came to make him a visit, and he liked it so well and was so pleased to think that George was so happy with us and we took such good care of him (stricken out by court on objection of defendants). Mr. Main bought a home at 1516 Lydia avenue and gave it to George and Mamma (the words "and Mamma" stricken out on defendants' motion).

"Q. Now, after this house or this piece of property was bought by George Main's father and given to him, state what, if any, conversation that you heard between your mother and George Main in regard to that particular piece of property, about what would be done with it. A. He said, 'Old lady, that home is yours, or a better one, with all the taxes and everything kept up; not an old house, but a new house with the insurance paid and kept in repair, and $400 a year. He said, 'You ought to get along nicely on $400 a year.'

"Q. What length of time elapsed after the death of George Main's father before his mother died? A. I think about a year and a half.

"Q. And when was it that George Main came into the possession of his property; was it after the death of his mother?

"Mr. Hayward: I object to leading questions.

"Q. When, with reference to the death of his mother? A. Yes, sir; after the mother died he came in direct possession.

"Q. Now, what conversation, if any, did you hear between George Main and your mother in regard to this amount of money that he would leave her, if any, for her support? A. Oh, I have heard him say lots of times, I can't just name the date or anything like that, but he said it a good many times.

"The Court: Said what?

"A. He said that Mamma should have the home, that home or one better, with $400 a year.

"Q. What was the condition of his health at that time? A. At that time his health was good, only he was a man that drank an awful lot.

"Q. But did his health change after that? A. Yes, sir; he went blind; he was pretty near totally blind for six or eight months, something like that.

"Q. Now, during that time what services did your mother render him? A. Everything.

"Q. What did she do for him? A. She waited on him and washed his hair and neck and ears and gave him a bath and washed his feet; he was unable to do anything; she had to lead him from one chair to another, and to the bathroom, and in fact she waited on him like he was a baby.

"Q. Was he confined to his bed at any time? A. No, sir; he sat mostly in a chair.

"Q. Now, what, if anything, was said about this extra service that your mother was rendering for him, as to how that would be paid? A. He said Mamma would be well taken care of.

"Q. And did he say when or how much or in any particular? A. Only he thought $400 a year and a good home.

"Q. At the time, or after the father bought this home, where was this number? A. 1516 Lydia.

"Q. And did you and your mother and George Main live in that home for a while? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. For about how long? A. Four or five years.

"Q. And from there where did you go? A. To 1206 Virginia.

"Q. Did George Main continue to own that home at 1516 Lydia? A. Yes, sir; he collected the rents there.

"Q. What was the reason for leaving 1516 Lydia? A. There were negroes all around us, and we were the only white family left in the block [except another family across the street].

"Q. And after you moved to 1206 Virginia who collected the rent at 1516 Lydia? A. George Main.

"Q. What did he do with the money? A. Well, he spent it; we didn't see any of it.

"Q. Did he pay the rent at 1206 Virginia? A. He did; yes, sir.

"The Court: Paid the rent at the place you moved to. A. Yes, sir.

"Q. (Mr. Laughlin): Previous to his death, how long a time was he confined to the house? A. About six or eight months.

"Q. And did he have any one else to look after him and nurse him except your mother? A. When my mother got down—she had waited on him until she couldn't do it any more, and she got down in bed, and we had Dave Reinhardt; he was there at the house about six weeks.

"Q. Did he get out on the street any during that time? A. Oh, yes.

"Q. How long before his death was he confined continuously to his room? A. He was not confined to his room, but to the house; he would go out and come back; he would be out a short time at a time.

"Q. Now, what were his habits about drinking? A. Well, that was all he seemed to care for, was drink.

"Q. How many drinks a day would he take? Well, that is hard to say. Pretty near every day at our house it was a quart to a quart and a half a day, and what he drank on the outside.

"Q. Did he do any work at all after he got his money? A. No, sir."

On cross-examination Mrs. Mason testified:

He did not have the money and did not work for two or three months after he went to our house to live, and when he did get work he paid a dollar and a quarter for his room, but no board. After the first two or three weeks he boarded as well as lodged with us all the time. He paid room rent to Mother; he did not pay me. He did not pay room rent all the time. Cannot remember when he ceased to pay room rent. He told Mother, if she would take care of him, he would see she was taken care of. It was not a year, I doubt if it was six months, that he paid room rent. In 1911 the father and mother of said Main visited him at plaintiff's house, at which time the father purchased for him the property in question. It was known as No. 1516 Lydia avenue. The plaintiff, her daughter, and Main moved into this property at the time it was purchased. The father died in January, 1912, when Main went back to Illinois and lived with his mother until some time in March, 1914. The plaintiff and her daughter continued to reside in the house, 1516 Lydia avenue, during this time without paying any rent. The house was an old-fashioned brick house and contained nine or ten rooms. Plaintiff and her daughter paid the taxes and kept the place in repair. After they moved to 1516 Lydia avenue, they kept no lodgers besides said Main, as they did at the old place, 1522 Lydia avenue. While living at 1516 Lydia avenue, plaintiff had no income except the salary which the witness earned, which was $25 per month. Main was absent at his mother's two years, after which time he returned and lived in the house with the plaintiff. During his absence plaintiff and her daughter were the only people who occupied the house. They lived together in this house, 1516 Lydia avenue, four or five years, and then moved to 1206 Virginia avenue, because the neighborhood began to be occupied by negroes. Main then rented out the house at 1516 Lydia avenue for $37.50 a month and paid the rent on the house they occupied at 1206 Virginia avenue, which was $30 a month.

Q. He paid that instead of board? A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you didn't charge him any board? A. No, sir; we never charged him any board, except the first two or three months that he was with us. He said, "I will take care of you, old lady, you have been good to me," lots of times. He first said this shortly after he came to live with us. We would have company, and he would say, "Never mind, old lady, you'll get paid for this," when he asked for and Mother gave him a drink. He did not have any property at the time. Said he was going to have some. I heard him tell his mother he was perfectly happy with us. He told Mother, "We have a fine home here if the neighbors don't run us out, and, if they do, we will get a better one." That was the first week we moved in at 1516 Lydia avenue. We did not like the neighborhood on account of the negroes, and he told mother he would get a better one. He did not fix any other place; he wanted to see what the negroes would do to know what to do with the home. He said he would give mother $400 or more a year. He did not say how much more. Mother did not tell him he ought to do that.

Q. When he made those statements, what did your mother say? A. She said, "George, that'll be awful nice of you."

Q. Did she say what she was going to do? A. She did not. Mother had no independent means of support except what I gave her. He paid the rent all the time at 1206 Virginia avenue until he died.

The witness got the money on two checks of Main, for $50 each, one March 1, 1916, and the other March 20, 1916. She got the money on those checks, but gave it to him. While they lived on Lydia avenue Main gave the witness $40 to make a payment on her piano. When we were living at 1516 Lydia avenue Mother had no one to support the family except myself. Never had. George Main was not continually giving me and my mother money to support the family. Whatever I made, I gave to my mother. That was the only resource she had. He did not pay a cent of my hospital bill. That $20 is for his own bill, not mine. He was there a week. He was working continuously from 1906 until he went back to live with his mother, for $10 or $20 per week, for North-Mehornay, Keiths' and Duff & Repp. He died March 28, 1916. Mother found him dead in bed. He was sick a little over a year, some trouble with his eyes; it might have been six months that he was blind. Think he had a doctor longer than three months. He did not pay up all back room rent when he got his money. He might have paid room rent for three weeks or a month.

Witness then in answer to questions said she had testified as follows when her deposition was taken:

He paid a dollar and a quarter a week for his room. He paid it in cash out of his salary. Bert Parker, his roommate, paid the same. Could not remember having testified in her deposition that he always paid that for his room until we moved into the house at 1516 Lydia avenue. Mother charged other people the same price for room, did not know that he was out of work longer than six weeks, but "kinda" think he was; did not remember; cannot say positively.

On redirect examination, the witness said:

That she worked for 11 years at the Savoy Hotel, as telephone operator for the Bell Telephone Company, and those checks were cashed at the Savoy Hotel. She took the money home and gave it to Main. He never paid any board after the first two or three months after he came to our house.

Clyde Russell testified:

That he had been in the saloon business at 1400 East Fourteenth street, and knew George Main for 12 years before his death pretty intimately. Saw him pretty nearly every day at his (Russell's) place of business. He also knew Mrs. Woodard. Main told the witness that he wanted to see that the "old lady," if he should happen to "drop off" first, was provided for. He said she would have the home, and he calculated on her having $400 a year, which he calculated was enough to keep her during her lifetime. That was all he cared to see about. The rest of the folks could take care of themselves. No one was present when he had this conversation. He told me this one night about a year before his death. He drank quite a bit, but never seemed to be what you would call drunk. When this conversation took place, he was not what you would say under the influence of liquor out of the way. He was not drunk, but he was just feeling in high spirits; nothing out of the way. He said in that conversation that he intended to see that the "old lady," Mrs. Woodard, would have a home, and he would provide for her $400. That is just what he said.

David O. Reinhardt testified:

That he had lived in Kansas City for 41 years. Knew George Main 5 or 6 years prior to his death. Lived about a block and a half from him; at several times, for a month or two, roomed with him; had a conversation with him in which he said he intended to provide for

Mrs. Woodard; had several conversations. He wanted me to go down with him to make a will. He said he was going to provide for Mrs. Woodard. He was going to take care of her while he was living, and, if he went before she did, he would provide for her, so that she would not want for anything. He was going to leave her the home, and enough to live on, he said $30 or $40 a month, besides the home, and she would have no rent to pay. The first conversation was in November, a year before he died; did not go down with him to have the will drawn. We started down, but we never got to the lawyer. He seemed to be in good health for some weeks before his death, only he was kind of nervous, is all. His eyesight failed him awful. He was not exactly blind, but about the same as blind. When he was sick, Mrs. Woodard waited on him the same as a mother. I visited him. I was not staying there. Mrs. Woodard fixed his meals and waited on him the same as a nurse would.

On cross-examination this witness testified:

Am doing nothing now. Worked for the Silver Laundry about a year and a half ago for about four months. I was in business for myself at 14th and Virginia avenue for 12 years as a groceryman. Have not been in business for four or five years. It was my father's business. I was clerk in the grocery store. Main made the statement about making a will in his room. He was in bed. The first time he made it was in November. His eyesight failed him about three years before the trial. He had good health up to that time. Then he recovered his eyesight, and a few weeks before he died his health failed him again, but up to that time was good.

Witness was here shown check signed by George Main, payable to the order of George Main for $100, and indorsed by George Main and D. C. Reinhardt, which witness said he went to the bank and had cashed for Main, December 16, 1915. Continuing, witness said:

I gave him all the money. I helped around the house, and waited on Main, while Mrs. Woodard was sick. He paid me nothing. I cashed several checks for him, one for $50, around the last of November or December. Do not know what he did with this $50. The only conversation I had with him about leaving his property was two or three months before he died.

The real estate in question was conveyed February 1, 1911, by James A. Fry and wife to Harriet M. Main, the mother of George Main, and afterwards by Mrs. Main and her husband, on the 30th of December, 1911, to George W. Main. The consideration mentioned in each deed was $4,000.

Andrew J. Davis testified:

That he had lived in Kansas City for five years. That his last permanent occupation was that of postmaster of St. Paul, Minnesota. He knew George Main for about a year before his death. Lived within two blocks of him. Saw him nearly every day. Went to see him while he was sick and in the hospital. For quite a while I was with him for most every day. Went to see him at Mrs. Woodard's, where he lived. Had conversations with him at different times as to what he intended to do with his property after his death. He said he intended to give Mrs. Woodard that home, and provide for her while she lived, and the rest of his estate he intended to give to his sister's children. He said he intended to provide for Mrs. Woodard after his death; that she had been a mother to him, and wholly a mother. He did not mention any specific amount to me. He did not say that he had made a will. But he told me he was going to town one day to attend to some business. I had more than one talk with him.

Q. Did he say anything in those conversations about whether or not he was providing a living at that time before his death? A. I asked him the question, and he said he was not furnishing the living.

Q. Asked him what question? A. I asked him the question if he kept house, and he said, "No; I am not."

Mr. Hayward: I move to strike that out.

The Court: Motion sustained. (To which action and ruling of the court the plaintiff then and there duly excepted and still excepts.)

Q. What did he say he was doing at that time? A. Mr. Hayward: I object to that for the same reason.

The Court: Objection sustained. (To which action of the court plaintiff then and there duly excepted at the time and still excepts.)

Mr. Laughlin: That is all.

Mr. Hayward: No cross-examination. Witness excused.

Arthur Russell testified:

That he was a brother of Clyde Russell. Lived in Kansas City 20 years. Knew George Main for 10 years before his death. Saw him every week, sometimes oftener. Had conversation with him in which the subject of his property was mentioned, or what he intended to do with it. He said, if anything happened, in case he went first, he was going to leave his home and $400 a year to Mrs. Woodard. He told me that once, more than once, a couple of times, something like three years before his death.

On cross-examination witness said:

He was a bartender at 1400 East Fourteenth street. Main was a frequent attendant. No one was present when he had these conversations. His deposition had been taken. Nobody ever talked to him as to what he would testify to. At the time of these conversations Main was feeling in good spirits. He had had a few drinks.

In his deposition he testified:

That Main said that in case he went first he intended to leave the home and leave enough so that she could live on $400; that he told me that, and then I have heard him say that to others; and that he had never talked to anybody about the case since Main's death, until he gave his deposition.

Julius Bruehl testified:

That he was a practicing physician in Kansas City, and had been since 1883. Knew George Main. First met him January 18, 1915, when he attended him professionally. Attended him until April 2d, same year. His fundamental trouble was liquor, and symptoms of that trouble were neuritis of the optic nerve and great heart weakness. It made him blind. Had several conversations with him about what he intended to do with his property at his death. Not that I asked him about it, but he always, when he came to me, when he was in this pitiable condition, he would tell me how much Mrs. Woodard had done for him, and told me then that he would do something for her, too. He wanted especially, he said, these are the words I remember, that he wanted the house on Lydia avenue to go into possession of Mrs. Woodard, then he said, "She never will lack again." That is what he told me several times. He told me this during the period I attended him. He only told me, I repeat it, "She will not lack again."

Mr. Hayward: No cross-examination.

C. L. Gill testified:

Knew George Main perhaps a year and a half before he died. Saw him almost every day. That Main told him he was treated nicely, and that he intended to see that Mrs. Woodard was taken care of. That he didn't expect to be hanging on very long.

Frank A. Newcomb testified:

That he was cashier of the New York Life Insurance Company. Was familiar with the rates charged by insurance companies for annuities. That to purchase an annuity at that time of $400 a year for a person born November 18, 1858, would be $5,528.80. His testimony was stricken out on objection of defendant, to which plaintiff excepted.

Mrs. Mason, recalled, testified that her mother was born November 15, 1858.

Reed Younger Campbell in his deposition testified:

He was cashier of the First National Bank of Abington, Ill. Knew George Main about 13 years. At the time of Main's death had possession of money and property of George Main of the value of about $27,000.

Defendants thereupon admitted that deceased had $27,000 in personal property.

[1] II. In this class of cases the courts have firmly established certain definite rules relating to the pleadings and proofs within which the plaintiff must bring himself. Otherwise the judgment must be for the defendant. The statute of frauds requiring contracts to convey real estate to be in writing is of very ancient origin in English and American jurisprudence, and was wisely enacted, so that in suits upon contracts for real estate, which human beings, and especially Anglo-Saxons, have such a strong desire to possess and own, the parties should not be "led into temptation," but should be delivered from the evil of perjury by making all oral contracts concerning lands absolutely void and unenforceable. Especially is this temptation great in suits against the voiceless and defenseless dead. But, in order to prevent the statute of frauds from accomplishing or being used to accomplish fraud, the very purpose which it was enacted to prevent, courts of equity have, under certain circumstances, permitted the specific performance of oral contracts to convey lands, even when made with the dead. In such cases, however, they have established certain stringent rules as to the pleading and the proof of the consideration and other matters relating to the contract. Those rules are nowhere more definitely and distinctly marked out than by the decisions of this court. In Walker v. Bohannon, 243 Mo. loc. cit. 136 et seq., 147 S. W. 1028, opinion by Graves, J., they are stated as follows:

"The rules cover many phases; i. e.: (1) The alleged oral contract must be clear, explicit, and definite; (2) it must be proven as pleaded; (3) such contract cannot be established by conversations either too ancient, on the one hand, or too loose or casual, upon the other; (4) the alleged oral contract must itself be fair and not unconscionable; (5) the proof of the contract as pleaded must be such as to leave no reasonable doubt in the mind of the chancellor that the contract as alleged was in fact made and that the full performance, so far as lies in the hands of the parties to perform, has been had; (6) the work constituting performance must be such as is referable solely to the contract sought to be enforced, and not such as might be reasonably referable to some other and different contract; (7) the contract must be one based upon an adequate and legal consideration, so that its performance, upon the one hand but not upon the other would bespeak an unconscionable advantage and wrong, demanding in good conscience relief in equity; and (8) proof of mere disposition to devise by will or convey by deed by way of gift, or as a reward for services, is not sufficient, but there must be shown a real contract to devise by will or convey by deed, made before the acts of performance relied upon were had.

"There may be other phases of the rule adhered to by the courts in cases of this character, but the foregoing are clearly within a long line of Missouri cases. The more recent ones are Forrister v. Sullivan, 231 Mo. 345; Collins v. Harrell, 219 Mo. 279; Wales v. Holden, 209 Mo. 552; Kirk v. Middlebrook, 201 Mo. 245. Other cases of like tenor are found cited and discussed in the foregoing. Suffice it to say that they all indicate that the courts are slow to enforce contracts of the character we have here.

"* * * It should therefore be with discerning eye and ear that the chancellor appealed to should proceed. * * *"

The substance of the allegations of the petition as to the contract between the plaintiff and George W. Main is that he lived at plaintiff's house from the year 1906 to the year 1911 under an agreement in 1906 that she was to board and care for him and make a home for him until he should come into his inheritance, when he would give her a home and money enough to live on besides to compensate her for caring for him and giving him a home during that time; that his father gave him a house, the property in question, in 1911, whereupon, in consideration of what plaintiff had done for him and was doing for him, under the contract made in 1906, the time for plaintiff to receive her home and money was extended until the death of said George W. Main, until which time she was to continue to board and care for him and furnish him a home, for all of which she was to be paid by receiving the property and annuity sued for under his will. In the meantime she was to receive and did receive no compensation whatever from said George W. Main.

"With the foregoing as the contract, let us, as with a yardstick, measure the evidence." Walker v. Bohannon, supra, 243 Mo. loc. cit. 138, 147 S. W. 1029.

[2-4] In our judgment, the evidence falls far short of showing that the plaintiff was wholly uncompensated for her services during the long period alleged in the petition. On the other hand, it affirmatively shows that for five years, more than half of the time said Main resided with the plaintiff, and the contract alleged in the petition required the plaintiff to furnish him with room, board, care, and a home, he furnished the plaintiff with a home in which she and her daughter dwelt, rent free, of the rental value of from $30 to $37.50 a month, which would practically offset plaintiff's reasonable charges against him for that time, if he paid nothing else to the plaintiff. But, owing to the meager funds of the plaintiff, which consisted of what her daughter gave her out of her wages of $25 per month, after they moved into the Main home in 1911, when plaintiff ceased taking in lodgers, it is unreasonable to believe that said Main did not also contribute towards the expenses of the household. It could not otherwise have been reasonably maintained. He had some means, earned $10 to $12 per week, not a large sum, still nearly twice as large as the earnings of plaintiff's daughter, and he worked nearly all the time until he came into his inheritance in 1914, when he had ample funds not only to pay his way thereafter, but also any belated board bills he may have been owing to the plaintiff. He told one of the plaintiff's witnesses that he would take care of plaintiff while he was alive. Others testify that his anxiety seemed to be for the plaintiff's personal welfare, in effect, after his death only; that he wanted to make a will, so that, "if he went first," she would have a home and support when he was gone; "that was all he cared about;" "the others could take care of themselves." It is reasonable to infer from these expressions, in view of plaintiff's circumstances and his circumstances, that he was then providing and intended to continue during his life to provide a home and support for the plaintiff, or at least contribute sufficiently for that purpose, so that she would have a home and support as long as he lived and resided with her. His reply to the witness Davis, who asked him if he kept house, "I am not," is far from stating that he had not paid and was not paying his way. Under the facts and circumstances, therefore, shown in evidence by the plaintiff, we cannot find that she complied with the contract alleged in her petition and in accordance therewith furnished said Main with room, board, and a home during the entire time he lived at her house, and she lived at his house, without any remuneration. Nor does the evidence prove the existence of such contract to our satisfaction, much less to our satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt, as required in such cases. We must hold that plaintiff failed to make out a case.

[5] III. We are also satisfied, in view of all the facts and circumstances shown in evidence, that the statements by George W. Main to the various witnesses of his purpose to give the property sued for to the plaintiff by his will were not based upon any legal obligation or contract with reference to the services the plaintiff rendered to him in his lifetime, but such statements were simply the expression of a testamentary disposition to make a devise to her, as an extra reward for such services, and to show his appreciation thereof, not based upon, but independent of, any contractual obligation. Such being the case, no cause of action arose to the plaintiff. Walker v. Bohannon, supra.

No doubt, Main would have carried out such disposition and made a will in plaintiff's favor, but death came to him suddenly and slew him in the night while asleep in his bed, and it was then too late for him to make a will. But the law, to which all must bow in obedience does not enable us to make a will for said Main which he did not make, although, probably would have made, had not death thus suddenly cut him off.

[6, 7] IV. The error of defendants' counsel, if any error there was, in inquiring of witnesses upon cross-examination as to their testimony in their depositions without showing them the depositions, is not reversible error. This being a suit in equity, the court will simply disregard the alleged testimony in the depositions. So of the errors, if any, in striking testimony, the court will read it as if not stricken out. Rinkel v. Lubke, 246 Mo. 377, 152 S. W. 81; Waddington v. Lane, 202 Mo. loc. cit. 415, 100 S. W. 1139.

[8] It is also objected that the lower court erred in refusing to allow plaintiff to testify as to conversations had with the defendant

There is no reversible error in this assignment, as no statement was made to show the nature of such conversations, nor with which defendant they were had. Williams v. Williams, 259 Mo. 242, 168 S. W. 616; Forrister v. Sullivan, 281 Mo. loc. cit. 878, 182 S. W. 722.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment and decree of the learned chancellor below is affirmed.

STATE v. KRAMER. (No. 21949.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Courts \S 231(23)—Appellant to give Supreme Court jurisdiction on constitutional grounds must have designated specific section violated.

When it is sought to fix jurisdiction of an appeal in the Supreme Court on the ground of a constitutional question involved, it must appear that appellant in a timely manner designated a specific section of the Constitution alleged to have been violated.

2. Courts \S 231(6) — Unless constitutional question involved jurisdiction of appeal not in Supreme Court.

Unless the constitutional question is so involved as to be necessary to the determination of the case, it cannot be successfully invoked to fix jurisdiction in the Supreme Court.

3. Criminal law \S 1152(2)—Jury \S 72(6)—Overruling motion for elisor discretionary with court.

In the absence of evidence of irregularity or unfairness on the part of the sheriff in summoning talesmen, or showing of the fact he had any knowledge of the prosecution when he summoned the jurors, the overruling of defendant's motion for appointment of an elisor to summon a jury should not be disturbed, being discretionary with the trial court.

4. Criminal law \S 918(10, 11)—Complaint as to summoning of talesmen first set up in motion for new trial untimely.

Defendant's complaint with regard to summoning of talesmen finding its first setting in the record in the motion for new trial is untimely and need not be considered.

5. Constitutional law \S 42 — Person cannot question constitutionality of any law not directly affecting him.

Before a person can question the constitutionality of any law, he must be in such position with regard to it as to be directly affected.

6. Courts \S 231(18)—No constitutional right denied defendant to give jurisdiction to Supreme Court.

In a prosecution for violation of the local option law regulating sale of intoxicating liquors, held, that no constitutional right was denied defendant, so that jurisdiction of his appeal was in a Court of Appeals, and not the Supreme Court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Adair County;
J. A. Cooley, Judge.

J. G. Kramer was convicted of violation of the local option law, and he appeals. Case transferred to the Kansas City Court of Appeals.

WALKER, J. The appellant was charged in the circuit court of Adair county in an information which at the trial contained seven counts, with a violation of the local option law regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors. Upon a trial before a jury he was convicted, and his punishment assessed on each count at a fine of $750 and six months' imprisonment in the county jail.

The offenses charged are misdemeanors. The prosecution was instituted under article 3, c. 63, R. S. 1906; the punishment prescribed for violations of the statute (section 7246) being limited to a fine or imprisonment in the county jail or both. The case was transferred to this court from the Kansas City Court of Appeals on the ground that a constitutional question was involved. At the threshold, therefore, we are confronted with the question of jurisdiction. If determined adversely to the ruling of the Kansas City Court of Appeals, a statement of facts, except as bearing upon the matter of jurisdiction, is unnecessary.

The information as originally drawn contained 16 counts. In the count numbered 11 it was charged that the sale of the liquor was made to Marion Shoop, and in count numbered 12 that liquor was stored by appellant for delivery to said Shoop. The latter was at the time the sheriff of Adair county, and his name was indorsed on the information as a witness for the state. On the 8th day of April, 1919, when the case was called for trial, counsel for appellant filed a motion for the appointment of an elisor to summon the jury, alleging as a reason therefor that the sheriff was interested in the result of the prosecution and was a witness for the state. The court thereupon overruled this motion and entered of record the following order:

"It appearing that the jury was selected partly by the county court and partly by the sheriff, and all of said jury being selected before the charges in this case were filed and before the defendant was arrested, the motion will be overruled."

Counsel for the appellant excepted to the ruling of the court, and his exception was entered of record as follows:

"Defendant excepts to the ruling of the court in denying his motion and application for the appointment of an elisor to summon a jury for the trial of this cause for the following reasons: First, because a part of said jury, eight or nine in number, was selected and summoned by Marion Shoop, the sheriff of Adair county, Mo., said Marion Shoop being a witness for and on behalf of the state of Missouri in said cause, and being incompetent by reason of his interest in the result of said prosecution to select or summon any jurors to sit in the trial of said cause, whereby defendant is deprived of a fair and impartial trial as guaranteed by the Constitution of the state of Missouri."

Counsel for the state in open court then announced that said Shoop would not be a witness for the state, and that counts numbered 11 and 12 of the information, in which it was charged that the unlawful transactions were had with Shoop by the appellant, were dismissed. Seven other counts were dismissed at the same time for reasons not pertinent to the matter here under consideration, leaving seven upon which the appellant was prosecuted. Thereafter counsel for appellant challenged a juror named James H. Shoop on voir dire examination on the ground that "he was related to the sheriff, one of the witnesses for the state, and for the further reason that said juror declined to state whether he would acquit if he had a reasonable doubt of appellant's guilt." Upon inquiry by the court the said James H. Shoop stated that he would acquit if he had a reasonable doubt of appellant's guilt, whereupon the court caused to be entered of record this order:

"In view of the witness' answer and in view of the fact that the state has dismissed the two counts in which Marion Shoop was named as the party to whom the delivery was made, the challenge for cause is overruled."

Thereupon the appellant waived a jury, and upon the state declining so to do the appellant interposed the following objection thereto, which was entered to record:

"Defendant declines to interrogate the jurors summoned to-day by the sheriff for the reason that the defendant insists that the sheriff under the facts in this case is disqualified to summon any jurors, and in so doing deprives the defendant of the right to a fair and impartial trial guaranteed him under the laws and Constitution of the state."

The foregoing italicized exceptions and record entries made at the behest of the appellant exemplify the manner in which constitutional questions were invoked in this case. In the motion for a new trial they were preserved as made in the following manner:

"Second. Because the court erred in directing Marion Shoop to summon bystanders as talesmen to sit upon the jury which was to try the defendant after the attention of the court had been called to the fact that the said Marion Shoop, sheriff of Adair county, Mo., was witness on behalf of the state, and against the defendant, thereby depriving the defendant of a fair and impartial trial before a fair and impartial jury guaranteed to him by the Constitution of the state of Missouri and laws made in pursuance thereof."

"Tenth. Because the verdict of the jury is in violation of the Constitution of the United States and of the state of Missouri, in this, to wit, that said verdict is cruel and unusual."

[1] When it is sought to fix the jurisdiction of an appeal in this court on the ground of the existence of a constitutional question necessarily involved in the determination of the matter at issue, it must appear from the record that the appellant in a timely manner designated the specific section of the Constitution alleged to have been violated by the adverse ruling or as was said in Lohmeyer v. Cordage Co., 214 Mo. loc. cit. 688, 113 S. W. 1109, the party asserting the jurisdiction "must come into the open and put his finger on the specific provision of the Constitution touched by the adverse ruling" of which he complains. This was not done in the instant case. State v. Swift, 270 Mo. 694, 195 S. W. 996; City of Lancaster v. Reed, 201 S. W. 95; Street v. School Dist., 221 Mo. 663, 120 S. W. 1159.

[2, 3] The record presents another phase of this case more completely determinative of the question of the jurisdiction than the foregoing. We have repeatedly held, and with reason, that unless the constitutional question was so involved as to be necessary to the determination of the case, it could not be successfully invoked to fix the jurisdiction. At the time the array of jurors was summoned no charges were pending against the appellant, and the court so found in overruling appellant's motion for the appointment of an elisor. Furthermore, when said motion was filed, counsel for the state dismissed the counts of the information charging that sales had been made by appellant to the sheriff, and announced that the latter would not be used as a witness. Under this state of facts there remained no basis for a substantial charge that appellant was being deprived of any right to which he was entitled under the law. It will be noted that the motion for the appointment of the elisor was not made until after the beginning of the trial. It is reasonable to conclude that the appellant knew of any connection which the sheriff may have had with the case from the time of the filing of the information, or at least from the time of his arrest. Under such circumstances, there being no evidence of irregularity or unfairness on the part of the sheriff or in fact that he had any knowledge of the prosecution at the time he summoned the jurors, the overruling of the motion should not be disturbed, but should be left to the discretion of the trial court. State v. Stewart, 274 Mo. 649, 204 S. W. 10. In harmony with this conclusion, it was held by the Supreme Court of Arkansas, where an affidavit was filed by the accused charging a sheriff with prejudice and bias, but no proof was offered to support the charge, that the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to disqualify the sheriff from selecting talesmen, although the sheriff was a witness at the trial and testified that he had watched the accused's premises and had arrested him for making intoxicating liquors. Shuffield v. State (Ark.) 216 S. W. 695.

The facts in that case, it will be seen, are much stronger and more indicative of the possible presence of prejudice than those in the case at bar.

[4] Appellant's motion the overruling of which he urges as error as affecting his constitutional rights was directed against the summoning of the array of jurors. His complaint with regard to the summoning of talesmen finds its first setting in the record in the motion for a new trial. It will suffice to say that this latter objection is untimely, and hence need not be considered. Strother v. Railroad, 274 Mo. 282, 203 S. W. 207; Littlefield v. Littlefield, 272 Mo. 163, 197 S. W. 1057.

[5] Repetition has almost rendered it axiomatic or at least elementary in our jurisprudence that before a person can question the constitutionality of any law he must be in such a position with regard to the law as to be directly affected by it. This is not his status here. Ex parte Tarter, 213 S. W. 94; State v. Christopher, 212 Mo. 244, 110 S. W. 697.

[6] No constitutional right having been denied the appellant, and this fact appearing from the record, the jurisdiction of this case is in the Kansas City Court of Appeals, to which it is ordered to be transferred.

All concur.

FREIE v. ST. LOUIS-SAN FRANCISCO RY. CO. (No. 21266.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 25,
1920.)

Death — Husband's administrator cannot maintain action for wife's death.

Where a wife was killed and husband injured by a train, and the husband subsequently died from the injury without bringing action for her death, his administrator could not maintain such action under Rev. St. 1909, §§ 105, 106, 5425, on the theory that the husband's right of action for her death survived.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Franklin County; R. A. Breuer, Judge.

Action by Henry F. Freie, as administrator of Herman Freie, deceased, against the St. Louis-San Francisco Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The amended petition upon which the case was disposed of in the trial court is stated by counsel for appellant as follows:

After the usual allegations of defendant's incorporation as a railway company, it charges that defendant, while operating its train in said county, negligently ran through the town of Catawissa, at a high and dangerous rate of speed, over a public road or street crossing, without signal by bell or whistle, where the view of travelers on the road was obstructed, in consequence of which negligence Mrs. Elizabeth Freie was killed by one of defendant's trains at said crossing; that Herman Freie, her husband, was also injured on the same occasion, but survived his wife some time. Plaintiff is his administrator, since duly appointed by the probate court, duly qualified, and in charge of the estate of Herman Freie; that the latter, by defendant's said wrongful acts, was deprived of the "society, comfort, aid, companionship, services, and consortium" of his said wife, and of his beneficial interest as her husband in her estate; and that, because of said negligence and injuries, various items of expense (detailed) were incurred by said Herman Freie, including medical and nursing expenses, and the funeral expenses of his said wife—concluding with a demand for $10,000 damages.

Respondent demurred to above petition upon the following grounds:

"(1) Said amended petition fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against defendant.

"(2) It appears from the face of said amended petition that no cause of action against defendant survives in favor of plaintiff against defendant on account of the matters and things in said petition alleged."

The trial court sustained said demurrer. Plaintiff declined to plead further. Final judgment was entered for defendant, and plaintiff duly appealed the cause to this court.

Leonard & Sibley, of St. Louis, Jesse H. Schaper, of Washington, Mo., and Shepard Barclay, of St. Louis, for appellant.

W. F. Evans and Edw. T. Miller, both of St. Louis, and James Booth, of Pacific, for respondent.

RAILEY, C. (after stating the facts as above). 1. As a matter of convenience in considering the questions involved, we herewith set out the origin and legislative history of sections 105, 106, R. S. 1909. They were first enacted in 1835, appear in the revision of said date, at page 48, and were known therein as sections 24 and 25. In the revision of 1855, at page 133, they were sections 26 and 27. In the General Statutes of 1865, page 491, they were sections 29 and 30. In the revision of 1879 they were sections 96 and 97. In the revision of 1889 they continued as sections 96 and 97. In the revision of 1899 they were still known as sections 96 and 97. These sections were never amended after their enactment in 1835, and during all of this period, they have remained as a part of the administration statute of our state. These sections read as follows:

"Sec. 105. Actions for Torts by and against Administrators, What may be Maintained.—For all wrongs done to property, rights or interest of another, for which an action might be maintained against the wrongdoer, such action may be brought by the person injured, or, after his death, by his executor or administrator, against such wrongdoer, and, after his death, against his executor or administrator, in the same manner and with like effect, in all respects, as actions founded upon contract."

"Sec. 106. Last Section not to Extend to What Actions.—The preceding section shall not extend to actions for slander, libel, assault and battery or false imprisonment, nor to actions on the case for injuries to the person of the plaintiff, or to the person of the testator or intestate of any executor or administrator."

We likewise set out the origin and history of section 5425, R. S. 1909, as amended by the Acts of 1911, page 203 and following. This section was first enacted in 1855. It appears in the revision of 1855, at page 647, as section 2 of the Damage Act. In General Statutes of 1865, p. 601, it was continued, without change, as section 2. In the revision of 1879, it was continued, without change, as section 2121. Section 2121 was amended in 1885 (Session Acts 1885, pp. 153, 154) and, as amended, was carried into the revision of 1889, and there known as section 4425. The latter was carried into the revision of 1899 as section 2864 without change. The last-named section was amended in 1905 (Acts of 1905, pp. 135-137). The law, as amended in 1905, supra, was carried into the revision of 1909, without change, and is there known as section 5425. The latter was amended in 1911 (Acts 1911, p. 203). The common law was adopted in this state on January 19, 1816.

It is well to keep in mind the foregoing history of sections 105, 106, and 5425, R. S. 1909, in order to correctly understand which of the sections are referred to in the various opinions cited by the courts and in the briefs of counsel.

2. Appellant's theory of this case is clearly stated under proposition 1, page 6, of his reply brief, as follows:

"The death damage act (section 5425) creates a right of action in the husband; and in case of his death that right survives to his administrator under section 105, those laws being in pari materia."

Under the common law adopted in this state in 1816, a personal right of action died with the person. In 1855, Lord Campbell's Act was adopted in this state, as shown by section 2, chapter 51, R. S. 1855, p. 647. This section has continued up to the present time, with the amendments thereto, heretofore pointed out. It gives a right of action, where none existed at common law. It points out the persons who may sue, and they alone must sue within the time prescribed by the statute. Gibbs v. City of Hannibal, 82 Mo. loc. cit. 149; Barker v. Railway Co., 91 Mo. 86, 14 S. W. 280; McIntosh v. Railway Co., 103 Mo. 181, 15 S. W. 80; Packard v. Railroad, 181 Mo. loc. cit. 427, 80 S. W. 951, 103 Am. St. Rep. 607; Bates v. Sylvester, 205 Mo. 493, 104 S. W. 73, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1157, 120 Am. St. Rep. 761, 12 Ann. Cas. 457; Elliott v. Kansas City, 210 Mo. 576, 109 S. W. 627, and following; Clark v. Railroad, 219 Mo. loc. cit. 538, 539, 118 S. W. 40; Gilkeson v. Railroad, 222 Mo. 173, 121 S. W. 138, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 844, 17 Ann. Cas. 763, and cases cited; Chandler v. Railroad, 251 Mo. loc. cit. 600, 601, 158 S. W. 35.

These cases, and many others referred to therein, conclusively hold that in an action of this character, where no common-law liability existed, the party suing must, in order to state a cause of action, show that he is the person authorized by said section 5425 to maintain the same. In the case at bar the petition alleges that Elizabeth Freie was killed; that her husband, Herman Freie, was injured in the same accident, and afterwards died from the effect of said injuries. It is further alleged that Henry F. Freie was appointed administrator of the estate of said Herman Freie, deceased. The latter, by the terms of section 5425, supra, was authorized to sue for the death of his wife at any time within the year, as there were no minor children. He died without suing, and his administrator claims the right to take his place under said section. The legal representative is not named as a party who might maintain the action under said section. Unless, therefore, he is authorized to prosecute the suit under some other provision of the law, he is precluded from doing so by the foregoing authorities.

3. It is contended, however, by counsel for appellant, that sections 5425 and 105, supra, should be construed in pari materia, and, when thus construed, they authorize the administrator of the husband to maintain an action for the death of the wife.

Turning to sections 105, 106, R. S. 1909, we find that they were enacted in 1885, or practically 85 years ago. They have remained a part of the administration statute during all this period. Although innumerable deaths have resulted in this state from violence during said period, and many of which found their way into this court, we are not cited to a single case, in this jurisdiction, which ever held that an administrator, on the facts presented by this record, could, by virtue of sections 5425 and 105, supra, maintain such an action. On the contrary, at least two cases, which were ably and exhaustively reviewed by this court, were brought here on the theory that an administrator, under such facts as are presented here, could, under the sections 105, 106, and 5425, when construed together successfully, maintain such an action. In both cases the right to maintain same by an administrator was denied. We refer to Gibbs, Adm'r, v. City of Hannibal, 82 Mo. 143, and Gilkeson, Adm'r, v. Railway Co., 222 Mo. 173, 121 S. W. 138, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 844, 17 Ann. Cas. 763.

It appears from the record in the Gibbs Case that George L. Crosby, while driving with his wife and two infant children in a vehicle, crossing a bridge over a stream in the city of Hannibal, was precipitated into the stream by the fall of the bridge, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the city. By reason of the casualty, the father, mother, and two infant children perished. It was alleged in petition that Mrs. Crosby, the wife, survived her husband and two children, and that while so surviving, a cause of action accrued to her for the death of each of them. The plaintiff therein was appointed administrator of Mrs. Crosby's estate, and, on December 24, 1877, instituted suit in the Hannibal court of common pleas. The petition consisted of three counts: The first, asking $5,000, for the death of her husband, and the second and third asking $5,000, respectively, for the death of each of her two children. To the above petition, a demurrer was filed, and sustained by the court. On appeal to this court, the judgment below was unanimously affirmed. Judge Ray, after reviewing the authorities, and sections 96 and 2121, R. S. 1879, which were practically the same as sections 105 and 5425, R. S. 1909, among other things, said:

"These are the only beneficiaries who can maintain such an action. If in any case there be no such person, no suit can be brought by any other person. By the statute the action survives only to the parties named. They alone are the beneficiaries of the statute, and it was never intended that such action should survive to the executor or administrator of any one of the beneficiaries named. It is a right personal to the beneficiary, and does not survive to his personal representatives. In the case at bar all the beneficiaries within the purview of the statute perished together in one common disaster, and there was no person left to whom the action could survive. It follows that this action cannot be maintained by the present plaintiff, who is the administrator of the wife. Under the statute he has no standing in court.

"As to the other question, we think it quite manifest that the damage act, or sections 2122, 2123, supra, have no reference to injuries or damages to property of the deceased, but only to personal injuries, and such as the injured party, if living, might have recovered, and such as the jury may deem fair and just with reference to the injury necessarily resulting to such survivor from such death. Injury or damage to property, as such, is not within the contemplation of the damage act, and consequently no recovery can be had in such an action for such injury or damage. Section 96 of the administration law has reference exclusively to wrongs done to the property rights or interest of another, and by section 97 of same law do not extend to actions for slander, libel, assault and battery, or false imprisonment, nor to actions on the case for injuries done to the person of the plaintiff, or to the person of the testator or intestate of any executor or administrator. If any injury or damage was occasioned to the property of the husband in this case by the fall of the bridge occasioned by the negligence of the defendant corporation, the action therefor, if any, by operation of section 96 of the administration law, supra, survived to the administrator of the husband, if to anybody, and not to that of the wife. Such is the express import of section 96, supra. That section does not contemplate the injuries and damages, or the actions provided for by the damage act.

"The latter survives by special statute, contrary to the common law, and only to the parties or beneficiaries named in the special statute. Various other questions have been discussed, and numerous cases cited, but we deem them unnecessary to the disposition of the case.

"It follows, therefore, that there was no error in the ruling of the circuit court in sustaining the demurrer of defendant, and its judgment is therefore affirmed. All concur."

The opinion in the Gibbs Case was rendered in 1884, and the court was then composed of Judges Hough, Henry, Norton, Ray, and Sherwood. The bar, judiciary, and General Assembly were informed by the publication of above opinion in 1884 that an administrator could not successfully maintain an action on facts exactly like the case before us. The above opinion has withstood the test of judicial criticism during the last 35 years, and, although the Legislature has been in session many times during said period, the law has never been changed so as to confer upon an administrator the right to maintain an action under the circumstances of this case.

The personnel of the court having changed since the decision in the Gibbs Case, industrious counsel representing the plaintiff in Gilkeson, Adm'r, v. Railway Co., 222 Mo. 173, 121 S. W. 138, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 844, 17 Ann. Cas. 763, conceived the idea of urging this court to change its ruling in respect to the principles of law declared in the Gibbs Case. In the Gilkeson Case, it appears from the record that the father and mother of plaintiff's intestate were passengers on defendant's train, and were killed on October 10, 1904, through the negligence of defendant in operating the same. Clifford Ragel, their son, 14 years of age, was injured in the same wreck, and died in Pettis county, Mo., on October 14, 1904. The plaintiff, George C. Gilkeson, was appointed administrator of the estate of Clifford Ragel, deceased, by the probate court of Johnson county, Mo., duly qualified as such, and commenced above suit in Johnson county aforesaid, in two counts. The first was for $5,000, based upon the death of the father, and the second count, based upon the death of the mother. In other words, the administrator of the son's estate sued in two counts for $5,000 each, based upon the respective deaths of the father and mother. The administrator recovered in the court below a judgment upon each count for $5,000. This court, in a unanimous opinion, reversed the cause, and entered judgment here for defendant.

We have before us the record and briefs of counsel in the Gilkeson Case. The cause was elaborately briefed upon each suit, and fully argued orally. Practically all the leading authorities cited by appellant's counsel in this case were presented to the court, and many authorities from other states cited in support of plaintiff's theory. Sections 105, 106, and 5425, supra, were fully discussed upon each side. Judge Woodson, in behalf of Division 1, before whom said cause was pending, delivered an able and exhaustive opinion upon the questions involved, in which all the members of that division concurred. This opinion was rendered in 1909. The court at that time was composed of Judges Lamm, Valliant, Woodson, and Graves.

In passing, it will be observed that the obiter dictum of Judge Valliant in Behen v. Transit Co., 186 Mo. loc. cit. 445, 85 S. W. 346, so strongly relied on by counsel for appellant here, was not only overruled in terms by Judge Gantt, speaking for this division in Bates v. Sylvester, 205 Mo. loc. cit. 501, 104 S. W. 73, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1157, 120 Am. St. Rep. 761, 12 Ann. Cas. 457, but in the Gilkeson Case, 222 Mo. at pages 196, 197, 121 S. W. 138, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 844, 17 Ann. Cas. 763, the obiter dictum of Judge Valliant in the Behen Case was again overruled, and Judge Valliant concurred in the opinion overruling same.

With the published ruling in the Gilkeson Case, following that in Gibbs v. City of Hannibal, supra, the Legislature has never taken any action to overturn the above cases, and have, apparently at least, acquiesced in the construction placed by this court upon said sections 105, 106, and 5425 of the Revised Statutes of 1909.

It is to the interest of the republic that there be an end to litigation. This division, having ruled adversely to appellant's contention in Bates v. Sylvester, 205 Mo. 493, 104 S. W. 73, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1157, 120 Am. St. Rep. 761, 12 Ann. Cas. 457, where the statutes aforesaid and authorities are reviewed, and the same result having been reached in the Gibbs and Gilkeson Cases, supra, we do not deem it necessary to either cite or further consider the array of authorities in respondent's brief, sustaining the views heretofore expressed.

Without considering this question further, we are of the opinion that the trial court reached a correct conclusion in behalf of respondent. The judgment below is accordingly affirmed.

GOTT v. KANSAS CITY RYS. CO.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920. Motion for Rehearing
Denied June 25, 1920.)

1. Carriers \S 321(16)—Instruction in suit for injuries to passenger carried past destination held erroneous as equivalent to charge of ordinary care.

In an action for injuries to a passenger resulting after being carried past her station, an instruction to find for plaintiff only if conductor could have reasonably anticipated the possibility of such accident as befell plaintiff was erroneous, as being equivalent to charge that only ordinary care was required.

2. Carriers \S 272—Passenger entitled to be discharged at safe place.

A carrier's contract safely to transport passenger to her destination is not performed until she has been discharged from car at a reasonably safe place.

3. Carriers \S 271—Utmost care required in carrying passenger safely to destination.

In performance of contract to carry passenger safely to destination, carrier must use the utmost care that very prudent men employ in performing the contract of carriage with like means of transportation.

4. Carriers \S 303(13)—Passenger entitled to high degree of care, though not injured immediately on alighting.

A carrier in carrying passenger safely to destination is not absolved of the high degree of care required merely because the passenger, on being carried past her station, is not injured in the very act of alighting, nor at the very spot or moment where and when she alighted.

5. Trial \Rightarrow 253(9)—Instruction that conductor did not direct passenger on alighting to go the way she did held contrary to the evidence.

In action for injuries to passenger carried past her station and struck by another car on a trestle in going back to her destination, an instruction that there was no evidence that conductor directed her to go back by way of the track as she did was erroneous, in view of evidence that conductor pointed out the lights at place of her destination, and waived his hands in that direction.

6. Carriers \Rightarrow 347(12)—Instruction in suit by passenger, discharged beyond destination, as to choice of ways back, held erroneous.

In action for injuries to passenger carried past her destination and struck by another car in going back to destination by way of the tracks, an instruction that there could be no finding for plaintiff without a finding that a reasonably prudent person could not have discovered any other route was erroneous, as requiring plaintiff to take any route other than the tracks, whether safe or not.

7. Trial \Rightarrow 191(9)—Instruction in action for injuries to passenger carried past her station, assuming that a road was safe, was erroneous.

In action for injuries to passenger carried past her station and struck by another car in going back to her destination by way of the tracks, an instruction that if conductor pointed out the road as a way to go back she could not recover was erroneous, as assuming that such road was safe; there being evidence to the contrary.

8. Trial \Rightarrow 244(4)—Instruction, in action for injuries to passenger carried past her station, held erroneous, as unduly singling out the evidence.

In action for injuries to passenger carried past her station and struck by another car in going back to her destination, an instruction that plaintiff could not recover if conductor called out distinctly her station, unless conductor stopped at place beyond and she was led to believe by conductor's silence that she had to get off there, though she objected, was erroneous, as unduly singling out certain portions of the evidence.

9. Carriers \Rightarrow 317(7)—Evidence that conductor pointed out to passenger carried past station the lights at place of destination held admissible under the petition.

In action for injuries to passenger carried past her station and struck by another car in going back to her destination, evidence that conductor stopped the car at place beyond station and pointed out lights at place of destination was admissible under petition alleging that conductor directed plaintiff to alight at that place.

10. Carriers \Rightarrow 305(5)—Discharging passenger at place beyond station held proximate cause of injury from another car.

If carrier discharged passenger at a place beyond her station, whereby she was compelled to walk the track back to destination, the act of discharging was the proximate cause of her injury from being struck by another car.

11. Carriers \Rightarrow 320(27) — Evidence in action for injuries to passenger carried past her station held to take case to jury.

In action for injuries to passenger carried past her station, resulting from being struck by another car on a trestle on going back to her destination by way of the track, evidence held sufficient to take case to jury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Willard P. Hall, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Gott against the Kansas City Railways Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Plaintiff, suing to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of the negligence of the defendant, was, by the verdict of a jury, denied a recovery, and duly appeals. The petition was formal. The answer was a general denial and a plea of contributory negligence. No questions are made as to the pleadings, evidence, or aught else save the instructions. It is necessary, therefore, to state only such facts as bear upon the propriety of the action of the trial court in giving and refusing instructions.

Plaintiff, a woman of 55 years and a stranger in Kansas City, took passage upon one of defendant's cars in that city, for the purpose of going to Sheffield, a regular stopping place on defendant's street car line between Kansas City, Mo., and Independence, Mo. She testified that she duly paid her fare, notified the conductor that she was a stranger in the city, and that she desired to alight at Sheffield, and was told by him that he would let her off of the car when that point was reached. Shortly after the car had passed Sheffield, plaintiff though unacquainted in the vicinity, suspected that she had been carried past her destination, and upon inquiry of the conductor learned that her surmise was correct. Plaintiff reiterated her statement that she desired to get off at Sheffield, and the conductor thereupon rang the bell and stopped the car. Plaintiff proceeded to alight. It was night, however, and she protested against having to get off, at such a time and place, on account of her age and weight. The conductor made no response, but as she was descending the steps he pointed back in the direction from which the car had come, and told plaintiff that some lights which were visible in the direction indicated were at Sheffield. The car then proceeded on its way, and plaintiff started back up the track toward the lights which had been pointed out to her. The distance from where plaintiff left the car to Sheffield was apparently about the length of an ordinary city block. After plaintiff had gone about 10 steps, she looked up and saw a street car approaching from the west, the direction in which she was going, and upon the same tracks upon which she was walking. Defendant maintained a double track upon its lines between the points in question. Upon observing the approaching car, plaintiff stepped over upon the north track, to escape the on-coming car, and very shortly after doing so discovered that she was walking upon a trestle, and, looking downward, saw the gleam of water beneath her feet. She had then gone 12 or 15 steps from the place where she alighted. At about the same time, she was enveloped in the glare of the headlight of another street car coming from the east, and upon the tracks between which she was then walking, and in dangerously close proximity. Plaintiff endeavored to signal the last-mentioned car, failed to attract the motorman's attention, and was struck and injured.

The point where plaintiff alighted from defendant's car was at the intersection of Bristol avenue with defendant's right of way, in the eastern suburbs of Kansas City. According to the testimony of the conductor, this was a regular stopping place. It was unlighted. The hour was about midnight. Bristol avenue runs north and south. The street car line runs east and west. Independence road, another street, practically parallels the street car line at this place. Bristol avenue runs north to Independence road. The distance between the point where plaintiff alighted and Independence road is described as a "short block." Independence road runs west to Ewing avenue, a distance of about two blocks. Ewing avenue runs south to Sheffield, a distance of about a block. The trestle upon which plaintiff was walking when she was struck crosses Goose-neck creek. Between that creek and Sheffield three railroad tracks cross the defendant's right of way. There was no practicable way by which plaintiff could have gone south from the point where she alighted on Bristol avenue, and thus have reached Sheffield avenue. Bristol avenue was an ungraded street with a wagon road down the center, and a board sidewalk on the east side. As stated, plaintiff was not acquainted with the locality. The gravamen of her petition is that defendant was negligent in directing her to alight in an unsafe place. There was evidence in behalf of defendant that the conductor offered to take plaintiff on to Independence, a distance of a few miles, and bring her back, without charge, and also that he directed her to return to Sheffield by way of Bristol avenue and Independence road. This testimony was contradicted by plaintiff. She also testified that she did not see or know of either Bristol avenue or Independence road, although she looked about for some other route to take to Sheffield. The instructions will be discussed later.

A. R. McClanahan, of Kansas City, E. O. Hamilton, of Independence, and Reed & Harvey, of Kansas City, for appellant.

R. J. Higgins, of Kansas City, Kan., and L. T. Dryden, of Independence, for respondent.

WILLIAMSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-3] I. Appellant complains of the action of the trial court in giving instruction No. 1 to the jury. This instruction is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that plaintiff, after the car in evidence passed Sheffield, inquired of the conductor if Sheffield had been passed, and that the conductor in charge of the car upon which plaintiff was a passenger stopped said car for the purpose of permitting plaintiff to alight therefrom at or about Bristol avenue, in order that plaintiff might return to Sheffield, and that plaintiff in the exercise of ordinary care and intelligence did understand and believe that the conductor desired her to alight at said point, and that said point was dark, and that plaintiff was a stranger to the place and in the exercise of reasonable care and intelligence did not see, and could not have seen, any route over which she could proceed to Sheffield except the route over the tracks of defendant back to Sheffield, and that it was necessary for her in passing along that route back to Sheffield to cross over the trestle in evidence, and that the time and place of alighting were dangerous and unsafe, and that plaintiff did pass over said route in an attempt to go back to Sheffield, and in so doing used the care and prudence of an ordinarily prudent person under like circumstances, and while so doing was struck by one of defendant's cars while she was still upon said trestle, and was injured, and if the jury further find that defendant's conductor in charge of the car upon which plaintiff had been a passenger could have reasonably anticipated the possibility of such an accident, as explained in other instructions given by the court, and if the jury further find that at said time and place plaintiff was exercising the care and prudence of an ordinarily prudent person, then the jury should find a verdict for the plaintiff."

The error is said to lie in the portion of the instruction which we have italicized, and more particularly in that portion which directed the jury to find in appellant's favor only in the event that the jury found that respondent's servant, the conductor, "could have reasonably anticipated the possibility" of the occurrence of such an accident as befell appellant as a result of permitting her to alight from respondent's car at an unsafe place. Or, to rephrase the thought, the jury was told that respondent was not liable unless the event which occurred could reasonably have been anticipated as a possible result of putting appellant down at an unsafe place. This is simply equivalent to saying that respondent was bound to use ordinary care only. But was ordinary care sufficient? The carrier's contract safely to transport appellant to her destination was not performed until she had been discharged from respondent's car at a reasonably safe place. Until that end had been attained, the respondent was bound to use that high degree of care which the law imposes on common carriers of passengers, namely, the utmost care that very prudent men employ in performing the contract of carriage with like means of transportation. Stauffer v. Railroad, 248 Mo. 305, loc. cit. 318, 147 S. W. 1032. It is a rule, often reiterated in this jurisdiction, that it is the duty of carriers of passengers to carry them safely to their destinations, and to put them off at safe places only. McGee v. Railroad, 92 Mo. 208, 4 S. W. 739, 1 Am. St. Rep. 706; Griffith v. Railroad, 98 Mo. 174, 11 S. W. 559; Cossitt v. Railroad, 224 Mo. 97, loc. cit. 107, 123 S. W. 569. The rule with reference to the degree of care required of carriers of passengers with respect to discharging passengers at safe places is well stated by Goode, J., in Fillingham v. Railroad, 102 Mo. App. 573, loc. cit. 581, 77 S. W. 314, 817, as follows:

"The degree of care required of the carrier for a passenger's safety while he is leaving the vehicle is as high as that required while he is in transit; that is to say, the extraordinary care imposed by law on carriers of passengers begins when the contract of carriage takes effect on the rights of the parties and continues unimpaired until the contract ends with deposit at destination, thus protecting passengers as they get on and off conveyances. * * * Part of this duty to safeguard passengers while leaving a car or other vehicle consists in taking care to put them off at a reasonably safe place."

See, also, Rearden v. Railroad, 215 Mo. 105, loc. cit. 132, 114 S. W. 961.

[4] The carrier is not absolved from liability, nor from this high degree of care, merely because the passenger is not injured while in the very act of alighting nor at the very spot or moment where and when he alighted (Cossitt v. Railroad, supra; Atkinson v. Railroad, 90 Mo. App. 489, loc. cit. 497), and the carrier is, of course—as has been repeatedly held—charged with notice of the conditions at and immediately adjacent to the spot where it discharges passengers from its conveyances. If a passenger is put off at an unsafe place and is injured in consequence, the negligence of the carrier is considered to be the proximate cause of the injury. Cossitt v. Railroad, supra. As given, the instruction only required respondent to use ordinary care to deposit appellant in a reasonably safe place. The law requires a higher degree of care, and the jury should have been so instructed. We think this instruction was erroneous. Since instruction 4A is practically but the converse of the thought expressed in the italicized portion of instruction No. 1, what we have here said applies with like force to instruction 4A.

[5, 6] II. Instruction No. 3 is said to be erroneous. This instruction is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that there is no evidence in this case that defendant's conductor in charge of the car upon which plaintiff was a passenger directed plaintiff to walk from the place at which she alighted from said car back to Sheffield over defendant's tracks, and the jury should not find for the plaintiff upon the hypothesis that there is any such evidence; but, if the jury believe from the evidence that at the time and place of plaintiff's alighting from said car it was dark and the locality was strange to her, and that a reasonably prudent and intelligent person could not have discovered any other route than the route over defendant's railroad tracks back to Sheffield, and that plaintiff did not know of any other route, then plaintiff was justified in attempting to pass over said route."

In this contention we are persuaded that appellant is correct. The petition, it is true, alleges that appellant started back to Sheffield over respondent's tracks "in reliance upon the direction of the conductor," but, fairly construed, the word "direction" so used was used in its secondary meaning of guidance or suggestion, rather than as meaning an order. This is a very sweeping instruction. The surroundings and all attendant circumstances must be taken into consideration in determining the propriety of giving it. Appellant was an elderly, and apparently a heavy, woman, and therefore presumptively lacking in the physical agility which might facilitate escape from imminent and impending danger. The hour was midnight. The place was a lonely suburb. The way was dark. Between Sheffield and the place where appellant alighted from respondent's car, Gooseneck creek and three railroad tracks crossed respondent's right of way. Upon this route, the trestle afforded the only means of crossing the creek. Street cars frequently passed to and fro over this trestle. Three street cars appeared upon the scene during the short time here involved. Respondent was familiar with the locus in quo and with all of the dangers incident thereto. Appellant was a stranger to all of these things, and respondent's conductor knew that fact. By stopping the car and permitting appellant to alight, respondent impliedly represented that the place was reasonably safe for that purpose, and by pointing out to her the lights of Sheffield and by informing her that those lights marked the place to which she desired to go, it might reasonably be inferred that respondent assured her that she might, with reasonably safety, attempt to return to Sheffield over its tracks. Cossitt v.

Railway Co., 224 Mo. 97, loc. cit. 106, 123 S. W. 569. If these words and acts did not mean this, what did they mean? The instruction excluded this evidence from the consideration of the jury. The evidence was properly admitted, but if it was not to be considered by the jury upon this question, for what purpose was it to be considered? Furthermore the instruction also informed the jury that it could not find for appellant without first finding that "a reasonably prudent and intelligent person could not have discovered any other route * * * back to Sheffield." Unqualified as it was, this instruction amounted to saying that if a reasonably prudent and intelligent person could have discovered any other route whether long or short, safe or unsafe, back to Sheffield, then appellant could not recover. We think this instruction is erroneous in the particulars mentioned.

[7] III. Instruction No. 4, given by the court, is also assailed as erroneous. It is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe and find from the evidence in this case that the conductor either offered to bring the plaintiff to Independence and back to Sheffield, or that he pointed out to plaintiff Bristol avenue, and told her to go up Bristol avenue to Independence road, and pointed to lights thereon, then plaintiff cannot recover in this case, and your verdict should be for the defendant."

There was evidence tending to show that the route to Sheffield, thus indicated by the conductor, as respondent claims, was subject to many of the dangers to be encountered upon the route over respondent's tracks. Apparently the same stream and the same railroad tracks were to be crossed. So far as this record shows, there may or may not have been a bridge on Independence road across this stream. Its existence and condition are left to surmise and conjecture. So also, is the size of Gooseneck creek. The evidence discloses that Bristol avenue was at that time an ungraded street, and traveling upon it was, in the language of a witness, "just like going across a vacant lot," although "There was a kind of roadway that wagons used to drive in around the car tracks." Yet the jury was told by this instruction, in substance, that if this way had been pointed out to appellant and she failed to use it, then she could not recover, notwithstanding the fact that the jury might have believed that the dangers to be encountered upon this route were as great as those to be met in using the route back over respondent's tracks. We think the instruction should have been modified, at least to the extent of requiring the jury to find that the way so claimed to have been pointed out to appellant was reasonably safe for her use under the existing conditions. As the instruction stands, it assumes that the route by way of Bristol avenue and Independence road was reasonably safe. Whether that was true or not, was, we think, under the evidence a question of fact which should have been left to the determination of the jury.

[8] IV. Instruction No. 5 is said to be erroneous because it told the jury that if the "conductor called out clearly and distinctly, 'Sheffield,' and stopped a sufficient length of time to have enabled plaintiff to alight from said car at said point," then appellant could not recover, unless respondent thereafter stopped the car at Bristol avenue for the purpose of having appellant alight there, and that she objected to alighting at that point, and did alight only because she was, by the conductor's silence, led to believe that she had to get off there. We think that this instruction is subject to criticism, in that it unduly singles out and makes prominent certain portions of the evidence. It could well have been couched in more general terms touching the sufficiency of the notice to alight, although this defect is, perhaps, not one which, alone, would warrant reversal. It is mentioned only that it may be avoided upon a retrial of the case.

[9-11] V. Respondent insists that the judgment should be affirmed, regardless of error in the instructions (which, however, it does not concede), upon the theory that its demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained. We agree with the learned trial judge that the contrary is true. The testimony concerning the act of the conductor in stopping the car and pointing out the lights of Sheffield to appellant was, under the circumstances, properly admitted in evidence under the allegation of the petition to the effect that respondent's conductor directed appellant to alight at that place. The act of the respondent in discharging appellant from its car was the proximate cause of the injuries shortly thereafter sustained by appellant when she was run down by another of respondent's cars on the adjacent track. Coslett v. Railroad, supra. There was sufficient evidence to carry to case to the jury, on both of these matters. Furthermore, it may well be questioned whether respondent, not having prosecuted a cross-appeal, is in position to allege error in this case in any event. Westminster College v. Piersol, 161 Mo. 270, loc. cit. 285, 61 S. W. 811; Kansas City v. Railway Co., 187 Mo. 146, loc. cit. 156, 86 S. W. 190. We do not now pass on this question, but, having reached the conclusions above announced, it seems proper to indicate our views upon respondent's contention, so as to set that matter at rest in the event of another trial of this suit.

It follows that this cause should be reversed and remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. It is so ordered.
All concur.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF BEEVILLE, TEX., v.
SECURITY MUT. LIFE INS. CO. OF BINGHAMTON, N. Y. (No. 20852.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920. Motion for Rehearing
Denied June 25, 1920.)

1. Pleading \S 428(4)—Petition held sufficient as against objection to evidence for failure to state cause of action.

In action on insurance policy, petition, averring that "plaintiff has kept and performed all of the terms and conditions * * * required to be kept and performed * * * both before and after the maturity of the claim herein sued for," was not open to the objection that it failed to state a cause of action, in that it failed to allege a demand for payment prior to suit, where defendant did not demur to the petition, but objected to the introduction of any evidence upon the ground that the petition failed to state a cause of action, as this practice is not to be commended.

2. Insurance \S 205—Insurer cannot urge lack of beneficiary's consent to assignment.

Defendant insurance company, in suit on policy by assignee thereof, could not object that the policy was assigned without the consent of insured's wife, the original beneficiary; there being no privity between her and defendant.

3. Insurance \S 203—Reservation of right to change beneficiary makes policy freely assignable.

Where the right to change the beneficiary is reserved, insured may assign the policy at will.

4. Limitation of actions \S 173—Right to plead personal to debtor.

Defendant insurance company, in suit on policy by bank to which the policy was assigned as security, could not defend on the ground that the debt for which the policy was pledged was barred, thereby releasing the pledge, as the right to plead limitations is personal to the debtor or his privies.

5. Limitation of actions \S 46(1), 167(1)—Runs from maturity of policy; bar of debt for which policy is pledged not barring pledgee's action on policy.

Limitations do not begin to run against action on an insurance policy until the policy matures, so that defendant insurance company, in suit on policy by bank to which the policy was pledged, could not defend on the ground that the debt secured by the pledged policy was barred; the action being on the policy, not on the debt.

6. Insurance \S 122—Assignment of policy as security for debt not void on ground of no insurable interest.

An assignment of a life insurance policy to a creditor as security for his debt is not void on the ground of his having no insurable interest, but is valid to the extent, at least, to which the policy becomes security for the debt and for advances thereafter made by the assignee upon the policy, the balance, if any, upon the maturity of the policy becoming payable to beneficiaries originally designated, and, in any event, the insurer cannot raise the objection of lack of insurable interest in assignee; its remedy, in case of fear that it may not pay the proper parties, being by interpleader.

7. Insurance \S 613—Suit on policy sufficient demand.

Suit upon an insurance policy was a demand.

8. Insurance \S 669(1)—Pleading \S 433(7)—Reply held sufficient after verdict.

In assignee's suit on insurance policy, defended on ground of superior lien of defendant insurance company by virtue of a prior loan agreement executed by insured, allegations of the reply, denying that insured ever executed the agreement, and pleading that his signature thereto was obtained, if at all, "by fraud and misrepresentation," that he "did not know or intend to sign any such paper, and did not know that any charge, such as is set forth in said paper, was made against him," not being assailed by motion to make more definite and certain, or otherwise, in the trial court, were sufficient after verdict, and sufficiently definite to support an instruction on fraudulent concealment; such concealment being, by reasonable inference, within the scope of such allegations.

9. Appeal and error \S 1026—Error must be material to be reversible.

Error, to justify reversal, must be material.

10. Appeal and error \S 1033(5)—Error in instructions favorable to appellant not ground for reversal.

Defendant insurance company, in suit on a policy, could not complain that an instruction, stating it had a right to make a deduction by virtue of a loan agreement by insured unless the agreement was obtained by fraudulent representations, but making no reference to fraudulent concealments, was inconsistent with another instruction, mentioning fraudulent concealment as well as representations; the fact that fraudulent concealment was not mentioned in one instruction, if error at all, being error in favor of appellant.

11. Insurance \S 179½—Evidence showed loan agreement was obtained from insured by insurer by fraud.

In action on life insurance policy, where defendant insurance company defended on the ground that it had a right to make a deduction from the maturity value of the policy by virtue of a loan agreement by insured, evidence held to support jury's finding that the loan agreement was obtained by fraud.

12. Insurance \S 675—Attorney's fee not allowable in suit on foreign state policy, where no statute authorizing shown.

No attorney's fee should have been allowed in suit on an insurance policy, which was a contract made in another state, where no statute of that state authorizing such a fee was pleaded and proved, for the allowance of such fee relates to the right, and not to the remedy.

13. Evidence \Leftarrow 35—No judicial notice taken of sister state statutes.

Courts do not take judicial notice of the statutes of a sister state.

Error to Circuit Court, Jackson County; Allen C. Southern, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Beeville, Tex., against the Security Mutual Life Insurance Company of Binghamton, N. Y. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed on condition of remittitur.

The First National Bank of Beeville, Tex. (hereinafter called the bank), brought suit in the circuit court of Jackson county, Mo., against the Security Mutual Life Insurance Company of Binghamton, N. Y. (hereinafter called the insurance company), to recover an amount claimed to be due upon a life insurance policy issued by the company upon the life of Albert G. Kennedy. Plaintiff recovered a judgment in the sum of $7,315.14 and $750 for attorney's fees. The company has duly brought the cause to this court upon a writ of error.

The suit grew out of the following facts: Albert G. Kennedy held a life insurance policy, 9 years old, amount not stated and cash-surrender value not disclosed, issued by the defendant. He was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $1,082.65. The policy was pledged for the payment of this debt. In August, 1905, at the solicitation of defendant, Kennedy took out the policy here in suit for $8,000 on the 20-payment plan. For the new policy, he surrendered the old one, and, so defendant says, gave his written promise to pay to defendant $3,301.52, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, secured by a lien upon the new policy. The plaintiff, at defendant's request, consented to surrender the old policy and accept the new one in lieu thereof, and for 11 years paid the annual premium of $488.96. But plaintiff for 9 years after the new policy was issued did not know of the agreement that the new policy should stand subject to defendant's lien for $3,301.52. Neither did Kennedy, as he says.

In the end plaintiff had advanced, in loans, interest, and premiums, a sum in excess of $7,160 on the new policy, when it matured. Its maturity value was $7,160. But defendant claimed the right to deduct $3,301.52, together with interest at 6 per cent. per annum from August 9, 1905, amounting in all to $5,480.51, leaving as defendant claimed, $1,200, which it was willing to pay to the legal holder of the policy. Plaintiff declined to accept this offer, and brought this suit. This is a bird's-eye view of the case. Further facts follow.

The plaintiff, after the usual formal allegations, averred that the defendant on the 9th day of August, 1904, insured the life of Albert G. Kennedy in the sum of $8,000, to be paid upon his death to his wife, Agnes Kennedy; that it was provided in the policy that if the insured were living on the 9th day of August, 1915, the defendant would then pay to the legal holder or beneficiary of the policy the sum of $5,960, plus such profits as the defendant might have apportioned to this policy; that on the 14th day of September, 1905, said Kennedy and his wife, in consideration of an indebtedness in the sum of $1,865.65 then due from said Kennedy to plaintiff, assigned the policy in writing to plaintiff, including in the assignment all rights which had accrued, or which might accrue, under the policy; that defendant was duly notified of the assignment, and consented thereto, and on the 25th day of September, 1905, the defendant, by a writing indorsed on the policy, substituted plaintiff as the beneficiary in lieu of Mrs. Kennedy, and that thereby plaintiff became and had ever since remained the owner thereof; that plaintiff had paid all premiums subsequently accruing upon this policy, and that the total amount of the premiums so paid was $4,888.96; that on the 9th day of August, 1915, the insured was still living, and was then indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $5,212.12, for money loaned and premiums paid as aforesaid; that on said date the profits which had been apportioned to this policy by defendant amounted to $1,200, and that defendant thereupon became liable to plaintiff in the total sum of said profits, plus the guaranteed value of the policy on said date, amounting to the total sum of $7,160; that payment of said liability had been demanded, but that defendant had vexatiously refused to pay. Plaintiff prayed judgment in the sum of $7,160, and for attorney's fees in the sum of $750, and costs.

The pertinent portions of defendant's answer are, in effect, as follows: Except for formal admissions as to the corporate existence of plaintiff and defendant, and an admission that defendant had issued the policy in question, the answer contained, first, a general denial. This was followed by averments to the effect that the promise to pay the holder or beneficiary of the policy the sum of $5,960 and accrued profits was conditional, in this, that out of said sums should first be deducted all indebtedness of the insured to the defendant; that on August 9, 1904, the insured had executed and delivered to defendant a writing acknowledging the receipt of a loan from defendant in the sum of $3,301.52, and agreeing that said sum, together with any additional loans upon the policy, with 6 per cent. interest on such loan or loans, should become due at the end of the distribution period or prior thereto upon the death of the insured, or upon his failure to make any payment due to defendant, and the total should be paid out of the proceeds of the policy; that the policy was issued in consideration of the execution and delivery of said writing by said Kennedy; that the policy was dated back 9 years, thus giving Kennedy the benefit of a lower premium rate; that the policy called for the payment of 20 annual premiums in order to entitle the holder to the benefits specified in the policy, but that the premiums for the preceding 9 years above mentioned were paid only by the loan agreement above mentioned, and in fact only 11 premiums had been paid upon the policy; that the profits apportioned to the policy on August 9, 1915, amounted only to $720.51, so that its value on that date was only $6,680.51; that the loan above mentioned then amounted to $5,480.51, and that the cash-surrender value of the policy, after deducting the amount of the loan, was therefore only $1,200, which sum defendant had offered to pay upon the delivery of the policy. For another defense, defendant stated that the policy was executed and delivered in Texas and was a Texas contract; the debt of the insured to plaintiff was an individual obligation; that Mrs. Kennedy joined in the assignment only to secure her husband's debt to plaintiff, and that after the payment of such indebtedness the remainder should be paid to Mrs. Kennedy; that after the payment of three annual premiums the insured was entitled to borrow on the policy, and that in lieu of said three payments the insured executed the loan agreement above mentioned; that both when the policy and loan agreement were executed and now it was provided by the laws of Texas (quoting the statute) that nonnegotiable instruments were subject, when in the hands of an assignee, to every defense, that might have been pleaded against the assignor, and that therefore defendant had a right to credit the indebtedness claimed to be due it as aforesaid upon the amount due on the policy.

As another defense, the defendant affirmed that plaintiff, being a national bank, could not lawfully purchase the policy, but could only take it as security for a pre-existing debt; that at the date when the insured assigned the policy to plaintiff, plaintiff's debt against him was past due, and "became and was barred" by the 4-year statute of limitations of Texas (quoting it); that the plaintiff's debt against the insured was barred long before this suit was brought, and that thereby plaintiff became merely a bailee of the policy for Mrs. Kennedy, and had no right to maintain an action thereon against defendant; that after plaintiff's debt became barred as aforesaid, plaintiff and insured, by agreement between themselves, but without Mrs. Kennedy's consent, extended the time for the payment of such indebtedness, and that thereby plaintiff's lien upon said policy lapsed.

For a further defense, defendant asserted that the policy was not pledged to secure the plaintiff in the payment of the annual premiums; that each premium paid by plaintiff became a debt due it from Kennedy as soon as plaintiff paid it, and that all of them except the last were barred by the 2-year statute of limitations of Texas (quoting it); and that all except the last five premium payments were barred by the 5-year statute of limitations of Missouri.

Defendant for a further defense sets up the fact, as claimed by it, that long before the maturity of the policy plaintiff was informed of defendant's debt and claim against said policy, and thereafter continued to pay premiums thereon, and is therefore now estopped to deny defendant's right to deduct its debt from the amount due on the policy.

Having thus set up some 10 defenses, the insurance company asserted that it had fully answered, and prayed to be dismissed. The reply, after a general denial, in substance averred that Kennedy never executed the loan agreement; that if he did sign it his signature was procured by fraud; that said agreement was without consideration and void as against public policy; that at the time the policy above named was issued, Kennedy was the holder of another policy in defendant company, which was held by plaintiff as security for Kennedy's indebtedness to it, as defendant well knew; that defendant informed plaintiff that said original policy had lapsed for nonpayment of a premium note given by the insured, but that if plaintiff would pay that note and an annual premium of $488, a total of $800, defendant would reinstate the policy; that defendant made no mention of the loan agreement above mentioned; that plaintiff was thereby induced to pay said $800, and took an assignment of the policy and paid defendant over $4,000 in premiums before defendant informed plaintiff of defendant's alleged claim against said policy; that as soon as plaintiff learned of defendant's claim plaintiff denied its validity, but made the two remaining premium payments, in order to protect itself for premiums and money already paid by it, by keeping said policy in force until maturity; and that by its silence defendant was estopped now to assert its pretended claim.

Plaintiff's evidence tended to support its pleadings, and defendant introduced or offered evidence tending to support its answer, except as otherwise hereinafter indicated. So far as necessary, the instructions will be mentioned in the opinion proper. The verdict and judgment were in plaintiff's favor.

Roland Hughes, of Kansas City, for plaintiff in error.

C. N. Sadler, of Kansas City, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). Appellant has not favored us with an assignment of errors, but has set out under the heading of Points and Authorities 13 paragraphs, which we will treat as in lieu or assignments of error. Mugan v. Wheeler, 241 Mo. 376; 145 S. W. 462. We will dispose of these questions in the order in which they are argued.

[1] I. Appellant first suggests that the petition fails to state a cause of action, in that it fails to allege a demand for payment by respondent prior to the filing of the suit. This contention is based upon the claim that by the terms of the policy, appellant agreed upon the maturity of the policy to do one of five things named in the policy "at the option or demand of the person entitled to exercise the option." We find no such provision in the policy. Furthermore, the petition contains an averment that—

"The plaintiff has kept and performed all of the terms and conditions of said policy of life insurance required to be kept and performed by the plaintiff both before and after the maturity of the claim herein sued for."

Appellant did not demur to the petition, but did object to the introduction of any evidence, upon the ground that the petition failed to state a cause of action. This practice is not to be commended. The allegations of the petition are sufficient as against such an objection.

[2, 3] II. Appellant next argues that Mrs. Kennedy was the beneficiary of the policy; that the only consent she ever gave to the assignment was to the effect that the policy might be pledged to secure her husband's indebtedness to respondent in the sum of $1,034.65, and that all subsequent arrangements were between the respondent and the insured only, and without her knowledge or consent, and were void as to her; that when the insured assigned the policy outright to appellant, this arrangement was a cancellation of the debt for which Mrs. Kennedy pledged the policy, and the pledge was thereby released, and respondent's lien upon the policy was thereby destroyed.

This argument fails to take into account several important matters. There is no privity between Mrs. Kennedy and appellant, and on what theory appellant undertakes in this action to assert her rights is not apparent. Furthermore, the insured had the right under the terms of the policy to change the beneficiary, and exercised that right in favor of the respondent. Appellant consented to this change. Again, Mrs. Kennedy's rights were conditioned upon her remaining the beneficiary in the policy and surviving her husband, and the evidence shows that she died about 1907 or 1909, during her husband's lifetime and several years before the maturity of the policy, and that prior to her death, respondent had been made the beneficiary in the policy. By an express provision of the policy, any payments becoming due under it were to be made to the estate of the insured, or to his assigns, in the event of the death of Mrs. Kennedy prior to the maturity of the policy. Where, as here, the right to change the beneficiary is reserved, the insured may assign the policy at will. Fuos v. Dietrich (Tex. Civ. App.) 101 S. W. 291; Cooley's Briefs on Ins., vol. 6, page 424; Splawn v. Chew, 60 Tex. 532, loc. cit. 534. Under the option clause of the policy, the appellant agreed to pay upon August 9, 1915, upon the surrender of the policy by the insured or his assigns, the full sum of $5,960, plus accrued profits, subject to existing indebtedness, provided the insured was then living and all premiums had been paid. The insured was living upon that date, and all premiums had been paid. Mrs. Kennedy was then dead, and respondent was then the holder of this policy by assignment. We rule this point against the appellant.

[4, 5] III. Appellant's next contention is that the respondent's debt became barred by the 4-year statute of limitations of Texas, and for that reason respondent cannot recover. This statute was offered in evidence, and excluded by the court. The debt to which appellant here refers is Kennedy's original indebtedness to respondent, to secure which the policy was pledged. As to this debt, appellant contends that Mrs. Kennedy held the relation of surety, and that the pledge of the policy was released by operation of law when the claim became barred by the statute of limitations. This record discloses numerous pertinent answers to this contention, but two will suffice. The right to plead the statute of limitations is a privilege personal to the debtor or to those standing in privity with him by inheritance or estate, such as personal representatives, heirs, grantees, or mortgagees. Wood on Limitations, vol. 1, p. 142 (4th Ed.) and cases there cited. Appellant occupies no such relation either to the insured or to Mrs. Kennedy, except, perhaps, as to the so-called loan agreement, to which further reference will be made. Furthermore, this is not an action on the debt, but on the policy. Limitation did not begin to run until the policy matured. Harde v. Germania Life Ins. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.), 153 S. W. 606, loc. cit. 609; Bush v. Kansas City Life Ins. Co. (Mo.) 214 S. W. 175, loc. cit. 179. We decide this contention against appellant.

[6] IV. Appellant asserts that the contract for the purchase of this policy by respondent is void as against public policy. The reason is said to lie in the fact that in such case the purchaser has an interest in the death of the insured. Price v. Supreme Lodge, 68 Tex. 361, is cited in support of this contention. The plaintiff in that case had no insurable interest in the life of the insured, nor did the relation of debtor and creditor exist between them. The Price Case expressly recognizes an exception to the rule therein announced when the relation of debtor and creditor does exist. In such cases, practically all of the authorities, including the Price Case, hold that the assignment is not void, but is at least valid to the extent to which the policy becomes security for the existing debt and for all advances thereafter made by the assignee upon the policy. The balance, if any, upon the maturity of the policy becomes payable to beneficiaries originally designated. This is the rule in this state, as shown by the following cases, which, with commendable frankness, appellant cites: Tripp v. Jordan, 177 Mo. App. 339, loc. cit. 343, 164 S. W. 158; Jenkins v. Morrow, 131 Mo. App. 288, loc. cit. 296, 109 S. W. 1051; Bruer v. Kansas Mut. Life Ins. Co., 100 Mo. App. 540, loc. cit. 544, 75 S. W. 380. This is also the rule in the United States Supreme Court. Cammack v. Lewis, 15 Wall. 643, loc. cit. 648, 21 L. Ed. 244; Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, loc. cit. 779, 26 L. Ed. 924. See, also, Peoria Life Ins. Co. v. Hines, 132 Ill. App. 642, loc. cit. 647; Reed v. Provident Sav. Life Assurance Soc., 190 N. Y. 111, loc. cit. 119, 82 N. E. 734. If, therefore, appellant feared that some one other than respondent might set up a claim to any balance due upon this policy in excess of the amount of respondent's claims, it was its duty to bring such parties into court and require them to interplead. It could easily have relieved itself of any burden in the matter by paying the fund into court. This course is pointed out as a proper one in Cheeves v. Anders, 87 Tex. 287, loc. cit. 292, 28 S. W. 274, 275 (47 Am. St. Rep. 107), also cited by appellant in the following language:

"When an insurance company has issued a policy upon the life of a person payable to one who has no insurable interest in the life insured, or when a policy has been assigned to one having no such interest, the insurance company must nevertheless pay the full amount of the policy, if otherwise liable, because it has so contracted, and it is no concern of the insurer as to who gets the proceeds, except to see that it is paid to the proper parties under its agreement. It is simply required to perform its contract, and the law will dispose of the money according to the rights of the parties. Ins. Co. v. Williams, 79 Tex. 637, and authorities cited."

In the instant case, respondent's demand is made up of its original claim against the insured, amounting to $1,865.65 on September 14, 1905, and premiums thereafter paid by it amounting to $4,888.96, which sums, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum from the maturity of the policy, amount to the sum for which the verdict was returned, exclusive of attorney's fees. The total consumed the entire amount of respondent's liability under the policy. It had contracted to pay this amount to the holder of the policy at maturity. Respondent held the policy at maturity. Hence respondent was entitled to recover. There is no merit in appellant's contention on this point.

[7] V. Appellant avers that instruction No. 1, given for respondent, is erroneous. This instruction told the jury to find for plaintiff if the jury believed that the insured, on or about September 14, 1905, assigned the policy to the bank; that the bank was still the holder of the policy and that the insured was living at the date of the trial. There was substantial evidence to support a verdict in respondent's favor upon all of those facts. The instruction did not purport to cover the whole case. The evidence also showed that appellant had admitted its liability to the legal holder of the policy in the sum of $1,200, and indeed liability to the legal holder of the policy to that extent is admitted in the answer. The instruction required the jury to find that respondent was the assignee, and on that point was sufficient. Appellant claims that the instruction was erroneous in not requiring the jury to find that Mrs. Kennedy had executed an assignment of the policy, because the ownership was in her. Her only interest at any time was that of contingent beneficiary. The beneficiary had been changed, by consent of appellant. The insured had the absolute right under the policy to change the beneficiary. The wife's consent was unnecessary. Mrs. Kennedy was dead, and thus the only contingencies upon which she might have had a beneficial interest had been extinguished, both by the substitution of a new beneficiary and by her death prior to the death of the insured. It is said that the instruction did not require the jury to find that a demand had been made. The evidence shows that under date of August 13, 1915, respondent, referring to its claims against this policy, wrote appellant saying:

"We propose to have every dollar coming to us in this settlement, want nothing more and will accept nothing less. Advise us promptly your intentions, that we may know your attitude. We do not wish to resort to drastic action till you have had ample opportunity to settle this contract in accordance with the terms of your policy."

We think this was a demand. The evidence also shows a flat statement by one of respondent's witnesses, referring to payment, that "of course we demanded it." As we have shown, no demand was necessary, demand had been made, and the suit was a demand, in any event. Not only so, but during the trial respondent, upon a suggestion that no demand had been made, offered to dismiss its suit and pay the costs if appellant would pay the claim, and appellant refused to do so. There was no reversible error here.

But it is said that the instruction authorizes a verdict for respondent without regard to the validity or invalidity of the so-called loan agreement asserted by appellant. This is true, but appellant admitted liability to the legal holder of the policy to the extent of $1,200, and the jury, by this instruction, was required to find respondent to be the legal holder of that document, before finding a verdict in respondent's favor. The instruction did not fix the amount for which the jury should find for plaintiff, but left that for another instruction. These criticisms are groundless.

[8-10] VI. Instruction No. 2, given in behalf of respondent, is assailed on the ground that it is inconsistent with instruction No. 4 asked by appellant, and modified and given by the court. This instruction, in effect, told the jury that if the insured did not sign the loan agreement, or if his signature thereto was secured by "fraudulent representations or concealments" on the part of respondent, and that "he did not know or understand that it was an agreement to pay respondent $3,301.52, and that he did not in fact make any such agreement," then appellant was not entitled to deduct that sum, or any part thereof, from the maturity value of the policy.

Instruction No. 4, above mentioned, informed the jury that appellant was entitled to deduct the amount designated in the loan agreement, unless it was "obtained by false and fraudulent representations," thus making no reference to fraudulent "concealments" mentioned in instruction No. 2. The reply denied that the insured ever executed the loan agreement, and then pleaded that his signature thereto was obtained, if at all, "by fraud and misrepresentation; that said Kennedy did not know or intend to sign any such paper, and did not know that any charge, such as [is] set forth in said paper, was made against him." These allegations were not assailed by motion to make more definite and certain, or otherwise, in the trial court, and are, we think, sufficient after verdict. Rutledge v. Swinney, 261 Mo. 128, loc. cit. 141, 169 S. W. 17. We also think that under these circumstances they are sufficiently definite to support an instruction on fraudulent concealment, such as is contained in instruction 2. Such concealment is, by reasonable inference, within the scope of the allegations of the reply. Error, to justify reversal, must be material. Shinn v. Railroad, 248 Mo. 173, loc. cit. 180, 154 S. W. 103. The fact that such fraudulent concealment is not mentioned in instruction No. 4, if error at all, is error in favor of appellant and of this it cannot complain. Hence appellant's contention on this point is overruled.

[11] VII. Appellant contends that there is no evidence to support the finding of the jury that the loan agreement was obtained by fraud. The evidence on this point is confined to the deposition of A. G. Kennedy, the insured. It covers several pages of the abstract, and for that reason we will state its substance rather than incur this opinion by setting it out in full.

Kennedy had no pecuniary interest, other than the payment of his indebtedness to respondent, in denying the execution of the loan agreement, but he emphatically and repeatedly did deny having signed it. He admitted having signed other papers connected with the policy at the time the loan agreement was said to have been signed, but says that the loan agreement was not so much as mentioned to him. The agreement admitted an indebtedness of $3,301.52 on the part of the insured to appellant. It is called a "loan" in the agreement, but appellant claims it was to evidence the difference in the annual premiums for 9 years between a policy formerly held by Kennedy and the policy here in suit. The former policy was surrendered at the time the present policy was issued, and this loan agreement is claimed to have been executed at that time. The evidence shows that at that time Kennedy was hard pressed financially, in debt, and seeking to borrow money. The cash-surrender value of the old policy was apparently much less than $3,300, and by entering into this loan agreement Kennedy would have been increasing his indebtedness with no corresponding benefit. Furthermore, the agent representing the appellant, with whom Kennedy transacted this business, was not produced as a witness, nor was any reason given for a failure to produce him. It is worthy of remark, also, that when Kennedy's deposition was taken, this loan agreement was not presented for his inspection, although appellant then had possession of the document; appellant's whole claim is based upon this agreement, and the genuineness of Kennedy's signature was disputed. Appellant, by counsel, attended the taking of the deposition and cross-examined the witness. From these and various other circumstances appearing in evidence, the jury was, we think, warranted in finding that the loan agreement was never in fact signed by Kennedy, or, if signed by him, that his signature was fraudulently obtained. Appellant's evidence on this point consisted solely of the testimony of an expert on handwriting, who compared the signature on the loan agreement with various signatures admittedly made by Kennedy. The expert witness expressed the opinion that the signature to the loan agreement was in Kennedy's handwriting. The weight of this evidence was, of course, for the jury. We think there was sufficient evidence on this point to support the verdict.

[12, 13] VIII. The appellant claims that error was committed in allowing an attorney's fee in behalf of respondent, for the reason that this is a Texas contract, and no statute of that state authorizing such an allowance was pleaded. In this contention appellant is clearly right. This contract was made in Texas. Respondent is a resident of Texas, paid the premiums there, and demanded performance of the contract in that state. The Texas statute, if any there is on this proposition, is not pleaded. We do not take judicial notice of the statutes of a sister state, and if such a statute as would authorize the allowance of an attorney's fee exists in that state, it should have been pleaded and proven in the same manner as any other fact. Fidelity Loan Securities Co. v. Moore (Mo.) 217 S. W. 286, loc. cit. 289. The allowance of an attorney's fee relates to the right, and not to the remedy. No attorney's fee should have been allowed. Thompson v. Traders' Ins. Co., 169 Mo. 12, loc. cit. 29, 69 S. W. 889; Ayers v. Continental Ins. Co. (Mo. App.) 217 S. W. 550, loc. cit. 551.

Appellant's contention that the reply admits the execution of the loan agreement by the insured is not borne out by the record. The reply plainly denies it. Various other complaints of appellant are also without foundation, and for that reason will not be discussed, although we have considered all of them. We have passed upon all questions that appellant thought sufficiently important to dignify with an argument, and upon some that it did not argue. Except as to the allowance of the attorney's fee as above noted, the decision of the trial court was right. Its essential justice commends it to our consideration.

Appellant's conduct, as revealed by this record, is not such as to enlist our sympathies. At the time it took the old benefit certificate—for that, apparently, is what it was—and issued the policy here in suit to Kennedy, the respondent held the old policy in pledge to secure a debt of a little more than $1,000. Appellant knew this fact. Without revealing the fact to respondent, it obtained from Kennedy (by fraud, if Kennedy is to be believed), an agreement to pay appellant $3,300. This sum was to be a lien upon the new policy, but no suggestion of that fact appeared upon the policy itself. For 9 years thereafter, while respondent held the new policy in pledge for its debt and the premiums it was paying, appellant accepted the annual payments of $488 from respondent in silence, and thereby created the fund out of which it now seeks to pay its claim of $3,300 and interest, leaving only $1,200 to be paid to respondent as its return on an investment of approximately $6,000, extending over a period of 11 years. It is too plain for argument that respondent never would have entered into such an arrangement with knowledge of appellant's claim. It is speaking mildly to say that appellant's conduct savors strongly of intentional overreaching. Business acumen may become too acute to be consistent with fair dealing. Had appellant dealt openly and fairly with the insured and with respondent, there would have been no occasion for this litigation. We are not disposed, in view of these facts, to strain a point to aid appellant. So far as we are concerned, the tree may lie where it has fallen.

The error in allowing the attorney's fee can easily be cured. If the respondent will, within ten days, file a remittitur of the amount of the attorney's fee, $750, as of date of the date of the judgment, March 16, 1917, the judgment will be affirmed. Otherwise it will be reversed and remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. It is so ordered.

All concur.

DUNBAR et al. v. SIMS et al. (No. 20817.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2
June 4, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 25, 1920.)

Wills §634(4)—Will devising life estate to widow with power of disposition held to vest remainders in children.

A devise to testator's widow for life, with full power to sell and convey during her life, "and at her death, I will and devise that all my real estate shall go and vest absolutely in fee, in my seven children," naming them, held to vest in the children, upon testator's death, an equitable estate in remainder, subject to the widow's life estate and power of disposition, the quoted clause, in its reference to the widow's death, relating only to the time when the children should have possession, not to the time of vesting of their estate; and deeds from certain of the children to certain other children, conveying all of the respective grantors' right, title, and interest in the land devised, conveyed to the grantees all the respective interests owned by the grantors in such land, although such deeds were executed and delivered before the widow's death.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ralls County; W. T. Ragland, Judge.

Action by Fannie Dunbar and others against Charles T. Sims and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

This action was brought in the circuit court of Ralls county, Mo., for the partition of the real estate described in petition, and for an accounting of the rents, profits, and money alleged to have been received by defendants.

Silas E. Sims died in Ralls county, Mo., in 1907, the owner of above-mentioned real estate, leaving a will. He left surviving him his widow, Mary E. Sims, and his children, Charles T. Sims, Enoch Sims, Luther Sims, George Edward Sims, Lee Roy Sims, Arch Sims, and Fannie Dunbar. Fannie Dunbar, Lee Roy Sims, and George Edward Sims are plaintiffs herein, and Charles T. Sims, Enoch Sims, Luther Sims, and Arch Sims are defendants.

On March 25, 1909, plaintiff George E. Sims and wife executed and delivered to defendant Archie Sims their warranty deed for the expressed consideration of $800, conveying all their right, title, and interest in and to the real estate described in petition.

On February 10, 1909, plaintiff Lee Roy Sims and wife executed and delivered to defendant Charles T. Sims their quitclaim deed for the expressed consideration of $625 conveying all their right, title, and interest in said land.

On October 18, 1909, plaintiff Fannie Dunbar executed and delivered her warranty deed to defendant Archie Sims for the expressed consideration of $1,500, conveying to him all of her right, title, and interest in said land.

Afterwards, on July 2, 1910, said Mary E. Sims, under the power vested in her by the will of her husband, sold, by deed duly executed, a right of way 50 feet wide across said land for $3,500 to the Atlas Portland Cement Company, a corporation.

It appears from the evidence that neither of the plaintiffs herein received any part of said $3,500.

The widow, Mary E. Sims, died April 24, 1917.

The will of Silas E. Sims, was executed on the ——— day of February, 1907. It was offered in evidence, and contains five separate paragraphs. No. 1 provides for the payment of his debts, etc. Paragraph 2 gave to the widow absolutely all of his personal property, subject to the payment of his debts. Paragraph 4 named his wife, Mary E. Sims, as executrix, with the direction and request that she be not required to give bond. The third and fifth paragraphs read as follows:

"Item Third. I will and devise all of my real estate to my wife, Mary E. Sims, for and during her natural life, and at her death, I will and devise that all my real estate shall go and vest absolutely in fee, in my seven children, namely, Charles T. Sims, Enoch Sims, George Edward Sims, Luther Sims, Lee Roy Sims, Arch Sims, and Fannie Dunbar, equally share and share alike."

"Item Fifth. I will and direct that my said executrix, Mary E. Sims, shall have power, and I hereby give her power and authority to sell and convey any or all of my real estate as she may see fit and proper, and make good and perfect title to the same in fee simple to the purchaser and to make distribution of the proceeds of such sale among my said children and herself," etc.

The deeds heretofore mentioned from plaintiffs to Archie Sims and Charles T. Sims were duly recorded in Ralls county, Mo.

On March 5, 1918, the trial court found the issues in favor of defendants, and entered its decree accordingly. Plaintiffs in due time filed motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. Both motions were overruled, and the cause duly appealed by them to this court.

Mahan, Smith & Mahan and M. L. Farres, all of Hannibal, for appellants.

J. O. Allison and T. E. Allison, both of New London, for respondents.

RAILEY, C. (after stating the facts as above). 1. There is practically no dispute over the facts in this case, as heretofore set out. It is contended by appellants that the children of testator acquired no vested interest as remaindermen in the real estate aforesaid prior to the death of the widow, Mary E. Sims, on April 24, 1917, and that, by reason thereof, the plaintiffs had no interest in their father's estate, which was the subject of conveyance, at the time they executed their respective deeds to Archie and Charles T. Sims. This contention does not appeal to us as being sound. On the contrary, we are decidedly of the opinion that upon the death of testator in 1907 his widow, Mary E. Sims, by virtue of paragraphs 3 and 5 of the will aforesaid, became vested with a life estate in the real estate in controversy, with full power of disposition during her life, and that upon the death of testator in 1907 his seven children heretofore named became vested with an equitable estate and remainder subject to the life estate and power of disposition given to the widow aforesaid. Huntington Real Estate Co. v. Megaree, 217 S. W. 301 and following; Trigg v. Trigg, 192 S. W. loc. cit. 1014, and cases cited; Schneider v. Kloepple, 270 Mo. 389, 390, 193 S. W. 834; Priest v. McFarland, 262 Mo. 229, 171 S. W. 62; Tallent v. Fitzpatrick & Kaiser, 253 Mo. loc. cit. 13, 15, 161 S. W. 689; Burnet v. Burnet, 244 Mo. 491, 505-507, 148 S. W. 872; Gibson v. Gibson, 239 Mo. 490, 144 S. W. 770; Edgar v. Emerson, 235 Mo. 553, 560-562, 139 S. W. 122; Grace v. Perry, 197 Mo. loc. cit. 562, 95 S. W. 878, 7 Ann. Cas. 948.

In the absence of any provision in the will calling for a different construction, the foregoing authorities are conclusive against appellants as to the merits of this controversy.

2. It is insisted, however, by appellants, that the will as clearly expressed on its face shows a definite intention by the testator that the title was not to be vested in the children until the death of the executrix, for he says:

"And at her death I will and devise that all my real estate shall go and vest absolutely in fee, in my seven children, * * * equally share and share alike."

Such expressions as are found in the above quotation have frequently come before the courts for consideration, and have uniformly been construed, when considered in the light of foregoing facts, to relate to the times when the devisees shall have possession, and have nothing to do with the vesting of the estate. Jones v. Waters, 17 Mo. 587; Collier's Will, 40 Mo. 288; Chew v. Keller, 100 Mo. loc. cit. 368, 13 S. W. 395; Byrne v. France, 131 Mo. 639, 646, 647, 33 S. W. 178; Tindall v. Tindall, 167 Mo. 218, 226, 66 S. W. 1092; Heady v. Hollman, 251 Mo. 632, 638, 158 S. W. 19; Henderson v. Calhoun, 183 S. W. 584; Huntington Real Estate Co. v. Megaree, 217 S. W. loc. cit. 304; 2 Underhill on the Law of Wills, § 861; 2 Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) p. 1357; Anderson v. Menefee (Tex. Civ. App.) 174 S. W. loc. cit. 908; Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. v. Noyes, 26 R. I. loc. cit. 334, 58 Atl. 999.

A single quotation is sufficient to indicate the trend of judicial opinion in respect to this matter. In Chew v. Keller, 100 Mo. loc. cit. 368, 13 S. W. 396, Judge Black said:

"The law favors vested estates, and, where there is a doubt as to whether the remainder is vested or contingent, the courts will construe it as a vested estate. * * * The expressions that they, Levin Baker and others, are not to take possession of the property devised 'until the death of Jemina Lindell,' and that 'upon her death' the devisees shall take the parts as tenants in common, all relate to the times when the devisees shall have possession, and have nothing to do with the vesting of the estate."

Aside from the other authorities cited, the conclusion reached by this court in the recent case of Huntington Real Estate Co. v. Megaree, 217 S. W. loc. cit. 304, 305, settles the above controversy adversely to appellants. Testator, having given to his wife a life estate in said land, which carried with it the right of possession during her life, and having also given her the right to sell and convey said property, if she saw fit to do so, why should the title not vest, upon the death of testator, in his children, subject to the widow's life estate and right of disposition under the terms of the will? As the remaindermen could not interfere with the widow's rights thereunder, we discover nothing upon the face of said instrument which discloses any reason for testator withholding the title of the remaindermen under the circumstances aforesaid until the death of testatrix, rather than have the same become effective at his own death.

In our opinion, the foregoing contention of appellants, is supported by neither reason nor authority.

3. Having heretofore reached the conclusion that upon the death of testator in 1907 George E. Sims, Lee Roy Sims, and Fannie Dunbar each became vested with the equitable title, as remaindermen, to the undivided one-seventh of the real estate owned by testator at that time, subject to the life estate and power of disposition given the widow, it necessarily follows that the deeds from appellants to their brothers heretofore mentioned conveyed to the grantees therein named all the respective interests which said grantors owned in the real estate aforesaid, and that by reason of the foregoing they have no valid claim or title to the property in controversy. Oldaker v. Spiking, 210 S. W. 62, 63.

The judgment of the trial court in favor of respondents is accordingly affirmed.

COLLINS v. WHITMAN et al. (SIDDENS, Intervener). (No. 21397.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2
June 4, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 25, 1920.)

1. Wills \Leftrightarrow 629—Law favors vesting of estates at testator's death.

The law favors the vesting of estates, in the absence of an expressed intent to the contrary, at the earliest possible time, and immediately upon the testator's death.

2. Wills \Leftrightarrow 866—Will without residuary clause held to vest remainder in son on testator's death, subject to be divested by birth of children.

Where father's will left his estate to his wife and son for life, and on the death of both to any child or children of the son except any child or children of the son by H., the son's wife at the time of the making of the will, and the son, who, after divorce from H., married again and died after his father without children by his second wife, left by will his estate to his second wife, she took the property in which the son had a life estate under his father's will, for, as the father's will contained no residuary clause, the son, who was the father's only heir at law under the statute of descents, became vested at his father's death with the estate in remainder in the property, subject to be divested by the birth of children as provided in the will, which vested remainder passed by the son's will to his second wife.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Gentry County; John M. Dawson, Judge.

Suit by Hattie Collins against Walter Whitman and others, in which Alverda Siddens intervened. From judgment for plaintiff, the intervener appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

This suit was instituted in the circuit court of Gentry county, Mo., on July 7, 1917. It is an action in ejectment to recover possession of the undivided one-half of certain lands located in said county and described in petition. The date of ouster is named as December 8, 1916. The monthly value of the rents and profits of said premises is $60, etc.

Defendants Walter Whitman and Fred Whitman answered, and admitted therein that they are in possession of said land. They deny every other allegation in plaintiff's petition.

Appellant, Alverda Siddens, filed in said cause, an application to become a party defendant, alleging therein that she was the owner of said real estate, and that defendants had no interest therein except as tenants, etc. Said application was sustained, and Alverda Siddens filed herein her answer and cross-bill, denying each and every allegation of petition. For further answer and cross-bill, she alleged therein that she is the owner in fee of the real estate described in petition; that the plaintiff herein claims some title, estate, and interest in said real estate, the nature and character of which is unknown to this defendant, but the latter alleges that said claim of plaintiff is adverse and prejudicial to this defendant. Thereupon the court is asked to try, ascertain, and determine, the estate, title, and interest of the parties plaintiff and defendant herein severally in and to said real estate, and to grant this defendant general relief, etc.

Other parties, upon their own application, were permitted to be joined as defendants herein. They filed an answer similar to that of defendant Alverda Siddens.

On December 19, 1917, said cause was reached for trial, a jury was waived, and the cause submitted to the court upon an agreed statement of facts. It appears from the latter that James M. Siddens, of the county aforesaid, is the common source of title, and died on June 8, 1911, the owner of the land in controversy, with other land. He left, as his only heir, a son, James Harvey Siddens. The will of James M. Siddens was probated in Gentry county, Mo., on June 15, 1911, and reads as follows:

"I, James Siddens of Gentry County, Missouri, do make and publish this my last will and testament.

"1st. I give, bequeath and devise to my beloved wife, Mary E. Siddens, and my son, James Harvey Siddens, all property, real, personal and mixed of which I may die seized or possessed, to have and to hold for and during their natural life, or so long as they or either of them may live, and at the death of either one of the said parties the whole of said estate shall pass to and vest in the survivor, whichever that may be, who shall have, hold and enjoy the same, for and during his or her natural life, and upon the death, of both my said wife and my said son, it is my will that said property shall pass to and vest absolutely in such child or children and heirs of my said son, James Harvey Siddens, as shall be born to him by any woman, save and except any child or children born of his present wife, Hattie Siddens. It is my will that neither the said Hattie Siddens or any child or children of which she may be or become the mother shall have or receive any interests whatever, of, in or to my said estate, or any part or parcel thereof.

"I hereby appoint my wife Mary E. Siddens and my son James Harvey Siddens, my executors, without bond, of this my last will and testament.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this July 9, 1898. James M. Siddens."

Thereafter Mary E. Siddens, wife of above testator, filed her renunciation of the provisions of said will in her favor, and elected to take a child's part.

James Harvey Siddens was married to defendant Alverda Siddens on October 17, 1900, and no children were born to James Harvey Siddens except Opal Siddens Morrow, hereafter mentioned. James Harvey Siddens died testate in Gentry county, Mo., on March 17, 1916, and thereafter his will was admitted to probate, March 23, 1916, in which he devised and bequeathed $5 to his daughter, Opal Siddens (now Opal Siddens Morrow), and gave all the remainder of his property, real, personal and mixed, to his wife, the appellant, Alverda Siddens. James Harvey Siddens was previously married to Hattie Bare (now Hattie Collins, the plaintiff herein), on June 21, 1898, but they never lived together as husband and wife. Opal Siddens Morrow is the only child of James Harvey Siddens and Hattie Siddens (now Hattie Collins), and was born after their marriage. On September 17, 1900, James Harvey Siddens and Hattie Siddens were divorced.

On November 14, 1916, Opal Siddens Morrow conveyed to the plaintiff, Hattie Collins, the land in controversy, with other land heretofore mentioned.

The other defendants named in this record, save and except Alverda Siddens, constitute all of the collateral heirs of James M. Siddens, they being his brother, nephews, nieces, etc.

On June 21, 1898, and prior to the divorce of James Harvey Siddens, his father, James M. Siddens, and his mother, Mary E. Siddens, made a settlement upon said Hattie Siddens, who was then his wife, by conveying to her certain real estate, and she executed a written instrument releasing the said James Harvey Siddens and his estate, and agreed therein to support and maintain the child to be born.

The defendant Alverda Siddens asked, and the court refused, four instructions, numbered 1 to 4, inclusive, which will be considered later.

On September 17, 1918, the court found the issues in favor of plaintiff, and rendered its judgment accordingly. The defendant Alverda Siddens on the date last aforesaid filed herein her motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. Both motions were on above date overruled, and the cause duly appealed by her to this court. None of the other defendants appeared.

D. D. Reeves, of Albany, and J. W. Perry, of Kansas City, Kan., for appellants.

Charles E. Gibbany, of Albany, and Lucian J. Eastin, of St. Joseph, for respondents.

RAILEY, C. After stating the facts as above. 1. In passing upon the merits of this controversy, we must not lose sight of section 383, R. S. 1909, which reads as follows:

"All courts and officers concerned in the execution of last wills shall have due regard to the directions of the will, and the true intent and meaning of the testator, in all matters brought before them."

It is perfectly manifest, from reading the will of James M. Siddens, heretofore set out, that he intended by said instrument to dispose of all his property, real, personal, and mixed, as there is no residuary clause therein. It is equally as clear from said instrument that he did not intend this plaintiff, or any child of hers, should take any part of his estate, which he was attempting to dispose of by his will. It is no less certain that, if the decree of the lower court in favor of plaintiff is permitted to stand, it passes the estate in controversy to the very individuals whom James M. Siddens, by the above instrument, declared should not take it. He had already made a settlement upon plaintiff for the benefit of herself and daughter, Opal Siddens Morrow, and hence provided in said will:

"That said property shall pass to and vest absolutely in such child or children and heirs of my said son, James Harvey Siddens, as shall be born to him by any woman, save and except any child or children born of his present wife, Hattie Siddens. It is my will that neither the said Hattie Siddens or any child or children of which she may be or become the mother shall have or receive any interests whatever, of, in or to my said estate, or any part or parcel thereof."

On the other hand, testator attempted to bestow upon his son, James Harvey Siddens, and his child or children, if any were born capable of receiving it, the entire estate sought to be conveyed. The mere fact that James Harvey Siddens was given a life estate by the will under the circumstances aforesaid is no indication that testator was averse to said son taking the estate in remainder at testator's death, subject to be divested should a child or children of the son be born capable of receiving the property under the will.

Keeping in mind these general observations, which should be considered in determining the merits of this controversy, we pass to other questions involved.

[1] 2. It is well settled, upon both principle and authority, that the law favors the vesting of estates, in the absence of an expressed intent to the contrary, at the earliest possible time, and immediately upon the testator's death. Jones v. Waters et al., 17 Mo. loc. cit. 589, 590; Collier's Will, 40 Mo. loc. cit. 321; Chew v. Keller, 100 Mo. loc. cit. 368, 13 S. W. 395; Byrne v. France, 131 Mo. loc. cit. 646, 647, 33 S. W. 178; Tindall v. Tindall, 167 Mo. loc. cit. 218, 66 S. W. 1092; O'Day v. Meadows, 194 Mo. 588, 92 S. W. 637, 112 Am. St. Rep. 542; Heady v. Hollman, 251 Mo. loc. cit. 638, 158 S. W. 19; Deacon v. Trust Co., 271 Mo. loc. cit. 687, 688, 197 S. W. 261; Henderson v. Calhoun, 183 S. W. loc. cit. 586; Huntington Real Estate Co. v. Megaree, 217 S. W. loc. cit. 303, 304; Dunbar et al. v. Sims et al., 222 S. W. 838, not yet [officially] reported; 23 Ruling Case Law, § 67, pp. 525, 526; 2 Underhill on Wills, § 861.

In Collier's Will, 40 Mo. loc. cit. 321, Judge Wagner said:

"As wills are generally dissimilar, and one can hardly be found precisely like another, cases are rarely to be met with which are directly apposite, so as to be controlling authority in any new case which may arise. But there are certain rules of law which have grown up and become firmly fixed in the interpretation of wills, which no court is at liberty to disregard, unless the language of the testator, in making the devise, plainly requires it; and one of these rules is 'but all estates shall be considered vested rather than contingent. The law is said to favor the vesting of estates, the effect of which principle seems to be that property which is the subject of any disposition, whether testamentary or otherwise, will belong to the object of the gift immediately on the instrument taking effect, or so soon afterwards as such object comes into existence, or the terms thereof will permit.' (Italics ours.)"

In the later case of Chew v. Keller, 100 Mo. loc. cit. 368, 13 S. W. 396, Judge Black, speaking for the court, said:

"The law favors vested estates, and, where there is a doubt as to whether the remainder is vested or contingent, the courts will construe it as a vested estate. * * * The expressions that they, Levin Baker and others, are not to take possession of the property devised 'until the death of Jessima Lindell,' and that 'upon her death' the devisees shall take the parts as tenants in common, all relate to the times when the devisees shall have possession, and have nothing to do with the vesting of the estate." (Italics ours.)

The other cases cited under this proposition are in full accord with the views above expressed.

(a) It is admitted that testator's wife, Mary E. Siddens, upon the death of her husband, renounced the provisions of his will giving her a life estate in said land, elected to and did take a child's part, and hence became the owner of the undivided one-half of the real estate in controversy. It is likewise admitted that testator, James M. Siddens, died in Gentry county, Mo., on June 6, 1911, leaving as his only heirs said James Harvey Siddens and Mary E. Siddens, the widow of testator. Said will was duly probated June 15, 1911. Said Mary E. Siddens and James Harvey Siddens were appointed executors without bond.

James Harvey Siddens was married to defendant Alverda Siddens on October 17, 1900. No children were ever born to said James Harvey Siddens except Opal Siddens Morrow, the daughter of plaintiff herein. James Harvey Siddens died in Gentry county, Mo., on March 17, 1916, and left a will which was duly probated, March 23, 1916. He gave his daughter, Opal Siddens Morrow, $5 by said instrument, and conveyed all the remainder of his estate to his wife, Alverda Siddens, the appellant in this cause.

Said Opal Siddens Morrow conveyed the real estate in controversy to plaintiff by quitclaim deed on November 14, 1916.

Keeping in mind the foregoing facts and principles of law, we will proceed to a consideration of the merits involved herein.

3. According to our conception of the law which should govern this case, it is not necessary for us to enter into any extended consideration of the common law relating to estates tail nor the statutes referred to by counsel in their respective briefs; for it is conceded in the foregoing record that James Harvey Siddens simply acquired a life estate in the real estate aforesaid by the terms of his father's will.

[2] We understand respondent to contend that James Harvey Siddens, upon the death of his father, was simply a life tenant under the will of the latter; that he never acquired any other or different interest in the property here involved; that upon the death of said James Harvey Siddens, his daughter, Opal Siddens Morrow, became the owner of the undivided one-half of said real estate, as heir of her grandfather, as intestate property, under the statute, without any reference to the wills of her father and testator, and that she conveyed the interest thus inherited to this plaintiff. On the other hand, we understand appellant contends that James Harvey Siddens was given a life estate in said property by his father's will, which contains no residuary clause; that upon the death of testator James M. Siddens, the life tenant aforesaid, who was his only heir at law, under the statute of descents, became vested with the estate in remainder in said land, as intestate property, subject to be divested of same if a child or children were born thereafter, as provided in testator's will, and that said estate in remainder was never divested by the birth of any child or children by any other woman than this plaintiff, as provided in said will; that by reason of the facts aforesaid appellant became the owner of the undivided half interest in said real estate by virtue of the will of her husband, James Harvey Siddens.

The fee-simple title to the real estate in question remained in testator up to the time of his death. Upon the happening of the last event, the son became vested with a life estate in said property. What became of the estate in remainder held by testator at the time of his death? It was known as a matter of law at that time that, if the remainder should become inoperative for want of a taker, it would still remain in existence, but become intestate property, and as such would pass to James Harvey Siddens, as the only heir at law of testator. The son did not take the remainder by virtue of the will, but took the place of his father, as heir of the latter, under the statute of descents, and continued to hold said remainder as intestate property subject to be divested on the birth of a child or children by some other woman than plaintiff. This view of the situation is clearly warranted by the authorities cited under proposition 2, supra, as it vested in James Harvey Siddens, the life tenant, as heir of his father, the remainder in said property immediately upon the death of testator, subject to be divested as aforesaid. We are of the opinion that the conclusions above announced are correct in principle, and are sustained by the decided weight of authority, some of which are as follows: Gillilan v. Gillilan, 212 S. W. loc. cit. 351, 352; Peugnet v. Berthold, 183 Mo. loc. cit. 64, 65, 81 S. W. 874; Fearn on Remainders, pp. 350, 354, 361, 363; 2 Underhill on Wills, etc., § 874, p. 1330; 23 Ruling Case Law, p. 518, §§ 56, 57; 23 Ruling Case Law, pp. 525, 526, § 67; Bigley v. Watson, 98 Tenn. 353, 39 S. W. 525, 38 L. R. A. 679; Gilpin v. Williams et al., 25 Ohio St. 295; Harrison v. Weatherby, 180 Ill. 418, 54 N. E. 237; Bond v. Moore, 236 Ill. 576, 86 N. E. 386, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 540; Messer v. Baldwin, 262 Ill. 48, 104 N. E. 195; Bell's Estate, 147 Pa. 389, 23 Atl. 577; In re Kenyon, 17 R. I. 149, 20 Atl. 294; Rand v. Butler, 48 Conn. 293; Gilman v. Stone, 123 Ky. 137, 94 S. W. 28; Coots v. Yewell, etc., 95 Ky. 367, 25 S. W. 597, 26 S. W. 179; Stokes et al. v. Van Wyck et al., 83 Va. 724, 3 S. E. 387; Loring v. Elliot et al., 16 Gray (Mass.) 568, 574; Craig v. Warner, 5 Mackey (D. C.) 460, 60 Am. Rep. 381.

We have read with a great deal of interest all the authorities cited in the respective briefs, as well as numerous others referred to in those cited, and feel satisfied with the conclusions heretofore stated. In Gillilan v. Gillilan, 212 S. W. pp. 351, 352, Judge Bond, speaking for the court in banc, said:

"The only remaining question presented by this appeal is: What became of the estate remaining in Nathan Gillilan (which he had specifically devised in clause 5 of his will) upon defeat of that devise for lack of heirs thereafter born to George Gillilan, thereby causing a lapse of the contingent remainder to such heirs? In the solution of this question only two views are possible: First, that such a reversion in Nathan Gillilan passed to his descendants as in case of intestacy; second, that it was conveyed by the residuary clause of the will supra. The latter is the view taken by the learned trial court, and is the view taken as a dernier resort by appellant Gratia Gillilan (as shown in her brief) in case this court should take, as it does, the view that clause 5 of the will created an estate tail special at common law, which was changed by the statute into a life estate in the tenant in tail with a contingent remainder in fee in certain subsequent heirs of the body of the life tenant. In considering this question it must be realized that Nathan Gillilan had a right, not a mere possibility, of reversion after carving out so much of his estate as was devised through the instrumentality of clause 5 of the will. The reversion so inhering in him was the proper subject of a grant by clause 9 of his will if he so desired; otherwise it would descend to his heirs at law under the statute of descents and distribution as in case of intestacy."

Respondent contends that the above case is not in point, because Nathan Gillilan did not in terms create a life estate in his son George, but it was placed there by the statute. This distinction does not impress us as being sound. The court disposed of the case on the theory that George simply took a life estate, as did James Harvey Siddens in this case. If there had been no residuary clause in the Gillilan will, it is plain from what is said supra that the court, in construing said will, would have arrived at the same conclusion reached by us in the present case.

Whether considered upon principle or authority, we are satisfied that the trial court reached an erroneous conclusion in its disposition of this case. We accordingly reverse and remand the cause, with directions to the trial court to set aside its decree, and to enter a judgment in behalf of appellant, declaring her to be the absolute owner of the real estate in controversy.

STATE ex rel. MOBERLY SPECIAL ROAD DIST. OF RANDOLPH COUNTY v. BURTON et al., Judges. (No. 21169.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Mandamus \Rightarrow 187(7)—Mode of presentation on appeal of error in overruling demurrer to return stated.

On appeal in a proceeding for mandamus, wherein a demurrer to the writ has been interposed, the alternative writ, the return thereto, the demurrer to the return, and the judgment constitutes the record proper, and neither motion for new trial, motion in arrest, nor bill of exceptions is necessary to present errors in overruling such a demurrer.

2. Mandamus \Rightarrow 121—Mandamus held to lie to compel county to pay to special road district taxes collected therein.

Under Acts 1917, pp. 457, 458, §§ 36, 37, relating to the levy and apportionment of road taxes where the county court has levied 10 cents on the $100 valuation of all taxable property for road purposes, mandamus will lie to compel them to pay over the fund so collected to the special road district upon the property of which the tax has been levied, since under first proviso of section 37 all taxes collected by virtue of Const. art. 10, § 11, under section 36 of the act on the property of a special road district must be applied to its credit, although such proviso does not apply to special road and bridge taxes levied under section 37 and Const. art. 10, § 22.

Williams, P. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; A. W. Walker, Judge.

Mandamus by the State, on the relation of Moberly Special Road District of Randolph county, against G. B. Burton and others, Judges of the County Court, to pay over certain road and bridge taxes. Judgment for defendants, and petitioner appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

On April 24, 1918, there was filed in the circuit court of Randolph county, Mo., by the Moberly special road district of said county, a petition for mandamus against respondents, G. B. Burton, A. B. McCoy, and C. P. Fullington, qualified and acting judges of the county court of said county. The petition alleges that it was the duty of said county court, at its regular May term, 1917, held on the fourth Monday in May, 1917, to fix and determine the amount of the various tax levies on all property, both real and personal, subject to state, county, school, and road taxes, within the limits of said Randolph county Mo.; that, in compliance with their said duties, the judges of the county court aforesaid, at its May term, 1917, levied, among other things, 10 cents on the $100 valuation, on all property in Randolph county aforesaid, for road and bridge purposes, in addition to the levy for special road and bridge purposes. The petition avers that it was the duty of said county court to cause all that portion of said levy of 10 cents on the $100 valuation collected for general road and bridge purposes within the territorial boundaries and limits of said Moberly special road district to be turned over to the officers of the Moberly special road district of Randolph county, Mo.

It is further averred that there had been collected in the way of taxes on said levy of 10 cents on the $100 valuation, on property lying within the territorial limits of said special road district, for the year 1917, and paid into the county treasury, the sum of $4,066.40; that the same is now in said treasury of Randolph county, Mo.; that it was paid on real and personal property within said special road district, as road and bridge taxes, under the provisions of section 36 of article 2, Session Acts of Missouri, of 1917, p. 457.

The petition avers that on February 25, 1918, said special road district requested said county court to issue to it and its officers a warrant to the amount of $4,066.40 so collected on all property lying within the territorial limits of said special road district as road and bridge taxes; that requests and demands were made before said moneys were distributed or paid out by said county court.

It is further alleged that said county court refused to turn over or pay to said special road district, or to its officers, the said $4,066.40, or any part thereof, but said judges of the county court aforesaid have refused to pay over, or cause to be paid, any of said road and bridge taxes, etc.

The petition concludes with a prayer for a writ of mandamus against the county court judges aforesaid, requiring them and said county court to issue proper warrants, and pay over to said special road district the said levy of road and bridge taxes collected on property within said special road district in Randolph county, Mo., for the year 1917, amounting to $4,066.40, etc.

Respondents filed their return, and denied all the allegations of petition except such as are specifically admitted to be true. They admit that the Moberly special road district of Randolph county, Mo., is organized and exists according to law; that said respondents, Burton, McCoy, and Fullington, are the duly elected, qualified, and acting judges of the county court of said county. They admit that it was the duty of said judges to fix and determine the tax levy, as set forth in above petition. They admit that there has been collected in the way of taxes on property lying within the territorial limits of said special road district of Randolph county, Mo., for the year 1917, and paid into the county treasury, $4,066.40, as set forth in petition and alternative writ. They admit that on February 25, 1918, said special road district requested said county court to pay over to said Moberly special road district, and before said moneys were distributed, the said sum of $4,066.40. They admit that said county court refused to pay said sum so collected as aforesaid or any part thereof to said special road district, and still refuse so to do.

Said return further avers that a writ of mandamus ought not to issue herein, for the reason that section 10594, R. S. 1909, as amended by section 1 of Acts of Missouri, of 1913, p. 675, is repealed by section 106 of Acts of Missouri, of 1917, p. 477, and for the further reason that, under the law as it now stands, it is optional and discretionary with said county court, as to paying the taxes collected and set forth in petition to the commissioners of said special road district, and, the county court having exclusive jurisdiction thereof having acted in the matter, the circuit court ought not by mandamus to compel said county court to reverse its decision, etc.

Appellant demurred to said return for the reason "that it appears upon the face thereof that the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense, nor show any cause whatever for not obeying said writ."

On April 24, 1918, said demurrer was overruled. Appellant stood upon its demurrer and refused to plead further. Thereupon the issues were found in favor of respondents, and on April 24, 1918, judgment was entered accordingly. Appellant, in due time, appealed the cause to this court.

Willard P. Cave, of Moberly, for appellant.

Aubrey R. Hammett, of Moberly, for respondents.

RAILEY, C. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. As a matter of precaution, counsel for appellant filed a motion for a new trial, motion in arrest of judgment, and a bill of exceptions. In this case, the alternative writ, the return thereto, the demurrer to said return, and the judgment constituted the record proper. No motion for a new trial, motion in arrest of judgment, nor bill of exceptions were necessary in order to present to this court the errors complained of herein. *Spears v. 2. After spending three days investigating the laws of this state as they existed prior to 1917 in regard to the status of special road districts, we have reached the conclusion that appellant is entitled to maintain this action, unless it is precluded from so doing by the provisions of sections 36 and 37 of Acts of 1917, pp. 457-458, relied upon by respondents. It is contended by the latter that the last-named act, in legal effect, if not in terms, repeals the former laws upon this subject. Waiving the above contention for the present, we will first determine whether appellant is entitled to recover upon the record before us under the act of 1917 supra. If answered in the affirmative, there will be no necessity for passing upon the former question.

Respondents in their return "admit that there has been collected in the way of taxes on property lying within the territorial limits of said Moberly special road district of Randolph county for the year 1917, and paid into the county treasury the sum of $4,066.40 as set forth in plaintiff's petition and alternative writ; admit that petitioner on the 25th day of February, 1918, requested said county court to pay over to said Moberly special road district, and before said moneys were distributed, the said sum of $4,066.40; admit that said county court has refused to pay said sum so collected as aforesaid or any part thereof to said Moberly special road district, and that they still refuse so to do." They take the position that it is optional and discretionary with said county court as to whether it will pay to the special road district the tax collected and set forth in the above return, and that, as the county court had jurisdiction over this matter, and acted in regard to same, its decision should not be reversed.

Sections 36 and 37 of Acts of 1917, pp. 457-458, read as follows:

"Sec. 36. County Court to Levy Road Tax—When.—The county courts in the several counties of this state, having a population of less than two hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, at the May term thereof in each year, shall levy upon all real and personal property made taxable by law, a tax of not more than twenty cents, nor less than ten cents on the hundred dollars valuation, as a road tax, which levy shall be collected and paid into the county treasury as other revenue, and shall be placed to the credit of the 'county road and bridge fund.'

"Sec. 37. Special Tax How Levied—Collected and Disbursed.—In addition to the levy authorized by the preceding section, the county courts of the counties of this state, other than those under township organization, in their discretion may levy and collect a special tax not exceeding twenty-five cents on each one hundred dollars valuation, to be used for road and bridge purposes, but for no other purposes whatever, and the same shall be known and designated as the 'special road and bridge fund' of the county: [Provided, however, that all that part or portion of said tax which shall arise from and be collected and paid upon any property lying and being within any road district, shall be paid into the county treasury and placed to the credit of the special road district, or other road district, from which it arose, and shall be paid out to the respective road districts upon warrants of the county court, in favor of the commissioners, treasurer or overseer of the district as the case may be.] Provided, further, that the part of said special road and bridge tax arising from and paid upon property not situated in any road district, special or otherwise, shall be placed to the credit of the 'county road and bridge fund' and be used in the construction and maintenance of roads, and may, in the discretion of the county court, be used in improving or repairing any street in any incorporated city or village in the county, if said street shall form a part of a continuous highway of said county leading through such city or village; but no part of said fund shall be used to pay the damages incident to, or costs of, establishing any road."

It will be observed from reading section 36, in connection with the first proviso mentioned in section 37 (placed in brackets by way of convenience), that all the tax which is collected from property lying within any road district shall be paid into the county treasury, and placed to the credit of the said district, etc. That part of section 37 contained in the above proviso is valid to the extent of requiring all tax collected by virtue of section 11 of article 10 of the Constitution, under section 36, supra, on property within the special road district, to be applied to the credit of the latter. Said proviso, however, cannot legally apply to the special road and bridge taxes levied under section 37, supra, and section 22 of Article 10 of our Constitution, adopted in 1908, which reads as follows:

"Sec. 22. Special Road and Bridge Tax.—In addition to taxes authorized to be levied for county purposes under and by virtue of section 11, article 10 of the Constitution of this state, the county court in the several counties of this state, not under township organization, and the township board of directors in the several counties under township organization, may, in their discretion, levy and collect, in the same manner as state and county taxes are collected, a special tax not exceeding twenty-five cents on each $100 valuation, to be used for road and bridge purposes; but for no other purpose whatever; and the power hereby given said county courts and township boards is declared to be a discretionary power." (Italics ours.)

Under this section of the Constitution, the county court had the right to levy, in addition to the 10 cents described in section 36, a special road and bridge tax of 25 cents on each $100 valuation, under section 37. Section 22 of the Constitution did not vest in the Legislature the power to compel the county court to levy said 25 cents or any part of same. On the contrary, the county court is given a discretionary power in respect to said matter. This, however, does not relieve the county court from levying a tax for road purposes of not more than 20 cents nor less than 10 cents on the $100 valuation, which is to be collected from the property in the special road district by virtue of section 36, supra, under section 11 of article 10 of our Constitution.

This whole subject was fully considered in an able and exhaustive opinion of the other division in Carthage Special Road District of Jasper County v. J. C. Ross et al., 270 Mo. 76 and following (192 S. W. 976), in which the various provisions of our laws were considered, as they existed prior to 1917. We are of the opinion that the principles of law announced in the above case apply with equal force to a reasonable construction of sections 36 and 37 of the Laws of 1917.

[2] It appears from the record that the county court of Randolph county, Mo., in May, 1917, levied 10 cents on the $100 valuation of all the taxable property in said county for road purposes, that by virtue of the first proviso contained in section 37, supra, the 10 per cent. collected on all of said taxable property contained in the Moberly special road district was properly paid into the county treasury of said county, and belonged to said special road district. It being conceded that the above amount collected for that purpose was $4,066.40, and due demand having been made for said sum, the right of relator to enforce the payment of same by mandamus was clearly established. We are therefore of the opinion that the trial court reached an erroneous conclusion as to the disposition of this case.

We accordingly reverse and remand the cause, with directions to the trial court to set aside its judgment, and to dispose of the case in accordance with the views heretofore expressed.

WHITE and MOZLEY, CO., concur.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of RAILEY, C., is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court.

STATE v. LINTON. (No. 21938.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2
June 4, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §170 — That defendant was misnamed in information did not affect question of former jeopardy.

Where information was intended to charge defendant with a crime, and where defendant was arrested and entered his plea thereunder the fact that he was incorrectly named did not affect question of whether he was put in jeopardy by such prosecution so as to bar a prosecution under an amended information in which he was similarly named, in view of Rev. St. 1909, § 5113.

2. Criminal law §170—Information, charging person other than defendant, not basis for former jeopardy plea.

Information, charging person other than defendant with the crime, cannot be used as the basis of a plea of former jeopardy.

3. Criminal law §200(4) — Prosecution for unlawfully keeping, etc., liquor a bar to prosecution for sale based on same transaction.

Prosecution for unlawfully keeping, storing for and delivering to another person, intoxicating liquor is a bar to another prosecution for unlawful sale, based upon the same transaction.

4. Criminal law §180—Defendant put in jeopardy when information is nolleed after jury is sworn.

Where information in two counts was nolleed after jury had been sworn upon discovery that first count was defective in charging person other than defendant with the crime, the fact that the second count was nolleed barred subsequent prosecution, defendant having been placed in jeopardy, notwithstanding Const. art. 2, § 23, providing that person shall not be again put in jeopardy after being "acquitted" by jury of same offense; such constitutional provision not changing common-law rule that a defendant is put in jeopardy when jury is sworn, in view of Rev. St. 1909, § 8047.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Dunklin County; W. S. C. Walker, Judge.

A. E. Linton was convicted of violating the local option law, and he appealed to Court of Appeals, from which the case was transferred to the Supreme Court (217 S. W. 874). Reversed, and defendant discharged.

Defendant was convicted and fined in the sum of $300 in the circuit court of Dunklin county upon an amended information which charged him with a violation of the local option law, in that he unlawfully sold one pint of whisky in Dunklin county, in which the local option law was in full force and effect. The defendant was charged and arrested under the name of William Linton. Upon the trial defendant filed a plea of autrefois acquit, alleging, in substance, that he had before been placed in jeopardy for the identical crime.

The facts upon which the former jeopardy arises are admitted, and may be briefly summarized as follows: On December 14, 1918, the prosecuting attorney of Dunklin county filed an information in the circuit court of that county against William Linton. The information was in two counts, but by some mishap, the reason for which does not appear in this record, the first count charged one William Sharp with the unlawful sale of one pint of whisky on December 13, 1918, in Dunklin county, in violation of the local option law. The second count charged William Linton with having violated said local option law on December 13, 1918, by unlawfully keeping, storing for and delivering to another person, one pint of whisky. It is admitted that defendant, A. E. Linton, was arrested under this first information, and gave bond thereunder, and when the case was called for trial under the first information on January 14, 1919, defendant, A. E. Linton, appeared and answered ready for trial. Thereupon a jury was selected and sworn to try the cause. Shortly thereafter the prosecuting attorney discovered the mistake in the first count of the information, and entered a nolle prosequi in said cause, and the jury was discharged over the protest, objection, and exception of the defendant. Thereafter and on the same day the said prosecuting attorney filed the amended information upon which the present trial was had.

It stands conceded by this record that both of these informations undertook to charge a crime based upon the identical transaction. In other words, there is evidence tending to show that defendant did violate the local option law by selling said pint of whisky in said county, and in so doing, and as part of the transaction, he delivered said pint of whisky, also in violation of said local option law.

The defendant was granted an appeal to the Springfield Court of Appeals, but that court, in an opinion rendered, transferred the case here, on the theory that a constitutional question was involved, in that the cause involved the construction of article 2, § 23, of our Constitution, which deals with the subject of former jeopardy.

Hall & Billings, of Kennett, for appellant.
Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and O. P. Le Mire, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WILLIAMS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] I. The fact that defendant, A. E. Linton, was named as William Linton in the respective informations does not in any manner affect the question of former jeopardy. It is admitted that defendant A. E. Linton, was the person intended in both informations, and that he was the person who in fact was arrested and entered his plea in both instances. Whenever a defendant is indicted by his wrong name, and does not call the trial court's attention to his correct name before pleading, he is to be proceeded against by the name in the indictment. Section 5113, R. S. 1909.

II. It stands conceded that the second count of the original information and the amended information each charge a crime growing out of one and the same criminal transaction. In other words, the unlawful delivery charged in the second count of the original information is but a part of the transaction going to make up the unlawful sale charged in the amended information.

[2] We have no hesitancy in saying that the first count of the original information cannot be used as the basis of a plea of former jeopardy because upon its face it charges no crime against the defendant.

[3] But under the second count of the original information, defendant is charged with an unlawful delivery of this one pint of whisky. The case was called, the parties announced ready for trial, and a jury was selected and sworn to try the cause, and thereafter, over the objection and exception of defendant, the prosecutor entered a nolle prosequi, and the jury was discharged. Under a recent ruling of the Springfield Court of Appeals, had the trial proceeded to an acquittal or conviction upon the second count of the original information, it would have been a complete bar to another prosecution for the unlawful sale, based upon the same transaction which forms the basis of the charge in the amended information. State v. Needham, 194 Mo. App. 201, 186 S. W. 585. We think the above ruling of the Court of Appeals is sound, and is in harmony with the greater weight of authority. Kelley's Criminal Law and Practice (3d Ed.) par. 237, p. 194; 8 R. C. L. 143; 16 C. J. 279.

[4] If it be true, as above stated, that a conviction or acquittal under the second count of the original information would be a complete bar to a prosecution under the amended information, then there is no escape from the conclusion that defendant was placed in jeopardy under the second count of the original information when the jury was sworn. This is the well-established rule at common law. State v. Webster, 206 Mo. 558, loc. cit. 571, 105 S. W. 705; State v. Hays, 78 Mo. 600, loc. cit. 606; 8 R. C. L. 138, 139, and cases therein cited; 16 C. J. 236 and cases therein cited.

III. Although it be conceded that the defendant has been once before in jeopardy for the same offense, is he entitled to be discharged by reason thereof, and, if so, by what authority of law? Section 23 of article 2 of the Missouri Constitution is as follows:

"That no person shall be compelled to testify against himself in a criminal cause, nor shall any person, after being once acquitted by a jury, be again, for the same offense, put in jeopardy of life or liberty; but if the jury to which the question of his guilt or innocence is submitted fail to render a verdict, the court before which the trial is had may, in its discretion, discharge the jury and commit or bail the prisoner for trial at the next term of court, or, if the state of business will permit, at the same term; and if judgment be arrested after a verdict of guilty on a defective indictment, or if judgment on a verdict of guilty be reversed for error in law, nothing herein contained shall prevent a new trial of the prisoner on a proper indictment, or according to correct principles of law." (Italics ours.)

We are of the opinion that the above constitutional provision has no real application to the situation now held in judgment. The Constitution says:

"Nor shall any person, after being once acquitted by a jury be again for the same offense put in jeopardy for life and liberty," etc.

The defendant in the instant case was not acquitted by a jury, and hence we are unable to see in what manner the constitutional provision can be held to apply. The language of the Constitution is clear and unequivocal, and we know of no reason why it should not be construed as it reads.

There seems to have arisen some confusion on the question of former jeopardy, and our own reports are not entirely free from criticism along this line. After carefully reviewing many of the cases upon the subject we are led to the belief that this confusion arises by reason of failing to call to mind that the law of former jeopardy first arose under the common law (8 R. C. L. 134, 135), and that in some state Constitutions and in the federal Constitution the old common-law rule that no person shall for the same offense be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb was incorporated in its entirety, while in other state Constitutions, notably that of Missouri, apparently only a portion of the common law on the subject was incorporated (and thereby removed from legislative interference).

But it goes without saying that the common law as to former jeopardy is in effect in this state, unless the same has been changed or modified by the Constitution or by statutory enactment. Section 8047, R. S. 1909. The fact that a portion of the common law on this subject was written into our Constitution should certainly not be given the effect of having repealed the remaining portion of the common law on the subject, unless the constitutional provision should be found to be in conflict therewith. Section 8047, supra.

The common-law general rule applicable to the situation now held in judgment was quoted with approval by this court from Cooley on Constitutional Limitations in the case of

"A person is in legal jeopardy when he is put upon trial, before a court of competent jurisdiction, upon indictment or information which is sufficient in form and substance to sustain a conviction, and a jury has been charged with his deliverance. And a jury is said to be thus charged when they have been impaneled and sworn. The defendant then becomes entitled to a verdict which shall constitute a bar to a new prosecution; and he cannot be deprived of this bar by a nolle prosequi entered by the prosecuting officer against his will, or by a discharge of the jury and continuance of the cause."

There are certain well-known exceptions to this general rule, and a large number of them will be found discussed in the learned opinion by Faris, J., in State v. Buente, 256 Mo. 227, loc. cit. 241, 165 S. W. 340, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 879, but none of the exceptions are applicable to the case at bar. Some of these exceptions are exceptions recognized by the common law, and others are exceptions created by statute, as was the situation held in judgment in the case of State v. Buente, supra. The statutory exception in the Buente Case was held not to conflict with the above-mentioned provision of our state Constitution, which is further persuasive proof that our constitutional provision was not intended to supply all the law on the subject, but only to save from legislative change that portion which was permanently preserved by the constitutional mandate, leaving the Legislature free to act upon such portions of the law of former jeopardy as was not included in the constitutional provision.

We find no statute in this state which changes or conflicts with the above-mentioned general rule of the common-law applicable to the facts in the case at bar. That being true, the rule should be considered as remaining in full force and effect. Applying said rule to the facts held in judgment in the case at bar, it clearly appears that defendant was placed in jeopardy under the second count in the original information, and that the same constitutes a bar to a prosecution under the amended information. Such being the case, defendant's plea of former jeopardy should have been sustained.

It therefore follows that the judgment must be reversed, and the defendant discharged. It is so ordered.

All concur.

CARSON et al. v. HECKE et al. (No. 20826.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Partition \S 111(1)—Tenant by curtesy, not a party, not entitled to participate in proceeds of sale.

A tenant by curtesy who was not a party to a partition proceeding was not entitled to participate in the proceeds of a sale; his curtesy being neither sold nor bought at such sale, but only the interests and estates of the parties, even though made a party defendant on petition after the sale.

2. Curtesy \S 11(1)—Acceptance of portion of proceeds of partition by tenant by curtesy estops asserting of curtesy interest.

An acceptance by a tenant by the curtesy, who was not a party to a partition action, of a portion of the proceeds of a sale awarded to him, would estop him to assert the curtesy interest thereafter.

3. Appeal and error \S 1201(7)—Judgment ordering distribution of proceeds of sale in partition open for correction of errors after appeal from final judgment.

An appeal having been taken from a final judgment ordering distribution of the proceeds of a sale in a partition proceeding, the proceeding is still open for the correction of errors, including a defect of parties.

4. Partition \S 46(1)—All persons interested in lands required to be made parties.

Following the practice of equity courts, Rev. St. 1909, $\S\S$ 2561, 2562, 2572, require every person interested in land sought to be partitioned to be made a party and his interest set out in the pleadings and determined by the judgment.

5. Appeal and error \S 187(3)—Omission of interested parties in partition suit calls for reversal on appeal.

If the omission of interested parties in a partition suit is passed over in the trial court, the general practice is to reverse the judgment on appeal.

6. Partition \S 13—Tenant by curtesy may not sue for partition if not a tenant in common.

The statutory authority given for an action for partition by a tenant by curtesy relates only to estates held in common.

7. Partition \S 12(2)—Joint or cotenants for life may have partition.

Joint or cotenants for life may have partition between themselves.

8. Partition \S 12(5)—Partition impossible between life tenants and remaindermen except by statutory authority.

Except by statutory authority, compulsory partition is impossible between life tenants, whether by the curtesy or otherwise, and remaindermen or reversioners.

9. Partition \S 12(5)—Statutes do not authorize compulsory partition between life tenants and remaindermen.

The statutes relating to compulsory partition do not authorize compulsory partition between life tenants, by the curtesy or otherwise, and remaindermen or reversioners.

10. Partition \S 12(5)—May be had between life tenants and remaindermen by consent.

Partition between life tenants, by the curtesy or otherwise, and remaindermen or reversioners may be granted, if all the parties consent.

11. Partition \S 22—Minors cannot consent to partition.

Minors are incapable of consenting to a partition between life tenants and remaindermen.

12. Partition \S 22 — Insane persons cannot consent to partition.

Insane persons cannot consent to partition between life tenants and remaindermen or reversioners.

13. Infants \S 73—Incumbent on court to protect rights in partition proceedings.

It is incumbent on the courts to protect the legal rights of minors in proceedings for partition of land.

14. Partition \S 12(4)—Division when minors held interest.

Although partition of real property may be ordered and the statutory provision for a sale enforced if the property is not susceptible of division in kind notwithstanding minors hold an interest, such rule governs only the cases in which the remedy by partition is allowed, namely, when the interests to be separated are of a joint or common kind, and not where a life tenancy by curtesy or otherwise incumbers the fee, notwithstanding Rev. St. 1909, \S 8499, regarding mortality tables and directing their use.

15. Life estates \S 27(1)—Statutes regarding mortality tables do not extend authority of courts to adjudge money to life tenant in lieu of estate.

Rev. St. 1909, \S 8499, regarding the mortality tables and directing their use, does not extend the authority of the courts to adjudge money to a life tenant, by curtesy or otherwise, in lieu of his estate in instances or under circumstances theretofore unauthorized, but prescribes a mode to compute the value of his interest when according to the settled law this may be done.

Error to Circuit Court, Chariton County; Fred Lamb, Judge.

Suit by Louisa J. Carson and others against George T. Hecke and others to partition land. After sale of land under judgment and report by sheriff, John S. Lane filed a petition to be made a defendant in the proceedings. From a subsequent judgment ordering a distribution, George T. Hecke and others bring error. Reversed and remanded.

S. A. Davis, of Brunswick, and Ed. M. Yates, of Kansas City, for plaintiffs in error.
Roy W. Rucker, of Sedalia, O. P. Ray, of Keytesville, and John S. Lane, for defendants in error.

GOODE, J. This action was filed to have partitioned two parcels of land inherited by the parties as heirs of Annie E. Lane, who died intestate March 29, 1915. The facts of the case up to the interlocutory judgment rendered by the circuit court are stated well in that judgment, which, omitting caption, reads as follows:

"Now on this the 21st day of September, 1916, this [cause] coming on to be heard, and it appearing that all of the defendants have been served by process except Perry Keith, who has since entered his appearance as defendant in this cause by answer filed.

"And the court finds that it has jurisdiction of the subject and defendants herein.

"Wherefore the cause is submitted to the court upon the petition of plaintiff, the answer of Gilbert Lamb, as guardian ad litem of Emmitt Roesen, a person of unsound mind, and answer of A. W. Johnson, guardian ad litem of Lonnie S. Hecke, Ruby M. Hecke, Clara Z. Hecke, Lillie B. Hecke, and Harry L. Hecke, minor heirs of Louis Hecke, deceased, and interpleader of Allie Drace, as administrator of Louis Hecke, deceased, and the answer of Willie A. Hecke, Laura Hecke, George T. Hecke, Alice V. Hecke, Sarah Keith, and Perry Keith, filed in this court, and the evidence of plaintiffs' witnesses in support thereof, all of which was heard, seen and considered by the court, and the court finds from the pleadings and evidence:

"That Mrs. Anna E. Lane died on the 29th day of March, 1915, intestate, leaving as her sole heirs George Hecke, Louis Hecke, Robert Hecke, Louisa J. Carson, Sarah W. Keith, and Mrs. E. A. Roesen.

"That subsequent to the death of said Anna E. Lane one of her said heirs, namely, Louis Hecke, died intestate, leaving surviving him as his sole heirs the following named parties, namely: His widow, Sopha Hecke, and the following named children: Lonnie S. Hecke, Ruby M. Hecke, Clara Z. Hecke, Lillie B. Hecke, Willie A. Hecke, Mamie Wilhelm, Leonora Rodgers, Rody C. Gotchalk, Denver Hecke, Theodore Hecke, and Harry L. Hecke—and that Allie Drace has been appointed and qualified as administrator of the estate of Louis Hecke, deceased.

"The court further finds that said Annie E. Lane at the time of her death was the owner in fee simple of the following tracts or parcels of land; 90 acres being 15 acres off the south end of 70 acres, the west side of the northeast quarter; 10 acres off the west side of the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter; also 5-acre strip off of the east part of the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter, and 60 acres being the east half of the west half of the southeast quarter and part of the west half of the east half of the southeast quarter, all of section 32, township 53, range 19, Chariton county, Mo.

"The court further finds that Louisa J. Carson, plaintiff, and George Hecke or his assignee, Alice Hecke, Robert Hecke, Sarah W. Keith, Emmitt Roesen are each entitled to one-sixth of said real estate, and that the estate of Louis Hecke, deceased, combined are entitled to one-sixth part of said real estate.

"That plaintiff and said defendants are tenants in common and are severally entitled to moiety of said estate as specified aforesaid, and as such tenants in common are of right entitled to partition of the real estate aforesaid, but that, owing to the character and location of said real estate and number of parties, partition in kind cannot be had without great prejudice to the rights of all parties in interest.

"The court further finds that Messrs. Benecke & Benecke and F. C. Sasse, Esq., have been employed by plaintiff as attorneys and to be allowed a reasonable compensation for their services herein to be taxed up as cost in this proceeding. Wherefore, the premises considered and the court being fully advised, the court doth find and decree and adjudge that prayer for partition of said land be granted, and that it is decreed and adjudged by the court that the lands be sold by the sheriff at public sale for terms cash in hand, and that after deducting the cost of proceedings the proceeds be divided in accordance with this decree, and that the share to which Louis Hecke would have been entitled to if living shall be paid to the administrator of his estate, and the cause to be continued to await the report of the sheriff."

The sheriff of Chariton county reported February 6, 1917, that he had sold the land at public auction to the highest bidders, in compliance with the aforesaid judgment, the parcel of 15 acres having been bought by William and Charles A. Susawind for $2,100, the other tract of 60 acres by Robert H. Hecke, one of the defendants, for $4,200 and the purchase money for both tracts had been paid. About a month after this report was filed, and on March 10, 1917, John Lane filed a petition to be made a defendant in the proceeding, alleging he was the widower of Anna E. Lane, deceased, and entitled to a curtesy interest in the lands, that he had not theretofore been made a party and had had no notice of the suit for partition until after the judgment was rendered and the lands sold, that he was willing to accept in lieu of his curtesy interest a gross sum in cash to be computed under the mortality tables of the state, concluding with a prayer to be made a defendant, for the court to ascertain the extent of his interest in the land and its value according to said mortality tables, and that the value be paid him in lieu of his life estate. He made no averment about being in possession, and the conclusion to be drawn from the record is that he was not, but instead the parties plaintiff and defendant who are disputing the validity of his claim of a curtesy interest.

Omitting to notice some intermediate proceedings which are immaterial on this appeal, the following appear in the record: First, a demurrer to the intervening petition of Lane was filed by all the defendants and overruled; then, on October 17, 1917, George T. Hecke, Alice Hecke, Sarah W. Keith, and Perry Keith, four of the defendants, filed an answer to Lane's petition, denying he was entitled to a gross sum in cash out of the proceeds of the land in lieu of an estate by curtesy, and praying the petition be dismissed.

The evidence taken on the issues raised by the petition and the answer to it was intended to support the contention of the parties that Lane had forfeited his curtesy by deserting and failing to provide for his family. The facts, in substance, were: John and Anna Lane, the deceased, were married in 1873, and from two to four years thereafter a daughter, Emmittie Lane, who afterwards became Emmittie Roesen, was born of the marriage. In 1877 or 1878 Lane abandoned his wife and lived with her no more. During the years of his absence he stayed for various periods in Linn county, Mo., Ft. Worth, Tex., Wichita, McPherson county, Emporia, Dodge City, and Topeka, Kan., Seneca, Mo., Castle Rock, Cripple Creek, and Leadville, Colo., Pleasant Valley, Utah, and perhaps in other places. When he left home he took his daughter with him, kept her a few months, and then his wife took charge of her. It is not shown that a divorce ever was granted to either spouse, and presumably they continued to be husband and wife until the wife died. Neither does the record state the relationship of the parties to the action to Mrs. Lane, and it is rather vague about whether Lane's whereabouts after he left home were known to his wife and her heirs, but some of the parties knew he was living at least for a good portion of the period of his absence. George Hecke testified he had not heard from him in 18 or 20 years; but he testified, too, that his (Hecke's) father-in-law told him of seeing Lane in Seneca, Mo., but not the year when he saw him. Lane testified he returned to Brookfield, Mo., in 1900, and was in Linn county that winter with his brother, near Brookfield.

The court below on October, 5, 1917, in passing on the issues raised by Lane's petition and the answer to it, found Lane was the widower of Annie E. Lane, and Emmittie Lane (afterwards Emmittie Roesen) was their daughter; that Lane was 63 years old, was not a party to the partition suit, but was entitled to an estate by curtesy in the proceeds of the sale of the aforesaid lands. Other findings in the judgment, and the judgment itself, are as follows:

"The court further finds that there is now in the hands of the sheriff of this county for distribution among the heirs and legal representatives of the said Annie E. Lane, arising from said partition suit, the sum of $5,737.35, and that the cost incident to this motion is $20.50, and that the present cash value of the rest of the said John S. Lane in said fund, computed under the mortality tables of this state, is $2,646.

"The court further finds that since the death of the said Annie E. Lane there has been collected in rents from the said lands so sold in partition the sum of $350, no part of which has been paid to the said John S. Lane, but all of the same has been paid to the descendants of the said Annie E. Lane, and that in addition thereto the defendant Robert Hecke owes as rent from said lands the further sum of $160, and making in all the sum of $510 in rents from said lands, which belongs absolutely to the said John S. Lane, as tenant by the curtesy, all of which rents should be charged to the descendants of the said Annie E. Lane, in proportion to which they owe the same.

"It is therefore ordered and adjudged and decreed by the court that said sum of $5,737.35, be distributed by the sheriff among the parties hereto entitled in the following sums and amounts, to wit:

|-------------------------------------|----------|
| Costs incident to motion..... | $ 20 50 |
| John S. Lane, curtesy interest..... | 2,646 00 |
| John S. Lane, rent from lands..... | 510 00 |
| Louisa J. Carson..... | 453 47 |
| Alice V. Hecke..... | 463 47 |
| Robert Hecke..... | 293 47 |
| Sarah W. Keith..... | 453 45 |
| Emmittie Roesen..... | 453 45 |
| Estate Louis Hecke, deceased..... | 453 45 |

$5,737 35

"It is further ordered that this cause be continued to await the final report of the said sheriff distributing said funds."

The appeal was taken from that judgment, apparently by all the defendants.

The court below computed the value of Lane's estate for life by the curtesy, according to chapter 82 of the Revised Statutes of 1909. The first section of the chapter reads as follows:

"When a party as tenant for life, or by the curtesy, or in dower, is entitled to the annual interest on a sum of money, or is entitled to the use of any estate, or part thereof, and is willing to accept a gross sum in lieu thereof, or the party liable for such interest, or affected by such claim, has the right to pay a gross sum in lieu thereof, or if the court in any legal proceeding adjudge or decree a gross sum to be paid in lieu thereof, the sum shall be estimated according to the then value of an annuity of six per cent. on the principal sum during the probable life of such person, according to the following table, showing the present value, on the basis of six per cent. interest, of an annuity of one dollar (according to the Carlisle Tables of Mortality) payable at the end of every year that a person of a given age may be living, for the ages therein stated." R. S. 1909, § 3499.

Next follows the table referred to in said section, and two other sections prescribing the rule of calculation and giving examples to show the proper use of it. No error having been assigned concerning the amount awarded to Lane as the value of his curtesy, the sections need not be transcribed.

[1, 2] We can think of no theory on which

Lane is entitled to part of the proceeds of the parcels, as he was not a party to the suit prior to the sale, and his curtesy was neither sold nor bought, but only the interests and estates of the parties. Smoot v. Judd, 161 Mo. 673, 691, 61 S. W. 854, 84 Am. St. Rep. 738. If the purchasers knew Lane was living and held the curtesy, probably the prices they bid were less than they would have offered had he been a party and his interest adjudged and sold. However that may be, they bought the titles only of the parties to the suit, and, so far as appears on the present record, claim no more. As to whether they were misled regarding the state of those titles or should have relief for any reason, nothing should be said on this appeal. But, as the facts appear at present, the money to be distributed was paid to the sheriff for the interests of those owners who were parties to the proceeding when the decree was entered and the lands sold and belongs to them exclusively. The case of Hinds v. Stevens, 45 Mo. 209, wherein was discussed the right of a dowress whose husband died after judgment had been given fixing his interest as a coparcener, differs from this one in that her dower was consummate as soon as her husband died in the portion allotted to him, whereas Lane's curtesy covers the entire fee. It is true an acceptance by him of the portion of the proceeds awarded to him would estop him to assert his curtesy interest hereafter (Bogart v. Bogart, 138 Mo. 419, 40 S. W. 91; Fischer v. Siekmann, 125 Mo. 165, 28 S. W. 435); but this rule of law does not meet fully the exigencies of the case, and other facts are to be considered.

[3] This appeal having been taken from the final judgment ordering distribution of the proceeds, the proceeding is still open for the correction of errors, including a defect of parties. Clark v. Sires, 193 Mo. 502, 92 S. W. 224; Collier v. Lead Co., 208 Mo. 246, 106 S. W. 971.

[4, 5] Our statutes, following the practice of equity courts, are rigorous in requiring all persons interested in lands sought to be partitioned to be made parties to the suit, and their interests set out in the pleadings and determined by the judgment. R. S. 1909, §§ 2561, 2562, 2572. The rule which obtains in chancery regarding the parties to such suits is held to apply, on a proper construction of the statutes, in full force to statutory actions for partition. Estes v. Nell, 108 Mo. 172, 18 S. W. 1006. In the cited case the court said:

The rule "in chancery is that, unless all persons whose interests in the subject-matter of the suit, and the relief sought, were bound up with that of others," are brought before the court and made subject to its jurisdiction, the suit would not be entertained. "It was therefore indispensable that all the cotenants not uniting in the petition be made defendants." [Citing authorities.] This rule in equity is made to apply to our statutory proceeding for partition (section 7135) providing that "every person having any interest in such premises, whether in possession or otherwise, shall be made a party to such petition." 108 Mo. loc. cit. 177, 18 S. W. 1007.

Accordingly the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded for the omitted persons to be brought in as parties. A prior case was disposed of in the same way, because the owner of an undivided one-third of the premises had been left out of the proceedings, the court saying:

"Rosina is not a party to this suit, and as her interest appears on the face of the record, there can be no partition until she is made a party." Dameron v. Jameson, 71 Mo. 97, 99.

Where one who had a vested interest in the land to be divided was no party, and though the fact appeared on the face of the petition and no objection was raised on that score at the trial, it was held the defect was not waived as it would have been in other actions; and this because the jurisdiction of partition suits had originally been in the chancery courts, which were careful to have before them all persons interested in the lands, so the entire title would pass and future controversies be avoided. To the same effect are Hiles v. Rule, 121 Mo. 248, 256, 25 S. W. 959; Lilly v. Menke, 126 Mo. 190, 214, 28 S. W. 643, 994; Johnson v. Johnson, 170 Mo. 34, 56, 70 S. W. 241, 59 L. R. A. 748. And if the omission of interested parties is passed over in the trial court, the general practice is to reverse the judgment on appeal. 30 Cyc. 202, and cases cited in note.

The proper course would be to remand this cause for the sale to be set aside and Lane brought in as a party, his interest determined, and a resale ordered, if there can be partition between a life tenant and remaindermen. But in this jurisdiction and most others a tenant for life, whether by curtesy or otherwise, absent statutory authority, cannot compel partition against remaindermen and reversioners, nor they against him, and between such estates the remedy is unavailable except by consent of the respective owners. This is because no common interest exists between them of any character, either in coparcenary, tenancy in common or joint tenancy. The right to partition in such cases extends, for the benefit of cotenants for life, to allowing their estates to be divided between them, and for the benefit of remaindermen and reversioners, to allowing partition of their holdings, subject to the life estate. Atkinson v. Brady, 114 Mo. 200, 21 S. W. 480, 35 Am. St. Rep. 744; Hayes v. McReynolds, 144 Mo. 348, 46 S. W. 161; Stockwell v. Stockwell, 262 Mo. 671, 679, 172 S. W. 23. Where the owners of an estate for life owned, besides, an undivided interest in the remainder, the remedy has been allowed for a division of the interests in remainder, subject to the life interest. For example, in one case it was said:

"As the petitioner is himself the owner of the life estate in the whole tract proposed to be divided, and also owns the interest of a part of the remainder mentioned, no objection can of course be made to the partition on account of the entire property being subject to a life estate." Reinders v. Koppelman, 68 Mo. 482, 500, 38 Am. Rep. 802.

In another case the opinion said, on the authority of the proceeding one, "that the estate sought to be partitioned is subject to be partitioned, is settled," but, by looking at the briefs in connection with the opinion, it is perceived the suit was for a division among remaindermen, subject to an unexpired life term. Preston v. Brant, 96 Mo. 552, 10 S. W. 78. The fact of a cointerest also existed in Doerner v. Doerner, 161 Mo. 399, 407, 61 S. W. 801. One decision seems out of line with those which declare against the right of partition between life tenants and the owners of the fee; for in it the holder of a life estate was permitted, as coplaintiff with one who held a contingent remainder, to maintain an action for partition against the other contingent remaindermen. Sikemeier v. Galvin, 124 Mo. 367, 27 S. W. 551.

Whatever support these three decisions last mentioned may lend to the view that life tenants may sue remaindermen in partition, and vice versa, was taken away by a later decision, where it was said regarding them:

"While the three cases mainly relied upon by appellant may not have been expressly overruled, they have been intentionally disregarded in cases where they are cited and could have been followed. We hold they are not controlling authorities in this state as far as they conflict with the conclusion announced in this case."

The conclusion referred to was against the right of persons to whom a testator had devised and "during their natural lives," with remainders over, to maintain an action to partition by a sale of the land the value of their life estates to be paid to them out of the proceeds. Hill v. Hill, 261 Mo. 55, 168 S. W. 1165. The same conclusion was reached in a still later opinion in which all the authorities in this state were examined. The action was where the lands in controversy had been granted to the plaintiff and her bodily heirs, thereby creating an estate for life in her with remainders over to her children. One point presented for decision was the right of the plaintiff, as the holder of the life term, to maintain the action, and to decide the point it was necessary to interpret the first section of the article of our partition statutes. R. S. 1909, § 2559. Said section, on a first reading, appears to confer the remedy on any one or more of the persons holding interests in lands, whether of joint tenancy, tenancy in common, coparcenary, fee, for life, years, by the curtesy, or in dower. Following previous precedents the court held, notwithstanding the section mentioned owners of life estates held by the curtesy or otherwise as entitled to partition, the remedy was allowed only when there were coestates between the parties, saying:

"The controlling feature of the provision is that there must be an existing undivided tenancy or holding in land by two or more owners, susceptible of being so parceled between them as to become a several holding by each. We may at the outset eliminate Mrs. Stockwell, the life tenant, because she not only has nothing which is susceptible of division, her tenancy covering in its breadth the entire estate and in its length the period of her life, in and during which no other person can have any interest unless severed from this freehold by her own act. That this does not constitute a subject for partition is not only evident from the use of a word which, in such a connection, can have no other meaning than the severance of common and undivided interests, but also from the frequent adjudications of this court. Atkinson v. Brady, 114 Mo. 200; Throckmorton v. Pence, 121 Mo. 50; Stewart v. Jones, 219 Mo. 614." Stockwell v. Stockwell, 262 Mo. loc. cit. 679, 172 S. W. 25.

[8, 7] Those remarks were followed by a thorough review of the Missouri cases on the question under discussion. In Atkinson v. Brady, 114 Mo., supra, the statute where it speaks of suits by life tenants, by the curtesy, etc., was construed to have no application to an estate by the curtesy alone, because the holder of it possessed the entire interest during his life, and there was nothing, so far as he was concerned, to partition; that the statutory authority given for an action by a curtesy tenant related only to estates held in common; for instance, where the deceased wife and another owned property as tenants in common at the demise of the wife, or her husband acquired an undivided interest afterwards, in addition to his curtesy interest; then, as a matter of course, he could have his right ascertained and his interest set off by a suit for that purpose. This view is sound, but it should be added that joint or cotenants for life may have partition between themselves; and a court has said that a leading text-writer meant to state no more than the latter proposition when he declared a tenant for life or years could, both at law and in equity, compel partition, citing Freeman on Partition, § 455. Brown v. Brown, 67 W. Va. 251, 67 S. E. 596, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 125, 21 Ann. Cas. 263. Whether this is a correct statement of that learned commentator's meaning may be doubtful; for the few citations given in support of his text go further. In another case in this state where a parcel of land held by a dowress was sought to be partitioned between her and the owners of the remainder, this court decided she was neither cotenant nor joint tenant with the remaindermen, but owned the whole property for her natural life, independent and irrespective of other parties, and, this being true, there was no interest to set off. Hayes v. McReynolds, 144 Mo. 348, 353, 46 S. W. 161. In both the Missouri cases just noticed it was said remaindermen could have a partition of their interests, subject to the life estate.

[8-18] The rules in the different states and the authorities declaring the rules have been collected and annotated in several volumes. Brown v. Brown, 67 W. Va. 251, 67 S. E. 596, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 125, 21 Ann. Cas. 263; Aydlott v. Pendleton, 111 N. C. 28, 16 S. E. 8, 32 Am. St. Rep. 776; Fleld v. Leitz, 125 Am. St. Rep. 997; McConnell v. Bell, 121 Tenn. 198, 114 S. W. 203, 130 Am. St. Rep. 770; Chickamauga Trust Co. v. Lonas, 139 Tenn. 228, 201 S. W. 777, L. R. A. 1918D, 451. The notes to the last case are comprehensive, and it will be perceived by reading them that the weight of authority is in accord with the Missouri decisions, the effect of which may be summarized as follows: First, except by statutory authority, compulsory partition is impossible between life tenants and remaindermen or reversioners; second, our statutes on the subject do not authorize compulsory partition of those interests; third, a partition between them may be granted if all the parties consent.

[11-13] Some of the parties in the case before us are incapable of consenting to a partition because two or three are minors and one is insane. Therefore the next question is whether, if the cause were remanded to have Lane brought in and another sale made to pass his interest, this course would be lawful. Unless there is statutory authority for it, clearly it would not be, and it is incumbent on the courts to protect the legal rights of minors in proceedings of this kind. Freeman, Otenancy and Partition, 457. And one can readily see their interests might be sacrificed or seriously impaired by a sale and division of the proceeds with the life tenant, computing the latter's interest by mortality tables. Persons who are sui juris may use their judgment about the expediency of such a course and determine for themselves whether they prefer to have partition by a sale and an apportionment of the purchase money with the curtesy holder, or await the termination of his life and estate. A different principle controls where some of the parties in interest are under the disability of minority or insanity. Courts have had occasion to consider the question, and their conclusions are in harmony with what we have said. In one case minors by their guardian sued for the sale of lands they had inherited from the mother, and in which their father, the defendant, owned the curtesy. The court, in denying the relief prayed, on the ground of a possible wrong to the children, said it was the peculiar duty of courts to protect the rights of infants, and, although a suit in chancery might be brought by a general guardian, nevertheless a minor was treated as the ward of the court and under its cognizance and protection, citing 2 Story, Equity Jurisprudence, c. 35. As a further reason for the decision, the court pointed out that the proceeds of a sale would be distributed according to the tables of mortality, which would give the curtesy tenant, who was 41 years of age, more than 67 per cent. and the children 32 per cent.; the owner of the life estate thereby receiving more than the owners of the fee. In the present case the disparity of apportionment would not be so great; yet Lane would receive for his interest over one-third of the purchase price of the land.

That statutes to enable property to be sold when division in kind is impracticable are to be enforced only when there are coestates has been decided by several courts. A Kentucky statute provides for the sale of joint estates if the land is indivisible without impairing its value; but the section was held to apply only to the estates in possession of persons holding jointly, and not where the possession was with an estate for life. In Kansas it was held a court had no power to compel a partition either in kind or by sale of the interests of remaindermen. Shafer v. Covey, 90 Kan. 588, 135 Pac. 676; Ryan v. Cullen, 89 Kan. 879, 133 Pac. 430. A decision of this court bears on the point, for in the Stockwell Case the proposition was pressed that the court could decree the sale of the interests of remaindermen by virtue of the section of the partition chapter which says:

"If, in any case, from the nature and amount of the property sought to be divided, and the number of the owners it shall be apparent to the court that the assignment of dower, if any, and partition thereof, in kind, cannot be made without great prejudice to the owners, an order of sale may be made." R. S. 1909, § 2612.

The court pointed out that said section authorizes a sale only in instances, when the interests held by the parties are cointerests, and therefore within the scope of the remedy by partition. Otherwise stated, the sale cannot be ordered unless the different interests could have been set apart in severalty by a partition in kind, if the nature of the property would have permitted the division without prejudice to the parties.

[14, 15] But it may be argued the law for computing the value of life estates by the mortality tables has changed the rule, as it was declared in the decision last cited, although the case arose after the enactment of the mortality tables law. But the court did not interpret the act with reference to the question in hand, and we must answer it without the help of a direct precedent. It is true a partition of real property may be ordered and the statutory provision for a sale enforced if the property is unsusceptible of division in kind, notwithstanding minors hold interests. Thornton v. Thornton, 27 Mo. 302, 72 Am. Dec. 266. But we have seen that this rule governs only the cases in which the remedy by partition is allowed, namely, when the interests to be separated are of a joint or common kind, not where a life tenancy incumbers the fee. Nor is this rule affected by the words of the section regarding the mortality tables and directing their use "if the court in any legal proceedings adjudge or decree a gross sum to be paid in lieu thereof" (that is, of tenancies for life, by the curtesy or in dower). Those words do not extend the authority of the courts to adjudge money to such a tenant in lieu of his estate, in instances or under circumstances theretofore unauthorized, but prescribe a mode to compute the value of his interest when, according to the settled law, this may be done. On reading the section we have quoted (section 8499), it is apparent that it neither alludes to the remedy by partition, nor undertakes to amend the statutes which regulate the scope of the remedy. The language of the section expressed no purpose to change the law theretofore existing in this state against compulsory partition between life tenants and the owners of the fee, and so radical a change must be expressed or plainly implied for it to be held within the intention of the Legislature. The purpose of the enactment was to prescribe a method for computing the value of life estates whenever it is necessary to do so to enforce the rights of parties under the law as it stood, not to impair those rights by compelling the acceptance of money in lieu of estates. The Carlisle Tables were used to determine the value of a life estate, where the value was to be credited on an account (Carnes & Perry v. Polk, 5 Helsk. [Tenn.] 244), and where the value of such an estate was to be ascertained for the purpose of estimating the damages of remaindermen caused by changing the grade of a street (City of Joliet v. Blower, 155 Ill. 414, 40 N. E. 619), and under a statute which expressly empowered a court of chancery to sell an estate of dower or curtesy in partition, find its present worth, and apportion the proceeds of the sale accordingly (Cronkright v. Haulenbeck, 25 N. J.

Eq. 513), and to compute the value of a dower interest in an action by the administrator of the dowress to recover the consideration agreed to be paid by the heirs of her husband for a relinquishment of all her rights in his estate (Andrews v. Broughton, 84 Mo. App. 640), and in an action by a widow for the death of her husband, to show the life expectancy of the deceased when he was killed (Boettger v. Iron Works, 136 Mo. 531, 38 S. W. 298), and sometimes to determine the risk and the rate of premiums on insurance policies (Abell v. Ins. Co., 18 W. Va. 400, 433). None of the Missouri cases that treat of the use of the tables, except two, deal with the sections in question. In Tebeau v. Ridge, 261 Mo. 547, 170 S. W. 871, L. R. A. 1915C, 387, it was held the statutory tables should be used to ascertain the value of an inchoate right of dower in a suit against a husband for specific performance of a contract by him to convey land, in order to deduct the value of the dower from the purchase price to be paid by the vendee. This case overruled the prior one of Alple-Hemmelmann R. E. Co. v. Spelbrink, 211 Mo. 671, 111 S. W. 480, 14 Ann. Cas. 652.

The decisions cited supra in no sense interpret those sections so as to determine the question we are considering, but are simply examples of the application of the tables in general, uninfluenced by legislation concerning them. But the cases do indicate, in our judgment, the kinds of litigation wherein our statutes contemplate the use of the mortality tables they prescribe. The theory is untenable that this legislation enlarges the power of a court to enforce partition of estates in land, where there is no community of interest such as has been held heretofore to be subject to the remedy. Indeed, one court has gone so far as to hold a legislative enactment intended to have that effect would work deprivation of property without due process of law. McConnell v. Bell, 121 Tenn. 198, 114 S. W. 203, 130 Am. St. Rep. 770.

The proceeds of the sale of the lands in the present case should be divided among the parties whose interests were sold; therefore the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

All concur.

WAGNER v. PRYOR et al. (No. 16036.)

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. June 8, 1920.)

1. Trial \S 165.—In passing on demurrer, court is not restricted to plaintiff's testimony, if he is honestly mistaken in statements against interest.

In passing on a demurrer to the evidence, the court should consider all the evidence before it, and, though plaintiff's own testimony fails to make a case for the jury, yet where, through ignorance or honest mistake, etc., he makes statements against his interest, they are not conclusive.

2. Railroads \S 400(14)—Negligence under humanitarian doctrine held question for jury.

In an action by one struck by an engine when attempting to cross the tracks, evidence held sufficient to go to the jury under the humanitarian doctrine, though the testimony of plaintiff himself, who was very aged, that he stepped from behind a box car onto a track about 4 feet away, etc., tended to show the company's want of negligence.

3. Railroads \S 370—Duty of lookout defined.

It is the duty of a railroad company to use ordinary care in keeping a lookout for pedestrians at a point known to be customarily used by the public.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Kent K. Koerner, Judge.

Action by Peter Wagner against Edward B. Pryor and another, receivers of the Wabash Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal, and, the original plaintiff having died since trial, the action was revived in the name of Ellen Wagner, administratrix. Affirmed.

N. S. Brown, of St. Louis, and A. E. L. Gardner, of Clayton, for appellants.

Frank A. Thompson and M. U. Hayden, both of St. Louis, for respondent.

NIPPER, C. This is a suit originally instituted in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis by Peter Wagner to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him from being struck by a locomotive owned and operated by appellants. The accident is alleged to have occurred in front of defendants' railroad station at Ferguson, Mo., at about 7 o'clock in the morning on the 9th of June, 1914. The original plaintiff having died since the trial of this case in the court below, the cause has been revived in the name of the present plaintiff.

The petition counts upon the negligence of appellants: (1) Failure to give warning; (2) failure to keep a watch or lookout, when it was known, or should have been known by the exercise of ordinary care, that persons were likely to be crossing the tracks at the place where the accident occurred; (3) operating and running the locomotive at a high and dangerous rate of speed; (4) failing to exercise ordinary care to stop or slacken the speed of the locomotive, after it was known, or should have been known, that plaintiff was in a position of peril, and was oblivious to the danger. The answer was a general denial, and a plea of contributory negligence. The reply was a general denial.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence, defendants offered an instruction in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, which the court overruled. Defendants offered no evidence. The case was submitted to the jury under the "humanitarian" or "last clear chance" doctrine. Plaintiff recovered judgment in the sum of $2,000. Defendants in due form and manner perfected their appeal.

The contention of appellants in this court is: (1) The court erred in overruling the demurrer to the evidence, offered at the close of plaintiff's case, for the reason that plaintiff was guilty of contributory and concurring negligence, and the "humanitarian" doctrine has no application. (2) The court erred in giving plaintiff's instruction, in that it omitted to submit to the jury the element involving plaintiff's right to be upon the tracks of defendants at the time and place mentioned in the evidence. Appellants, in their brief and argument with respect to the demurrer, seem to rely solely upon the testimony of plaintiff himself, without regard to the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses who testified in his behalf.

[1, 2] At the time of this accident, plaintiff was near 73 years of age, and lived in the town of Ferguson, and had lived there for many years prior thereto. He testified he worked for the United States government, in the city of St. Louis, and had so worked, with the exception of an interval of 3 years, since 1861. In going to his work each morning, he would board a train of defendants at Ferguson and ride into the city of St. Louis. On this particular morning he was ascending the embankment leading up to the railroad tracks of defendants, immediately in front of the station. There was a path leading diagonally up this embankment, which was used by the public, and had been so used for many years, as the most convenient way to reach the station from that portion of the town from which plaintiff was going. There were two tracks in front of the station, running north and south at that point. Plaintiff says these tracks were about 4 feet apart, but other witnesses place the distance at 8 feet. Plaintiff says that when he crossed the easternmost track there was a freight car standing on this track almost in front of the station; that he placed his hand on the coupling, leaned over, and looked, and saw no locomotive in sight (although it was shown by other evidence that one could have been seen for half a mile), then stepped hurriedly in an effort to cross the western track immediately in front of the station, and while taking the last step he was struck by one of defendants' locomotives; that he did not see the same until it had struck him. At this time there were two or three other witnesses standing a little more than 100 feet away, who were watching plaintiff at the time the accident occurred. All of these witnesses contradict plaintiff as to his having looked, and as to the rate of speed at which he was walking. Each of them testified that plaintiff did not look, and was walking very slowly. Only one witness testified as to the distance the locomotive was from plaintiff at the time he started to cross the track he was attempting to cross when he was struck. This witness testified that when plaintiff started to cross that track he saw the railroad engine coming, and that it was about 70 feet away; that plaintiff never looked at any time after he reached the top of the embankment, and was walking very slowly; that no whistle was blown, but that he did not know whether any bell was ringing or not. Other witnesses testified the engine was traveling at a rate of speed of about 10 or 12 miles an hour.

If plaintiff was conclusively bound by his own statements, appellant's demurrer should probably have been sustained, for according to his testimony he stepped from behind a box car onto a railroad track 4 feet away and immediately in front of a moving train, and therefore his negligence in so doing would be the proximate cause of his injury, for appellants' servants, operating their locomotive, would have had no opportunity to have stopped the same in time to have prevented the injury. But in passing upon a demurrer the court should consider all the testimony before it, and even though plaintiff's own testimony fails to make a case for the consideration of the jury, yet where it is shown that one through ignorance, oversight, failing memory, due to old age, or mistake honestly made, makes statements against his interest which are not true, the jury is not bound to give conclusive effect to such statements. Quinn v. Railroad, 218 Mo. loc. cit. 566, 118 S. W. 46; Norris v. Railroad, 239 Mo. 695, 144 S. W. 783; Huff v. Railway, 213 Mo. 495, 111 S. W. 1145.

At the time plaintiff was giving his testimony it was shown that he was a very old man, suffered from loss of memory, and stated in his testimony that since his injuries he had suffered so much that he was unable to remember or to give correct dates. We think it is apparent from an examination of his testimony that he was not entirely cognizant of all that took place on the morning of the injury, and, as was said by the Kansas City Court of Appeals in the case of Downs v. Racine-Sattley Co., 175 Mo. App. loc. cit. 387, 162 S. W. 333, in speaking of an instruction telling the jury that admissions against interest are true, we find the following:

"But in more recent cases, of which that of Huff v. Railway, 213 Mo. 495, may be selected for review, such instruction is condemned on the ground that it not only singles out the plaintiff and comments on his testimony but that it erroneously declares the law. The court rejects the idea that a party testifying as a witness should be conclusively bound by the statements he may make against his interest, and announces the better and more just rule that if a party, through ignorance, oversight, or mistake, makes statements against his interest which are not true, the jury are not bound to give conclusive effect to such statements."

Considering the other testimony, if the jury believed it (and it was within its province to do so), it was shown that the engine was 70 feet away at the time appellant started to cross the track. At that time he was in a position of peril. There was a straight track and nothing in the way, and, conceding his negligence, it is shown by the testimony here that this locomotive, under the conditions mentioned in the evidence, traveling at the rate of speed at which it was shown to have been traveling, could have been stopped within a distance of from 35 to 42 feet. This would have left a space of least 28 feet between the engine after it was stopped, and the plaintiff, who, according to the testimony of his witnesses, was walking slowly across the track without looking, and entirely oblivious to the danger in which he was placed. This clearly makes a case under the "humanitarian" doctrine, and there was no error in the court's refusal to sustain a demurrer upon that ground.

[3] All the evidence tended to show conclusively that the point at which plaintiff entered upon the tracks of the defendants or upon its right of way, was at a place which had been used by the public generally for many years, in going to and coming from the station, and there was no dispute or room for argument upon that proposition. This was a point where defendants had a right to expect, and should have exercised ordinary care in keeping a lookout for persons who were likely to cross the tracks at the place mentioned in the evidence, and there was no error in the instruction given for the plaintiff. Eppstein v. Railroad, 197 Mo. 720, 94 S. W. 967.

We find no reversible error. The verdict was a righteous one. The Commissioner recommends that the judgment be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of NIPPER, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

The judgment of the circuit court is accordingly affirmed.

ROBERTS v. HODGES et al. (VANDALIA BANKING ASS'N, Garnishee).
(No. 15719.)

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Submitted on Briefs May 7, 1920. Opinion Filed June 11, 1920.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨328(3) — Landlord held not to waive his lien on corn by authorizing tenant to sell.

A landlord, by authorizing a tenant to sell rent corn, does not necessarily waive his lien on the corn given under Rev. St. 1900, § 7888, or his right to the proceeds, particularly where, although the tenant deposited the money in his own account, he made unsuccessful trips to see the landlord's agent for the specific purpose of figuring up the account and turning over the money received, so that the landlord's right thereto was superior to that of tenant's creditor.

2. Garnishment ⇨105—Garnishment creditor has same right against garnishee as defendant has.

The garnishing creditor can have no higher right against the garnishee himself, in the absence of fraud, than had the defendant in the execution under which the attachment and garnishment were levied.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨246(6)—Landlord held entitled under lease to lien for meadow rent on deposit by tenant of money received from sale of corn.

Where a tenant deposited money in a bank received from his sale of corn, under the lease providing "all crops due to stand good for all rents," the landlord had a lien on the money for meadow rent, as well as for rent of corn ground.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1054(1) — Erroneous admission of evidence not necessarily prejudicial in trial before court.

The admission over objection of evidence which ought to have been excluded is not necessarily prejudicial error requiring reversal of judgment, particularly where the trial was before the court without a jury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Audrain County; Ernest S. Gantt, Judge.

"Not to be officially published."

Action by L. W. Roberts against J. R. Hodges, in which plaintiff recovered a judgment and sued out execution and the Vandalia Banking Association was made garnishee and the Farmers & Merchants Bank of Vandalia, Mo., interpleaded, claiming the garnished money. On trial of the interplea a jury was waived, and judgment rendered for the interpleader. Motions for new trial and in arrest were overruled, and plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Plaintiff, appellant here, on March 8, 1916, recovered a judgment against J. R. Hodges, in the circuit court of Audrain county, for $551.40 with interest at 8 per cent. per annum from that date, and costs. On December 18, 1916, he sued out an execution, under which, and by direction of plaintiff, the sheriff attached in the hands of the Vandalia Banking Association all moneys, etc., belonging to the defendant and duly summoned it as garnishee. Interrogatories were duly filed, the garnishee appeared at the March, 1917, term of the circuit court and answered, admitting that it had in its possession and under its control the sum of $876.35, which it held to the credit of the account of the defendant Hodges. With its answer the garnishee asked the court for an order permitting it to pay the above sum into court, to be allowed a reasonable sum for answering and for attorney's fee, and to be discharged. Depositing the amount, less $25.00 allowed it, the garnishee was discharged.

At the same term of court the Farmers & Merchants Bank file its interplea, admitting the garnishment of the money and its deposit in court by the garnishee, and avers that when the money was attached it was not the property of defendant Hodges but of the interpleader, further claiming that the money so attached was money realized by Hodges on the sale of a crop of corn, and was rent money due by Hodges, as its tenant of the farm on which the crop was grown; that it had a lien on the crop, and this money, being its share of the proceeds of the sale of the crop, it has a lien on it.

Plaintiff, by reply, challenged the claim of the interpleader.

The cause coming on for trial under the interplea, a jury being waived, the court found the issues in favor of the interpleader and adjudged that it recover the sum of $851.35, the amount paid into court by the garnishee, after deducting the sum of $25.00 allowed.

At the trial the interpleader introduced evidence showing it was owner of the land, 220 acres, in Ralls county, and had leased it to Hodges and his brother. The lease was introduced in evidence. Among other provisions in the lease is one that the tenants are to pay $112.50 for 25 acres of meadow and pasture land, and are to give a note for this amount, payable January 1, 1917, "all crops due to stand good for all rents." The lease further provides that the lessees, in consideration of the leasing, etc., agree to pay the party of the first part as rent for the corn land "two-fifths delivered at railroad or as good a market, * * * and one-third of the oats threshed and delivered at Farber or Vandalia, Missouri."

Defendant Hodges testified that he lived on this farm, which he and his brother had leased, taking possession March 1, 1916; that he farmed the land under the lease, putting 45 acres in oats and about 110 acres in corn raising about 2,115 bushels of corn. He sold 1,508 bushels of this corn to one Grover Sutton and 617 bushels to one Samuel Sutton at 80 cents a bushel, which was all the corn he sold off the place; that he kept 431 bushels for his own use, making the total amount of corn raised on the place 2,546 bushels. The corn was not divided in the field but was gathered and weighed at the home place. Grover Sutton gave him a check for $1,206.80 in payment of the corn. Asked if at any time the interpleader, or any of its directors, or its agent, had given him authority to sell this corn, he said "No." Witness testified that he deposited the money he had received from Grover Sutton for the corn to his own credit with the Vandalia Banking Association and had never turned over any part of it to the interpleader; nor had he done so at the time of the garnishment, nor in any manner compensated it for the rent, nor paid it any money since selling the corn to the Suttons; that the money garnished was the money he had received from the sale of the corn. Witness said he sent the check he had received from Grover Sutton for the corn, down to the Vandalia Banking Association by mail, and went to Vandalia a few days afterwards to see Mr. Gatson to apply it on the rent, but Mr. Gatson was not there; missed him on a second trip. The third trip he made to see Mr. Gatson at Vandalia was on the day the money was garnished; had never been able to see Mr. Gatson after he sent in the check, and had not seen him before the money was garnished, after he had deposited it in the Vandalia Banking Association. Asked what he wanted to see Mr. Gatson for, witness said that he wanted to figure up with him and go over the weights and things and apply the money in the bank to the rent; pay his rent for the two-fifths of the corn. None of the rent has been paid, neither the corn rent nor the cash rent, except the rent on oats, which he threshed; that had been paid. The oats rent had been settled for with his landlord and is not here involved.) What he has not paid for was two-fifths of the corn and $112.50 cash rent for the grass. "The corn rent was due whenever the corn was disposed of," said the witness. The corn was delivered the latter part of November and the first part of December, 1916. Witness said that he had not given any note for the $112.50.

On cross-examination defendant repeated that he had not sold any corn to any one, except the two Suttons, during the year 1916, from March 1, 1916, to the present time (April 5, 1917). Samuel Sutton had paid him for the corn with a check, which he cashed. It was for $445.00. Out of this he paid his expenses; had kept 421 bushels of corn to feed out and had about 100 bushels left. Asked how he happened to deliver the corn to Samuel and Grover Sutton, witness answered that at the time they were paying a little more out there—feeders were—than was being paid at the railroad; were paying 80 cents a bushel; had gone ahead and sold the corn to them without asking anybody; that he had had a talk with Mr. Gatson and he had told him to go ahead and deliver the corn; never said for him to sell it and collect for it, but that if he could sell it out there for as much or more than at the railroad, to do so. Gatson did not tell him to go ahead and deliver the corn to either Grover or Samuel Sutton. His understanding was that Gatson told him to go ahead and deliver the corn to anybody he could sell it to out there who would pay as much or more than he could get at the railroad; that was his understanding; could not say exactly when he collected from Grover Sutton for the corn he had delivered to him; but he had deposited the check for $1,206.80, received for it, December 7th; judged that he had received it two or three days before. He had deposited this check in the Vandalia Bank, as well as a check given him by a man named McClardy for rent of a house and ten acres of ground on the Curtley farm. That check was for $50.00. Witness testified that he deposited the checks with the Vandalia Banking Association to his own credit and checked on them himself. He testified as to the deposits that he had made with the Vandalia Banking Association from November 1st, when his balance was $33.35, down to the time of the deposit April 3, 1917, depositing $1,256.80 December 8, 1916. (This included the Grover Sutton check for $1,206.80 and the McClardy check for $50.00.) The money he received from Grover Sutton was evidenced by the check for $1,206.80, which he sent to the Vandalia Banking Association by mail. Asked by the court why he had not deposited the money in the Farmers & Merchants Bank, witness answered that he always did business at the Vandalia Banking Association and his check was on that institution and he sent it to them. At that time the Farmers & Merchants Bank of Vandalia was not actively engaged in banking business. Asked if that was the reason he did not send it to the Farmers & Merchants Bank, or if it was because he was doing business at the Vandalia Banking Association, witness answered that it was both, he supposed; that there was no such bank there at the time as the Farmers & Merchants Bank. There was another bank there but under a different name. The Vandalia Banking Association was where he did business and he felt like that was the place for him to send the check. A part of the corn delivered to Grover Sutton belonged to the Farmers & Merchants Bank of Vandalia, and a part to witness and his brother; hauled enough to pay the rent; "it belonged to the bank; that is we hauled enough to pay our rent;" and owed the interpleader $112.50 cash rent; did not send the Farmers & Merchants Bank of Vandalia the money for its corn but deposited it, together with his own part of it, in the Vandalia Banking Association. Asked by the court if he had consulted with any one connected with the interpleading bank about where he should deliver its part of the corn, witness answered that he had a talk with Mr. Gatson some time before he commenced to gather the corn and told him he thought he would be able to get more money for it out there, that is, close in the neighborhood and from feeders than at the local market, and Gatson told him he could deliver it out there. When he deposited the check in the bank, about the 6th or 8th of December, 1916, he only had about $18.00 to his credit.

Mr. Gatson, sworn in behalf of the interpleader, testified that he was the agent of the Farmers & Merchants Bank in this transaction; that the bank had never been paid anything for the rent except as to the oats; that no part of the corn rent, or any part of the money rent on the pasture had been paid. Asked if he, acting in his capacity as officer and agent of the bank, authorized Hodges at any time to sell and dispose of the corn, objection was made by counsel for plaintiff, overruled, exceptions saved, and witness answered that he did not at any time authorize him to sell it. On cross-examination, asked whether he had given Hodges any directions about where to deliver the corn, he answered that he had not; had given him no directions as to where he should deliver it; had a talk with Hodges about the time he was commencing to gather the corn and he told witness he thought there were some feeders in the neighborhood—mentioned a few of them—that would probably buy the corn and take it at a better price than people at the market, "and for his accommodation I told him if he could do that, and also for our accommodation, if he would get a better price why, to deliver it in the neighborhood." Asked if Hodges had consulted with him about the price, witness said he thought so. Asked if that was before or after the corn was sold, witness answered that he did not know whether or not the corn was ever sold; that he did not know anything about it at all until after the attachment; that there was no price fixed on the corn except that Hodges was to get as good a price as he could at the market, or better, if he could; thought that conversation was before the gathering of the corn and about corn gathering time, which was the latter part of October, 1916.

At the instance of the court Hodges was recalled and questioned by the court. He testified that he had deposited this check which he had received from Grover Sutton the 6th, 7th or 8th of December; that he had mailed the check to the Vandalia Bank. Asked by the court what he had testified to about going down to Vandalia after that, he said that he went down a few days after that—two or three days after the check was sent down; went down to see Mr. Gatson. Asked what he wanted to see Mr. Gatson about, witness said that he wanted to go over the figures with him and apply this on the rent. This was all objected to by plaintiff and exceptions saved. That, said the witness, was for applying the money for two-fifths of the corn. Hodges missed Gatson twice. The third time he went back was the day the garnishment was run against the Vandalia Bank and he found that the money had been attached under the garnishment. Asked why he had not sent the check to Gatson for the amount due on the rent, over objection and exception of plaintiff, as calling for a conclusion and not evidence of any act, word or deed, the witness answered that he went to see Mr. Gatson "and go over the figures" with him, so it would be satisfactory, and he had just mailed the check there and thought it would be all right meaning by "figures" the weight of the corn; had with him the scale tickets showing the weight of the corn and the amount of money that was taken in.

This is the substance of the relevant testimony for the interpleader. On the part of plaintiff, the judgment, the execution, the return of the sheriff, the summons to the garnishee, were introduced in evidence. At the close of all the evidence plaintiff asked the court to declare as a matter of law "that under the pleadings and evidence the plaintiff is entitled to recover and retain out of the funds garnished the full amount of the judgment, interest and costs due him under his judgment against the defendant Hodges, amounting to $565.40." The court refused this, plaintiff excepting and, as before stated, rendered judgment in favor of the interpleader and against the plaintiff and that the interpleader have and recover the sum of $851.35, the net amount deposited by the garnishee. Filing a motion for new trial, as also in arrest, plaintiff has duly appealed.

R. D. Rodgers and J. W. Buffington, both of Mexico, Mo., and Clarence A. Barnes, of St. Louis, for appellant. Gatson & Hollingsworth, of Vandalia, for respondent.

REYNOLDS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] A prominent question presented is as to whether the landlord, interpleader here, by authorizing the defendant to sell the corn in the neighborhood, waived his lien on the corn, which, under the statute (section 7888, Revised Statutes 1909), and in the light of the lease, he had on the crop or its proceeds.

The sale to the Suttons is not attacked. It is not sought to hold them. The effort is to reach the proceeds of the sale.

In Fulkerson v. Lynn, 64 Mo. App. 649, loc. cit. 654, it is said that a lien may be waived in a variety of ways, which do not involve agreement or a consideration. "Thus it may be waived by the landlord consenting to a sale of the property. Dockham v. Parker, 9 Greenl. 137; Cloud v. Needles, 6 Md. 501; Volmer v. Wharton, 34 Ark. 691. We do not say that in all cases of consent to sell, the landlord would, as a matter of law, waive his lien, for the circumstances might rebut the intention, or leave it doubtful." See, also, Wimp v. Early, 104 Mo. App. 85, loc. cit. 89, 78 S. W. 343, 344, in which it is said:

"A landlord may assent orally or by conduct to his tenant selling the crops grown on the leasehold, under circumstances that will release his lien on the crops."

The case of Fulkerson v. Lynn, supra, is cited approvingly in Hayes v. Manning, 263 Mo. 1, loc. cit. 47, 172 S. W. 897, 907, in support of the proposition that the Supreme Court has said, "not once, but many times, that no man is compelled to stand on a right given him by law. * * * Whatever this right may be, he may waive it if he chooses so to do, and without agreement or consideration, and lacking the essentials of an estoppel the waiver may be held to be valid and binding."

In Francis and Hunter v. A. O. U. W., 150 Mo. App. 347, loc. cit. 355, 130 S. W. 500, 501, it is said, also referring to Fulkerson v. Lynn:

"Succinctly stated, a waiver is said to be the intentional abandonment or relinquishment of a known right."

And in Porter v. Loyal Americans, 180 Mo. App. 538, 187 S. W. 578, referring to Fulkerson v. Lynn, it is said that after an examination of the facts in the case, they "refute any idea of waiver, which must be an intentional relinquishment of a right." So that whether, under the circumstances attendant upon this sale of a part of this crop of corn with the consent of the landlord, a relinquishment of the lien of the landlord might be open to question, no lien is claimed as against the purchasers of the corn.

But the question is, had the interpleader, as landlord, a lien on the proceeds, or, passing that, had the interpleader a right to this fund as against Hodges and the creditor of Hodges, appellants here, plaintiff below. In brief, to whom did the fund belong? While this is an action at law, equitable principles may enter into its determination.

It is well settled by abundant authority, that the garnishing creditor can have no higher right against the garnishee himself, absent fraud, than had the defendant in the execution under which the attachment and garnishment were levied. Over and above claiming a lien on this by virtue of the lease, the interpleader denies that the defendant Hodges is the owner of the fund, which was in the hands of the garnishee, and deposited by it in court, and claims that it is the owner.

The testimony of the defendant Hodges tends to show that he regarded this fund, which he had deposited in bank and which was in part the proceeds of part of the corn sold, as the money of the interpleader—as the share due the interpleader as landlord for rentals of the leased land, and that he so deposited it, although in his own name. In other words, according to the testimony of defendant, he had deposited that money in his own bank, in his own name, intending it as for the benefit of the interpleader, his landlord.

In First National Bank of Carthage v. Moss, Bank of Carthage, Garnishee, 80 Mo. App. 408, it was held that the sum there on deposit was in the nature of a trust fund in the hands of the depositor for a specific purpose, and that being the case and it being a valid trust, the fund was not subject to the debts of the trustee, and being personal property the trust may be shown by parol.

In Wheless v. Meyer-Schmid Grocer Co., Garnishee of William Morningstar, 140 Mo. App. 572, loc. cit. 590, 591, 120 S. W. 706, 713, our court held:

"After all, the plaintiff in attachment, upon the garnishment being sustained, succeeds only to the rights of his debtor, the defendant in attachment. It is certain the attaching creditor could stand in no better situation in respect to the fund garnished than his debtor, the defendant in attachment, and if the fund garnished was not owing to the defendant in attachment or had been assigned prior to the garnishment, then the attachment defendant * * * had no rights therein to which plaintiff could succeed. * * * In such circumstances, the defendant in attachment had no property in the indebtedness whatever and no right therein subject to attachment. * * * And * * * this is true, even though the assignment of the indebtedness be an equitable assignment only, for when it is sought to reach upon garnishment a credit of the defendant in attachment, it must be both legally and equitable due to him. In such cases, even though the assignment be equitable only, the court will take notice of it and protect the rights of the assignee"—quoting Drake on Attachments (7th Ed.) 602, 604.

Further along, our court said (140 Mo. App. loc. cit. 591, 120 S. W. 714):

"Indeed, on principle, this must be true, for all that can be seized under execution or by process of garnishment, as in this case, is the right which remains in the assignor and this is nothing more (at least where the assignment is made bona fide as here) than the legal title, subject to the equitable interests of the assignee. And therefore, as no right could be enforced by Morningstar [the judgment debtor] against the Meyer & Schmid Grocer Company after the assignment, none can be enforced by the plaintiff in attachment who succeeds only to the rights of Morningstar."

It is true we have no formal assignment here, but we do have such an acknowledgment by the defendant in the execution, as surely in equity amounts to an assignment; certainly as estops him from claiming the fund. To the same effect is the decision of the Kansas City Court of Appeals in National Live Stock Commission Co. v. Thero et al., 154 Mo. App. 508, 153 S. W. 961.

In Smyth v. Boroff, 156 Mo. App. 18, 135 S. W. 973, it is held that a party cannot subject a fund in a bank to a garnishment, either at law or in equity, unless it is the property of the adverse party, or unless he has rights therein. In Potter v. Conqueror Trust Co., Garnishee, 170 Mo. App. 108, 155 S. W. 80, the Springfield Court of Appeals held that fraud forms an exception to the general rule that the judgment creditor can have no greater rights against the garnishee than did the judgment debtor; and that where it is sought to hold the debtor of a fraudulent grantee for the debt of a fraudulent grantor, garnishment is a proper remedy. In the case at bar, however, there is no suggestion whatever of any fraud in the matter. The judgment debtor, Hodges, has at all times as his testimony shows acknowledged the right of the interpleader, his landlord, to the payment of his proportion of the amount realized on the crop grown on the leased premises, and expressly testifies that the money which he deposited in the Vandalia Bank was the part of the rent money, of the interpleader due him for the crop grown on the premises. As far as the testimony in the case shows, while the defendant in the execution deposited this money in his own bank in his own name, he did it, recognizing the right of the interpleader, as landlord, to that very fund, and made no claim upon it; went to the town in which the bank containing the money was situated for the express purpose of turning it over to the authorized agent and representative of the interpleader. He missed him on two trips and on the third trip, as to which he testified he had gone for the express purpose of accounting to that agent for the rent and turning this money over to him—a third trip made for that same purpose on the day that the garnishment and attachment were run. So it is clear that as between the interpleader and the defendant, the defendant could not possibly claim the fund; and it is equally clear, under the law and the facts in this case, absent all fraud, that the judgment creditor—creditor of the defendant—has no higher right to that fund than had the debtor himself.

[3] It is said that the allowance to the interpleader is too large. This on the theory that no lien should have attached for the $112.50 that was to be paid for rent of the meadow. But that was as much rental as the amount to be paid for the corn and oats, and so it is said in the lease, and was as much the money of the landlord as was the money realized from the sale of the corn.

[4] We have read over the record with reference to the claims of the learned counsel for the appellant, to the admission and exclusion of evidence, more particularly in the admission of evidence, for none that was material and offered by the plaintiff was excluded. While the ruling of the trial judge on some of these questions may be incorrect, we cannot say that it was reversible error. As was said by our court in Griffith v. Gillum, 31 Mo. App. loc. cit. 39:

"But it does not follow that, because the evidence was irrelevant and ought to have been excluded under the plaintiff's objection, the error of admitting it was necessarily prejudicial, so as to require a reversal of the judgment."

That is particularly so where, as here, the trial was before the court without a jury. Finding no reversible error, the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

STEWART v. CHITTICK. (No. 13407.)

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 14, 1920.)

1. Trial \S 250—Broker held not entitled to submission on theory that refusal of owner's wife to sign deed prevented sale.

Where a broker who sued a landowner several times testified that when he contracted for the sale of the land he had notice that the owner's wife would not sign the deed, and negotiated with his purchaser on that basis, and the complaint followed the theory of the testimony, the submission of the case on the hypothesis that when the broker negotiated the sale he did not know the wife would not sign, and that her refusal prevented the sale, was erroneous.

2. Vendor and purchaser \S 186—Vendor must give reasonable opportunity for examination of title.

A vendor cannot demand that a land sale be closed without giving the purchaser a reasonable opportunity for examination of the title.

3. Brokers ⇐88(4)—Whether principal defeated sale by refusing purchaser reasonable time for examination of title for jury.

In an action by a broker for commissions, where the vendor's wife would not sign, and after the vendor had executed the deed and submitted the same to the purchaser it was returned at the vendor's demand, held that, notwithstanding there was evidence that the purchaser declined to accept the deed unless signed by the wife, the question whether the vendor failed to give the purchaser reasonable time for examination of title, and thus prevented consummation of the contract, was under the evidence for the jury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Livingston County; Arch B. Davis, Judge.

"Not to be officially published."

Action by Douglas Stewart against Smith Chittick. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Frank Sheetz, of Chillicothe, for appellant. Joseph Stewart and L. A. Martin, both of Chillicothe, for respondent.

ELLISON, P. J. This action was instituted by plaintiff to recover a commission for selling defendant's farm of 60 acres. The former recovered judgment.

It appears defendant resides in the state of Arizona, and that one Martin was his tenant on the farm; that defendant put the place in plaintiff's hands in December, 1915, for sale at $50 per acre the sale to be made "soon." Afterwards defendant's wife concluded she would not sell and would not sign a deed. Defendant then notified plaintiff of his wife's refusal. Plaintiff negotiated a sale to Martin at $53 per acre.

Plaintiff's account of the transaction is as follows:

"I sold the land to Mr. David Martin and entered into a contract with him at $53 an acre, and so notified Mr. Chittick, and sent a deed for him and his wife to sign, and before that deed was returned a deed was placed on record here from Mrs. Chittick to Smith Chittick, and Mr. Chittick wrote to me that his wife had deeded to him her interest in the land and she would not sign any deed. So I said, 'Well you can sign the deed and send it here and I will take it without her signature;' and I advised Mr. Martin that that could be fixed all right, that I had a mortgage on the place, and that I would just foreclose the mortgage, and in that way get him a good title, as Mrs. Chittick had signed that mortgage. The deed was sent here to Mr. Sheetz [defendant's attorney] and presented to Mr. Martin and myself in my office, and Mr. Martin wanted to have the title examined. He took the abstract, I think, to Mr. Schmitz to have it examined and went home; and afterwards Mr. Sheetz [defendant's attorney] telephoned me that he would have to return it, something of that kind; and, as I understood, the deed was returned, and that is as far as it went."

Before defendant had sent the deed to Mr. Sheetz, signed by himself alone, plaintiff had written to him the following letter:

"In reply to your last letter, you say you want to do what is fair. There is only one thing to do, and that is to sign that deed and send it back here. I sold the land to Mr. Martin and made a contract and sent you the deed. I had your authority to sell it. I had been trying for seven or eight months to induce Mr. Martin to take it, and finally succeeded. Any communication between Mr. Martin and you about the matter does not affect my action. The sooner we get the deed back here the quicker your interest stops on the loan. I am quite sure that no one else would accept your deed signed just by yourself except me. I have talked that phase of the matter over with Mr. Martin and have shown him how I can correct it. Now sign the deed and send it here and let's get this matter closed up without any further talk or delay."

In response to this letter defendant sent the deed to Mr. Sheetz, and he and Martin and plaintiff got together, in the latter's office. Mr. Sheetz had the deed made to Martin in proper form and acknowledged, but the latter would not go any further until he had the title examined and he took the abstract to a Mr. Schmitz. He afterwards refused the deed, and Mr. Sheetz returned the deed to defendant. It is true that Martin testified that Mr. Sheetz returned the deed to plaintiff before Schmitz had time to examine the title, but he wrote plaintiff he would not take land unless the wife signed the deed, and he testified at the trial that he wanted a deed with plaintiff's wife's name to it.

[1] Plaintiff repeated several times in his testimony that, when he contracted with Martin for the sale of the land, he had notice that defendant's wife would not sign the deed, and he negotiated with Martin on that basis, and that he arranged with Martin how he could make the title right by foreclosing the mortgage. Yet plaintiff turned his back on the case made by the evidence, and by instructions submitted to the jury the hypothesis of his not knowing she would not sign. And, notwithstanding his own testimony that he accepted the situation made by the wife's refusal to sign and was to make the sale on the basis of a deed from defendant alone, he submitted the hypothesis that the failure to consummate the sale was because of the wife's refusal. There was no room for such instructions consistently with the case made by the evidence.

And so with the petition. It is there made plain that his case was based on the contract as recognized by the parties that the sale was to be by a deed to be signed by defendant alone. He alleges "that defendant executed a deed to such land to said David Martin on the terms specified in the contract for sale, but refused to deliver the same." The only deed executed by defendant to Martin was the one without his wife's signature.

[2, 3] It is not only clear that plaintiff's instructions were at war with the case made by the evidence and the pleadings, but the case as thus made would have justified the demurrer to the evidence which defendant offered but for the fact that Martin testified that defendant did not give him time to examine the abstract of title before he ordered the deed to be returned to him. Of course, a vendor has not the right to demand that a land sale be closed without giving the purchaser reasonable opportunity for his counsel to examine the title. Whether that was done was a question for the jury. It is true that Martin testified, and so wrote to defendant, that he would not take the land without the wife joining in the deed, but whether he threw up the deal on that account was a question for the jury.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

All concur.

MOSES v. RAWLINS. (No. 15998.)

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. June 8, 1920.)

1. Insurance \S 750, 755(3)—Member not in "good standing" after failure to pay dues; application of overpayment to delinquent dues held not a waiver.

Where by-laws of fraternal benefit organization provided that "a member refusing or neglecting to pay his dues 6 months in advance in full is not in good standing 60 days after the first day of the semiannual period for which the amount is due," a member was not in "good standing" after failure to pay dues within first 60 days of period for which they were due, though the organization had applied an overpayment of assessments in part payment of delinquent dues; the application of overpayment not constituting a waiver of the forfeiture.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Good Standing.]

2. Insurance \S 755(3)—Letter advising member of delinquencies and opportunity for readmission held not a waiver.

Where by-laws of fraternal benefit association provided for readmission of delinquent members or those who forfeit their membership, the writing of letters to delinquent member without knowledge that he had died, advising him of his delinquency and urging him to comply with requirements necessary to readmission, held not a waiver of forfeiture.

3. Insurance \S 755(3)—Retaining of overpayment of assessments not a waiver of forfeiture.

In action on a death benefit certificate, the society, by retaining overpayment of assessments, did not waive forfeiture, where it had tendered back the overpayment.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Rhodes E. Cave, Judge.

"Not to be officially published."

Suit by Polly Moses against O. B. Rawlins, as general secretary and treasurer of a voluntary association known as the Order of Railway Telegraphers. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frederick H. Bacon, of St. Louis, for appellant.

William S. Campbell, of St. Louis, for respondent.

NIPPER, C. This is a suit brought by appellant on a benefit certificate issued to her son, and in which she was named as beneficiary. The petition states the nature of the defendant, and that the certificate was issued on the 21st of February, 1911, and that the deceased, Cleveland Moses, died on the 21st of October of the same year; that the secretary and treasurer is custodian of its funds, and has in his hands sufficient money to pay the certificate. The answer admits the nature of defendant, but denies that deceased performed the conditions required of him in said contract, in that he failed to pay the dues and assessments as required.

The case was tried before the court without a jury, and judgment rendered for the defendant. Appellant, in due time, perfects her appeal, and as grounds for reversal urges that the court rendered judgment for the wrong party and erred in overruling appellant's motion for new trial. At the trial in the court below, after plaintiff introduced the benefit certificate, the following admissions were made by counsel for the respective parties:

"It is admitted that the defendant, O. B. Rawlins, is the grand secretary and treasurer of the voluntary association known as the Order of Railroad Telegraphers, he being the successor of Leon W. Quick; that the head office and place of business of said association is in the city of St. Louis, and the defendant, C. B. Rawlins, as secretary and treasurer of said association is the custodian of its funds. It is admitted that Cleveland Moses, mentioned in plaintiff's petition, died on the 21st of October, 1911, from the effects of accidental injuries, and that after the death of said Cleveland Moses the defendant and mutual benefit department of said Order of Railroad Telegraphers, was duly notified of said death, but that defendant denied all liability under said certificate. It is admitted that the plaintiff is the beneficiary named in said benefit certificate and is the mother of the deceased Cleveland Moses. It is further admitted by the parties that the by-laws of the defendant association are correctly set forth in defendant's amended answer. It is agreed that the constitution of the Order of Railroad Telegraphers, as revised and amended May 8, 1911, may be considered in evidence, and either party at liberty to read therefrom in evidence any part thereof.

"It is admitted that said Cleveland Moses did not pay on the 1st day of July, 1911, $5 dues, and said dues were not paid at any time thereafter. It is admitted that at the time the application of said Cleveland Moses was approved he paid $3.60, which, when applied in payment of his assessments, computed from the 1st day of the month in which he was admitted to the end of the current semiannual period, June 20, 1911, left to the credit of said Cleveland Moses the sum of 60 cents.

"It is further admitted that the only issue in this case is whether or not the defendant waived the payment of said dues or subsequent assessments, or is estopped from claiming a forfeiture because of said nonpayment."

This leaves but one question for this court to determine: Did respondent waive the forfeiture of the policy by retaining the 60 cents overpaid, and is it estopped from claiming a forfeiture? Appellant relies upon the case of Leech v. Order of Railroad Telegraphers, 130 Mo. App. 5, 109 S. W. 811, to sustain the contention which she makes before this court. A careful examination, however, of the case above referred to, reveals the fact that Leech had paid his assessments in advance, and there was no delinquency in any part of his assessments at the time of his death. The holding of the court in that case, so far as a majority of the court concurred, was stated by Judge Goode in these terms:

"In other words, I read the by-laws to mean that a delinquency in both assessments and dues for 60 days will work a forfeiture, or a delinquency in dues alone for 6 months will work a forfeiture."

In that case Leech had paid his assessments in full up to and including the month in which his death occurred, and was delinquent in his dues for about 5 months. Therefore the court properly held that there was no forfeiture.

A portion of section 26 of defendant's by-law reads as follows:

"A member refusing or neglecting to pay his dues 6 months in advance in full is not in good standing 60 days after the first day of the semi-annual period for which the amount is due."

[1] It seems that under defendant's by-laws, at the time the Leech Case was decided the assessments were payable monthly in advance, while the dues were payable semi-annually in advance. It was held in that case that there was no forfeiture, because deceased was not delinquent, or had not failed to pay both the dues and assessments in full, for 60 days. In the case before us, admitting the overpayment of 60 cents and its application to the part payment of dues for the semiannual period from July 1, 1911, to December 31, 1911, we find that on July 1, 1911, deceased did not pay in full, in advance, either his dues or assessments as required, nor were such paid in full by him at any time thereafter prior to his death, which occurred on the 21st of October following. Therefore, at the end of 60 days from July 1, 1911, or for almost 2 months prior to the death of Cleveland Moses, he had been delinquent in the payment of both his dues and assessments, because he had not paid either in full at the time, and would therefore, under the contract of insurance before us, and the ruling of this court in Leech v. Order of Railroad Telegraphers, supra, have forfeited, his insurance, and would not have been in good standing, unless defendant, by some of its acts, had waived such forfeiture and was estopped from claiming such.

Appellant introduced in evidence two letters from the secretary and treasurer of the defendant company and addressed to the deceased, one dated November 20, 1911, the other December 11, 1911. At the time these letters were written, defendant had no knowledge of the death of deceased, because the letters gave the deceased, if living, an opportunity at that time, upon the payment of certain dues and assessments, to continue or be placed in good standing in the order. It is contended by appellant that these letters showed an intention to waive the payment of the delinquent dues and assessments, or that it did not intend to claim any forfeiture on account of such delinquencies; but we do not so construe these letters.

[2] Article 16 of defendant's by-laws provides for the readmission or reinstatement of delinquent members or those who forfeit their membership, and in both letters introduced in evidence, deceased is urged to make the payments of the dues and assessments, in order that he may be in good standing. If the policy in force had made no provisions for reinstatement, then appellant's contention could be upheld, but under the contract of insurance, the insured could be reinstated upon the performance of certain conditions, and the compliance with certain requirements. Therefore the mere fact that letters were addressed to him advising him of his delinquencies is not sufficient evidence of a waiver of the forfeiture. Stiepel v. German American Mutual Life Association, 55 Mo. App. 224.

[3] It is further contended by appellant that respondent retained and still retains the 60 cents, and that in doing so it has waived the forfeiture. In support of this contention, we are cited to Davis v. National Council of K. & L. of S., 196 Mo. App. 485, 196 S. W. 97. However, the law as announced in the case above cited is not applicable to the facts in the case before us, for in the case here defendants did tender back the 60 cents, and we would not be justified in disturbing the judgment of the trial judge, who, sitting as a jury, heard this testimony and rendered judgment for defendants. Pavlick v. Supreme Lodge K. of P., 196 Mo. App. 184, 199 S. W. 442.

Therefore the Commissioner recommends that the judgment of the trial court be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of NIPPER, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

The judgment of the circuit court is accordingly affirmed.

Action by John Cafferata against Dominick Ginnochio. Judgment for plaintiff in the circuit court, on appeal from a justice of the peace, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Chase Morsey, of St. Louis, for appellant.

Frumberg & Russell, of St. Louis, for respondent.

BIGGS, C. Gambling among friends is said to be a prolific destroyer of friendship, as witness: Plaintiff and defendant, Italians by birth, were friends in their native country, which friendship continued in the land of their adoption until interrupted by a gambling transaction, resulting in enmity between them and this lawsuit.

The case is founded on the following statement, omitting caption and signatures, filed in the justice of the peace court:

"To money lost in a gambling transaction by plaintiff to defendant, $375.00."

The cause is founded on section 6623, R. S. 1909, which reads thus:

"Any person who shall lose any money or property at any game or gambling device may recover the same by civil action."

The testimony developed that the transaction referred to in the statement was a bet on a horse race. The plaintiff was victorious below, recovering a judgment for the full amount sued for. Defendant brings the case here, asserting, among other things, that the plaintiff failed to make a case for the jury.

[1, 2] The purpose of the gaming statute, as stated by the Supreme Court in Williams v. Wall, 60 Mo. 318, is to aid the criminal law in punishing gamblers and their colleagues by taking from them the fruits of their wager. As construed in Shropshire v. Glascock, 4 Mo. 536, 31 Am. Dec. 189, horse racing, under section 6623, is gaming within the meaning of that statute. In the case of Swaggard v. Hancock, 25 Mo. App. 596, it was held under this statute that the fact that the defendant acted as an agent for another in making the wager was no defense. So, in the case of Crooks v. McMahon, 48 Mo. App. 48, it was held that money lost in a game of poker may be recovered from the winner in the poker game, though the plaintiff did not lose directly to the winner.

[3] The case as made here by the plaintiff consists alone of his version of the transaction as follows: Plaintiff, in answer to a question as to what occurred on March 25, 1916, testified:

"I got down there on the 25th of March, and he said (referring to defendant), 'John, I have got a good thing;' and he came and talked to me just like that. 'And we will get in and straighten it up; we ain't got no money now.' And I was going to the bank and got a check cashed for $375, and I handed it to him to place it, and he phoned to Pete Baker and Carney, and this horse lost."

On cross-examination the witness further testified:

"Q. What was said? A. He (referring to defendant) came in and he said, 'John, I ain't got the money just now, but I will square up in a little while with you (referring to another transaction);' and he said, 'I have got a good thing, and he will walk in, as the race is fixed;' and I gave him the $375. Q. He was going to bet that money for you on some horse? A. Yes, sir; and he said that he had to have the cash money on account of his losing all that he had; he was broke then. Q. What you did then was you gave him the money to bet for you on a horse? A. Yes, sir."

Under this evidence, it is clear that Caf-ferata did not bet with Ginnochio, but upon Ginnochio's advice with another, and through him as his agent. He turned over to Ginnochio $375 for the purpose of having him place the money on a certain horse. The evidence clearly indicates, not that plaintiff and defendant made a bet on the race, one against the other, but that they went in together, and plaintiff authorized the defendant to make a bet for him with some one else.

It is plain that plaintiff has no cause of action arising under the statute. The evidence did not in any wise support the allegation of the statement to the effect that the plaintiff lost money to the defendant in a gambling transaction. The court should have sustained defendant's demurrer to the evidence, offered at the close of plaintiff's case.

The Commissioner recommends that the judgment be reversed.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of BIGGS, C., is adopted as the opinion of the Court.

The judgment of the circuit court is accordingly reversed.

Action by Milton J. Goldbaum against the Great Eastern Casualty Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Judgment ordered vacated, and new judgment entered on filing of remittitur; otherwise judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

Chase Morsey, of St. Louis, for appellant.
Fordyce, Holliday & White, of St. Louis, for respondent.

NIPPER, C. This is an action to recover on a policy of burglary insurance, which policy had a special rider attached thereto covering a loss of property, when taken by force or violence, not exceeding $1,000 on jewelry, and $50 on money. The petition was in the usual form. The answer admits the issuance of the policy to the plaintiff, and concludes with a general denial. Plaintiff recovered judgment in the court below for $899.85, and defendant appeals.

The policy was issued on the 24th of July, 1916, and on the night of the 21st of September of the same year, while in the city of Springfield, Ill., plaintiff was held up and robbed of a diamond pin, a diamond ring, and $25 in money.

Plaintiff was a salesman for the Universal Film Company, and traveled over the country, distributing films for moving pictures. On the date last above mentioned, he testified he was in the city of Springfield, Ill., on a business trip; that in the afternoon he went from Springfield to Virden, a town a few miles out from Springfield, and engaged a room for the night, as Springfield was crowded with visitors by reason of its being fair week. After calling on some parties in Springfield, he made inquiries as to where he could locate a party named Wycroff, who was conducting a picture show in Springfield. He was directed as to what street car he should take in order to reach the place he desired to go. He got on this street car, which was crowded, and rode as directed to the end of the car line. He made some inquiries again as to how to reach Wycroff's place, and he was told that he would have to walk some four or five blocks from the end of this car line. After walking about two blocks, and while near a vacant lot, he was held up by two men, and robbed. The diamond pin was in his necktie. The ring he had upon his finger. The robbers removed the ring from his finger, and one of them cut away a portion of his necktie with a knife, taking the diamond pin. He notified the police department, as well as the defendant company. He says he notified the defendant by wire at its New York office, and also at the St. Louis office. He then came back to St. Louis. He said that for 15 years he had been investing money in diamonds and selling them again, and was familiar with the value of them. The value of the diamond stud was about $400, and the value of the ring was about $400.

On cross-examination, he testified that he paid $225 or $250 for the ring, and $360 for the stud; that he had given the ring to a Miss Zimmerman, in Memphis, as an engagement ring. Five or 6 years later the engagement was broken. In 1911 he went to Chicago, where he met Miss Zimmerman again. She told him at first she was married; then later admitted she was not married, but was living with a man named Batier. She then told plaintiff that Batier had pawned the ring, and she gave him the pawn ticket, after which he stated:

"Mabel, I will take these out, and any time you see your way clear to give me the two hundred and twelve dollars, I will give you back the ring."

Plaintiff paid the $212 and received the ring. After the robbery he sent a newspaper clipping concerning the same to Miss Zimmerman. She then brought suit against him on a note, and it seems that defendant was served with a notice of garnishment. Plaintiff then wrote defendant's office in New York, or had his attorney do so, telling defendant he was not the Milton J. Goldbaum who was being sued in Chicago.

Witness Davis testified for the plaintiff that he was connected with a jewelry company, and had been engaged in the loan and diamond business for 15 years, and was familiar with the value of diamonds; that from the year 1902 to the year 1917, there had been an increase in value in diamonds of the character described in evidence of 50 per cent. This testimony was objected to by defendant, and was admitted over its objections and exceptions.

Other witnesses testified, corroborating plaintiff as to his statements after the robbery, and as to their actions in detail.

The defendant introduced in evidence the letter written by plaintiff to defendant company, also the testimony of the assistant state's attorney at Springfield and police officers of that city, which tended to show that a few months after the robbery two men were arrested, one of whom made a confession that he had robbed the plaintiff, or was one of the two implicated in said robbery, and that plaintiff refused to swear out a warrant for their arrest, or to go to the jail where they were being held, and identify them, claiming that he did not have the time to spare, and thought it was up to the insurance company.

Plaintiff claimed, however, that the defendant's witnesses would not let him see the parties who were arrested and held in the Springfield jail at the time he visited there and asked to see them.

Appellant contends here: First. That plaintiff was not entitled to recover. Second. That if entitled to recover anything, he was not entitled to recover: (a) $400 for the diamond ring, for the reason that he was not the owner thereof; and that (b) defendant was not liable for any attorney's fees.

The verdict as returned by the jury was for $525 due under the policy, $24.85 interest, no damages, and $350 attorney's fees.

[1] We think the court properly submitted the case to the jury on the question of plaintiff's right to recover, not only for the value of the diamond stud, but also for the value of the ring. There can be no serious contention that there was not sufficient evidence before the jury showing the value of the diamonds in question to be $525. Plaintiff had obtained the return of the ring from Miss Zimmerman. The policy provided that the company would not be liable for loss unless the property belonged to the assured or some member of his immediate family who resided in the assured's premises. It is true he told Miss Zimmerman at the time he obtained the return of the ring from her that, if she would pay him at any time the $212, he would give her back the ring, but she had never paid him this money, and the ring was his, and would remain his unless she had done so; and it would not be necessary for him to resort to any legal procedure in order to vest title in him to the ring, and the question as to whether or not the ring belonged to plaintiff was properly submitted to the jury under the evidence. Robinson v. Pennsylvania Insurance Co., 87 Me. 399, 32 Atl. 996; Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Co. v. Fogelman, 85 Mich. 481; Phoenix Insurance Co. v. Bowdre, 67 Miss. 620, 7 South. 596, 19 Am. St. Rep. 326.

The next assignment of error relied upon by appellant is that there was no evidence justifying the submission to the jury of the question of its liability for vexatious delay and attorney's fees. In support of this, we are cited to Non-Royalty Shoe Co. v. Phoenix Assurance Co., 277 Mo. 399, 210 S. W. 37.

It will be noted, in the case at bar, the jury did not assess the penalty of 10 per cent. for damages, nor was there any affirmative finding by the jury that the refusal to pay was vexatious. And while it was held in the case above cited that there should be a finding of the fact of vexatious refusal to pay the loss before the infliction of either penalty should be permitted to stand, yet it was further said in that opinion (277 Mo. 421, 210 S. W. loc. cit. 42):

"While, as we suggest above, it is technical error to assess one penalty without the other, the error is in favor of defendant and against plaintiff, and defendant may not complain. If the wind is to be tempered to the shorn lamb, however, the lamb ought to be advised that the temperature has risen merely as an act of grace, and not of merit."

[2] However, the only testimony in this record with respect to proof of loss and the demand for payment is the testimony of plaintiff, who stated that after he notified the defendant by wire he was given some papers by defendant's agent in St. Louis to make out his claim with, and that he made out these papers and sent them back to the agent. Plaintiff, nowhere in his testimony, states that he made any demand for the payment of this loss, or, if made, what amount he demanded, nor is there anything in the record, aside from the pleadings, showing a refusal of the company to pay. Therefore we think it was error to submit to the jury the question of defendant's liability for vexatious delay and attorney's fees. Non-Royalty Shoe Co. v. Phoenix Assurance Co., supra; Patterson v. Insurance Co., 174 Mo. App. 37, 160 S. W. 59; Keller v. Insurance Co., 198 Mo. 440, 95 S. W. 903.

In view of the above and foregoing, the commissioner recommends that upon respondent filing a remittitur of $350 within 15 days, the said circuit court be directed to vacate and set aside the judgment rendered herein, and to enter a new judgment herein in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $549.85, with interest from the date of the original judgment; otherwise the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of NIPPER, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

The judgment of the circuit court is accordingly affirmed, upon plaintiff's compliance with the requirements set forth in the above opinion; otherwise the judgment is reversed and remanded.

3. Release ⇨29(2) — Common law abolished with respect to release of one or more joint wrongdoers.

Laws 1915, p. 268, abolished the common law in respect to the release of one or more joint wrongdoers discharging the others.

4. Release ⇨29(2)—Release of joint wrongdoer did not discharge others, where cause of action arose before statute abolished common law.

Where cause of action against joint tortfeasors arose before the enactment of Laws 1915, p. 268, abolishing the common law in respect to release of one or more joint wrongdoers discharging the others, a settlement, release, and discharge of some of the wrongdoers, after the enactment of such law, did not discharge the others.

5. Negligence ⇨138(3)—Instruction held inapplicable.

Where petition in negligence case alleged that incline was dangerous, in that "it was not provided with sufficient or suitable cleats or other footholds, nor with handholds nor railings along the side thereof," an instruction following the allegation of the petition, except that it was that there were "no cleats," was erroneous in part as not being supported by evidence and in part as not being justified by the pleading and evidence, where there was no evidence of "other footholds," and plaintiff testified that there were railings, and the proof was that there were cleats but that they were not sufficient.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1064(4)—Trial ⇨228 (1)—Instruction held in the disjunctive and not conjunctive and prejudicial error.

An instruction submitting question whether an incline was dangerous, in that "it was not provided with sufficient or suitable cleats or other footholds or with handholds or railings along the side thereof," was in the disjunctive and not in the conjunctive, and was prejudicial to defendant, where plaintiff's evidence showed that there were railings and handholds.

7. Appeal and error ⇨1207(3)—Interest how allowed on remittitur.

While ordinarily interest should only be allowed from the date of the new judgment on remittitur, under Rev St. 1909, § 7181, court did not err in rendering judgment for $3,500 with interest from the date of original judgment, where remittitur read: "Upon intimation by the court to the effect that the assessment of damages herein in the sum of $4,400 by the jury is excessive as to the difference between said sum and $3,500 with interest upon the last-named amount from the date of the rendition of the original judgment, February 27, 1919; and that plaintiff should remit said excess, said plaintiff does hereby make and enter such remittitur," etc.—the remittitur not striking off a specific sum, and the original judgment not being reduced to $3,500, but reduced to that sum plus the interest on it from date of the original judgment.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; W. O. Scarritt, Special Judge.

"Not to be officially published."

Action by Sarah J. Start against the National Newspaper Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Frank M. Lowe, of Kansas City, for appellant.

E. H. Gamble and Rader & Rader, all of Kansas City, for respondent.

ELLISON, P. J. Plaintiff's action is for damages resulting from personal injury received by her in falling upon the floor of a building claimed to have been in the possession and occupancy of defendant. There were two other defendants, but for a consideration plaintiff entered into a covenant not to sue and the action was dismissed as to them. There was a verdict against the present defendant for $4,400, but afterwards there was a remittitur bringing the sum down to $3,500 and interest, and judgment was rendered for that amount with 6 per cent. interest from date of the first judgment.

The building concerned is what is known as "Convention Hall," in Kansas City, a place which is let for conventions and for exhibitions of great variety and character. In the instance of this controversy it was let for a space of nearly two weeks for a "Kansas City Land Show." To whom it was let and who gave the show is a matter of dispute. Plaintiff claims that defendant, as owner of the Kansas City Post, a daily newspaper published in that city, rented the building advertised and gave the entertainment, charging 25 cents admission to the public, as well as certain charges to exhibitors. The hall was rented by an agreement in writing, beginning with:

"This agreement made and entered into by and between the Kansas City Convention Hall Building Company, party of the first part, and the Kansas City Post, party of the second part."

After prescribing the various terms of the renting, providing for the show, etc., the paper is signed:

"Kansas City Convention Hall Building Company, by Louis W. Shouse, Secy." "Kansas City Post, by J. Dek. Towner, Secy. & Treas."

There are two points of defense stated by defendant at the outset; one is that the defendant, National Newspaper Association, was not in possession or control of Convention Hall at the time plaintiff was injured. But the evidence is abundant that it was. It is true that the contract renting the hall was signed by the Kansas City Post, per Towner, as secretary and treasurer. But he was secretary and treasurer of the defendant association and it was the owner and publisher of the Kansas City Post. So far as the land show was concerned, the Post and this defendant were one. It was advertised as the Post's enterprise, but all the bills were paid by defendant and the large income, consisting of sums received from exhibitors and door receipts, went to the defendant. It was shown that one Buckley was the personal manager of the show, hired, put in charge, and paid by defendant.

[1] But it is strongly insisted that "the lease of Convention Hall signed by Towner, secretary and treasurer of the National Newspaper Association, is ultra vires and absolutely void," and Millinery Co. v. Trust Co., 251 Mo. 553, 158 S. W. 859, and Orpheum Theater Co. v. Brokerage Co., 197 Mo. App. 661, 199 S. W. 257, are cited in support of the point. Those cases involved liability on matters of contract, while the case before us is one in tort, in which ultra vires is not a defense. Alexander v. Relfe, 74 Mo. 495, 517.

[2] It is next claimed that there was no evidence that Towner, secretary and treasurer of the defendant, newspaper association, had authority from the board of directors to execute the contract renting Convention Hall. There was no direct evidence showing that the directors ever ordered the contract of renting be made, but it was shown, and not disputed, that Towner was the resident official of this association and received the moneys of the association, and the president of the association knew of the show and gave directions in regard thereto, and that he gave Towner orders with respect to handling the expenses and receipts derived from the show, and that the large sum of money received as proceeds of the show were paid to the association. Besides this, Towner testified that he had general direction from the president of the association:

"That Mr. Buckley was going to run the land show and that I should do all in my power to help him do it, and I had my instructions that we should advance Mr. Buckley—help him at the start, and then I was to take over the receipts of the land show as they came in."

It was further shown that Buckley's salary was paid with checks of the defendant association by direction of the president. It was further shown that the rental contract with Convention Hall was carried out by defendant association, the rent being paid by it. We think this showing is evidence sufficient to bind the corporation without a formal express sanction of the board of directors.

[3] As stated at the beginning, there were two other defendants claimed in the petition to be joint wrongdoers, and on settlement plaintiff covenanted not to sue them and the action was dismissed as to them. Defendant insists that plaintiff did not merely covenant not to sue them but that she, in fact, settled her claim and discharged them, which, under the common law, also operated as a discharge of this defendant. If we concede that the paper entitled a covenant not to sue was in fact a release of the other wrongdoers, it will not avail defendant, for the reason that by the Laws of 1915, p. 268, the common law was abolished in respect to the release of one or more joint wrongdoers discharging the others. It reads as follows:

"It shall be lawful for all persons having a claim or cause of action against two or more joint tort-feasors or wrongdoers to compound, settle with, and discharge any and every one or more of said joint tort-feasors or wrongdoers for such sum as such person or persons may see fit, and to release him or them from all further liability to such person or persons for such tort or wrong, without impairing the right of such person or persons to demand and collect the balance of said claim or cause of action from the other joint tort-feasors or wrongdoers against whom such person or persons has such claim or cause of action, and not so released."

[4] It is true that this cause of action arose before the enactment of that law, but the settlement with the other wrongdoers was not had until more than two years after the Legislature had acted. In thus applying the law we are not giving it retrospective force (Abbott v. Mining Co., 255 Mo. 378, 164 S. W. 568; Gibson v. Railway Co., 225 Mo. 473, 125 S. W. 453; Clark v. Railway Co., 219 Mo. 524, 118 S. W. 40), and this is recognized in Clark v. Union Elec. Co., 213 S. W. 851.

Defendant's objection to plaintiff's instruction No. 2 is well taken. It is charged in the petition that in the arrangement of the hall for the show there was a steep temporary wooden incline running from a temporary wooden floor, up and down which those attending the show traveled; that this incline was dangerous, in that "it was not provided with sufficient or suitable cleats or other footholds, nor with handholds nor railings along the side thereof," and that at the bottom of the incline there was a hole in the wooden floor; that plaintiff, in descending the incline, near the bottom, and on account of its dangerous condition, slipped and the heel of her shoe caught in the hole and she fell and was injured.

[5] The instruction followed the allegation of the petition, except in the use of the word "or" handhold instead of "nor" handhold. That was immaterial. But there was no evidence of "other footholds" than cleating, and such character of footholds should therefore not have been included in the instruction as one of the issues. So the instruction submitted the hypothesis of negligence, in that there were no railings along the side of the incline, when the evidence in plaintiff's behalf showed there were railings, and there was no evidence that there were not. So the instruction submitted the hypothesis of negligence in not providing the incline with cleats, while the negligence alleged in the petition is that it was not "provided with sufficient or suitable cleats." The instruction is that there were no cleats, whereas the pleading and proof were that there were cleats but they were not sufficient. So therefore we rule the instruction erroneous, in that it in part was without supporting evidence and in part was not justified by the pleading and evidence. Huff v. Railroad, 222 Mo. 286, 303, 121 S. W. 120; State ex rel. Coal Co. v. Ellison, 270 Mo. 645, 653, 195 S. W. 722; Degonia v. Railroad, 224 Mo. 564, 589, 123 S. W. 807; Sparkman v. Railroad, 191 Mo. App. 463, 469, 177 S. W. 708; Lord v. Delano, 188 S. W. 93, 95.

[6] Plaintiff seeks to avoid this point by the claim that the instruction was in the conjunctive and only put an additional burden on her. The instruction was in the disjunctive. She likens her case to those of that character and cites Rigg v. Railroad, 212 S. W. 878, Blair v. Union Light Co., 213 S. W. 976, and Meeker v. Union Light Co., 216 S. W. 923. But it is readily seen that those cases are not analogous.

The original judgment was rendered on the verdict on the 27th of February, 1919, for $4,400. The case was then continued over on motion for new trial until the following September 12th, when a remittitur was entered reducing it to $3,500 and interest from date of the original judgment, and the latter set aside and in lieu thereof a new judgment, in the sum of $3,500 with interest from the date of the original judgment, to wit, 27th of February, 1919.

[7] Ordinarily interest should only be allowed from the date of the new judgment on the remittitur. The original judgment becomes a nullity, and the judgment rendered on the sum remaining after subtracting the remittitur becomes the judgment, and interest should only be allowed "from the day of rendering the same." Section 7181, R. S. 1909; Erwin v. Jones, 191 S. W. 1047; Sculin v. Railroad, 192 Mo. 6, 90 S. W. 1028; State ex rel. v. Broadus, 212 Mo. 685, 111 S. W. 508; Stolze v. Transit Co., 122 Mo. App. 458, 99 S. W. 471. But the remittitur involved here is somewhat peculiar. It reads as follows:

"Upon intimation by the court to the effect that the assessment of damages herein in the sum of $4,400 by the jury is excessive as to the difference between said sum and $3,500 with interest upon the last-named amount from the date of the rendition of the original judgment, February 27, 1919, and that plaintiff should remit said excess, said plaintiff does hereby make and enter such remittitur, and moves the court to set aside said original judgment in this cause and enter a new judgment in her favor for the sum of $3,500 with interest as aforesaid from the date of said original judgment."

It does not strike off a specific sum, but only such amount as is "the difference between the verdict of $4,400 and the sum of $3,500 with interest upon the latter amount from the date of the original judgment." In other words, plaintiff did not reduce the original judgment to $3,500, but reduced it to that sum plus the interest on it from the date of the original judgment, and so the new judgment was rendered, and we think properly. It would have been less involved if the interest on $3,500 had been calculated down to the day of the new judgment and added to that sum and the new judgment entered accordingly.

The judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded.

All concur.

CADELL v. CADELL. (No. 13225.)

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 14, 1920.)

1. Divorce \Leftrightarrow 180 — Wife's appeal from divorce decree not to be dismissed because of husband's subsequent death.

In wife's suit for divorce, wherein defendant husband filed cross-bill and secured decree, appeal taken by plaintiff wife will not be dismissed on account of subsequent death of defendant husband, property rights of wife requiring that divorce be set aside if erroneously adjudged.

2. Divorce \Leftrightarrow 130—Husband held not entitled to decree.

In a wife's suit for divorce, defendant husband, who had seduced her during the lifetime of his first wife, and had married her after his first wife's death, held not entitled to decree, in view of the evidence.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Livingston County; Arch B. Davis, Judge.

Action for divorce by Margaret Caddell against George W. Caddell, wherein defendant filed cross-bill. From decree for defendant on the cross-bill, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Thos. H. Hicklin and Scott J. Miller, both of Chillicothe, for appellant.

W. W. Davis, of Chillicothe, for respondent.

ELLISON, P. J. This action was instituted by plaintiff for divorce. Defendant filed a cross-bill. A decree was rendered for him on the cross-bill. Plaintiff appealed to this court.

After the appeal was taken defendant died, and the cause was revived against the administrator of his estate, and it is suggested that as defendant has died, the action being for divorce, nothing can be done save to dismiss the appeal.

[1] It appears that defendant was possessed of property, in which instance justice requires that the case be heard, not as regards the mere dissolving the relation of husband and wife, for death has done that, but that the plaintiff, if she has had a divorce adjudged against her erroneously, may have such adjudication set aside to the end that she may assert a widow's claim in his estate which, if the judgment stands unreversed, she could not do. It requires but a moment's reflection to see the rank injustice which might be done an innocent woman. The death of her husband ought not, ipso facto, to deprive her of her legal rights.

In Danforth v. Danforth, 111 Ill. 236, 243, the Supreme Court of Illinois said:

"It is claimed that the death of either party puts an end to all further legal proceedings. This is true where the death takes place before any final decree of divorce. Ewald v. Corbett, 32 Cal. 493; Swan v. Harrison, 2 Coldw. 534; Pearson v. Darrington, 32 Ala. 227. But where a decree of divorce has been improperly obtained, and the proceedings are erroneous, the party whose property rights have been injuriously affected by such decree ought not to be concluded by reason of the subsequent death of the other party. While both parties live, a writ of error lies to reverse an erroneous decree of divorce, the effect of which is to restore both parties to their former status of husband and wife, in law, and after the death of one it ought to lie in favor of the other party not for the same purpose, but to restore the survivor to his or her rights of property divested erroneously by the decree. On the reversal of a decree of divorce, the parties will be placed in the position they occupied before the decree was entered, and if one of them has died between the date of the decree of divorce and its reversal, the survivor procuring the reversal will be entitled to all rights of succession or dower, and the like, in the estate of the other, the same as if no divorce had ever been had; but in such case the court need not ordinarily remand the case, as no other decree of divorce can ever be had."

And so the law is declared in Strickland v. Strickland, 80 Ark. 451, 97 S. W. 659, Nickerson v. Nickerson, 34 Or. 1, 48 Pac. 423, 54 Pac. 277, and Thomas v. Thomas, 57 Md. 504. To the same effect is 1 Corpus Juris, 208, § 404; Id. 171, § 289.

We have examined the evidence in the case, and find that the decree cannot be sustained. It appears: That plaintiff was defendant's second wife. That before the death of his first wife he employed plaintiff (who was then 19 years old) as his stenographer in his office, and that shortly thereafter he began illicit relations with her, promising to marry her when his wife died; the latter's health not then being good. As a result of this intercourse, she gave birth to a child, still living. That defendant's wife having died in the meantime, he and plaintiff were married. They soon fell into disagreements, and each used gross language towards the other. She accused him of attentions to other women. And he accused her, not directly, with adultery, but with improper conduct, especially with a certain "drunk man." His charges appear to be without foundation. He concedes plaintiff to be a good woman but for the influence of her mother. But at the same time he cast an aspersion on her by saying "it might be my child, but I don't know whether it is or not." But he testified to the following on cross-examination:

"I married her after the birth of the child. The reason I married this girl, we done wrong, me and her, while she was working in our jitney office, and we talked this over, and I said we could rectify this—a man will never do a wrong if he has the right kind of a heart in him without rectifying it—and I married the woman because we done wrong and because I loved her, in my first wife's lifetime. October 10, 1917, was about the time of our marriage. If I ever got along with her a week I have known her 10,000 years to my knowledge. She is the best woman living to-day when she is a good woman. Jealousy of me is the most of the trouble."

As we have said, he made accusations of infidelity against her, but he was also abusive in other ways. At one time, in answer to a vile name she called him, he said, "If you were a man, I would cut your liver out and wash your face with it."

[2] There was other evidence which need not be gone over in detail. Suffice it to say that we think defendant was not entitled to a decree of divorce, and that it should be reversed.

In view of the fact that defendant died after the decree was rendered and during the pendency of plaintiff's appeal, it is not necessary to decide whether she should have had a decree on her petition; for whether she should or not, defendant not having been entitled to one in his favor, our reversal of that decree leaves her and her rights unaffected by it.

The judgment is reversed.
All concur.

BRINGHURST v. BRINGHURST. (No. 17006.)

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Submitted on Briefs May 11, 1920. Opinion Filed June 8, 1920.)

I. Divorce \S 303(3)—Reputation of mother of divorced wife seeking to modify decree as to custody of child immaterial.

On application by a divorced wife for modification of the decree as to the custody of the child, testimony that the wife's mother was not a woman of good reputation was inadmissible, in the absence of showing that there would be any association between mother and daughter when the child was with the latter.

2. Appeal and error \S 205—Party offering testimony should set it forth as basis for ruling by appellate court.

The party offering testimony should set forth what it will be if the witness is permitted to testify; otherwise the appellate court cannot say whether the evidence is admissible, or, if so, whether its exclusion will work reversal.

3. Trial \S 45(1)—Offer of proof must be specific.

An offer of proof must be specific and definite.

4. Divorce \S 303(3)—Evidence held to warrant modification of decree as to custody of child.

Evidence held to warrant the action of the trial court in modifying decree of divorce in favor of a husband at the instance of the wife to permit her to have custody of the child of the parties for five specified weeks in each year, thus making definite the indefinite requirements of the first order as to custody that the husband permit the wife to see the child.

Error to St. Louis Circuit Court; Victor H. Falkenhainer, Judge.

"Not to be officially published."

Suit for divorce by Robert Bringhurst against Daisy Bringhurst wherein decree for plaintiff was entered, which defendant moved to modify in so far as relating to the custody of the child. To review judgment modifying decree in such respect, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Curlee & Hay, of St. Louis, for plaintiff in error.

Abbott, Fauntleroy, Cullen & Edwards, of St. Louis, for defendant in error.

REYNOLDS, P. J. On June 10, 1918, by decree of the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, plaintiff in error, but who will hereafter be designated as plaintiff, was granted a decree of divorce against his then wife, now defendant in error but who will hereafter be referred to as defendant. The ground of the divorce was desertion of the husband by the wife, without cause. In rendering the decree the circuit court granted the custody of the minor child born of the marriage, a boy then about six years old, to the husband, the decree, however, containing this proviso:

"With the privilege to defendant to visit said child for a period of one week in each three months, and also at any time said child may happen to be seriously ill, plaintiff agreeing to notify defendant of such illness promptly should such event occur."

There was also a clause, unnecessarily inserted, that the court retained jurisdiction of the cause "for the purpose of making further orders respecting the custody of said child should it become necessary or proper to do so."

The provision permitting the defendant to visit the child for a period of one week in each three months does not seem to have been satisfactorily carried out. After the divorce the defendant remarried and so did the plaintiff, and the child for a time was at plaintiff's home in St. Louis, where the second wife and a child born of the second marriage resided; but a short time after the divorce, plaintiff's mother came and lived with him for a time and then took the child to her home in Litchfield, Illinois, there residing with her husband and the boy until the death of the former, a short time before the trial of the motion now before us, the father providing for his clothing and maintenance and visiting him at least every two weeks. Defendant, on her remarriage, resided with her second husband at Carterville, Illinois. It appears that plaintiff, in the course of his employment, moved to New Orleans, Louisiana, taking his wife, the child born of the second marriage, and this boy, now some 9 or 10 years old, with him and now resides there. On September 8, 1919, defendant filed, in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, a motion to modify the decree theretofore rendered, so far as related to the custody of the child. In this motion it is set out that at all times since June 10, 1918, and until plaintiff took the child from the state of Missouri, he had refused to allow defendant to see him at any place other than in the flat in which plaintiff and his second wife resided, and refused to permit defendant to see her child except in the company of himself and his wife; that she had repeatedly, from the date of the adjudication of the divorce to the time of the removal by plaintiff of the boy from the state of Missouri to New Orleans, tried both through plaintiff and his attorney to see the child and to have plaintiff bring the child to some proper place in St. Louis where she could see him, other than the home occupied by plaintiff and his second wife, but plaintiff at all times declined and refused to allow plaintiff to see the child; that while she had sent the child a present at Christmas, the plaintiff declined to allow the child to receive it and returned the present to the defendant unopened, and has at all times prevented defendant from having communication with the child prior to the time and within the last few weeks when plaintiff removed the child from the state of Missouri; that since her divorce from plaintiff, defendant had married one Dowell, with whom she is living as wife at Carterville, and that he is ready and willing and amply able to support the child adequately and to maintain, clothe and educate him; that they have a comfortable home where defendant can support, maintain and educate the child and look after his moral and physical welfare. The premises considered and because of the abuse, as defendant says, by plaintiff of his right to the custody of the child, and because of the age of the child, she avers his welfare will be best supervised by being in the care and custody and supervision of defendant as his mother, she moves the court to modify the order of June 10, 1918, heretofore set forth with reference to the custody of the child, and to award the custody of it to her, the defendant.

A hearing was had on this motion before the court and a judgment entered to the effect that the custody of the child remain in plaintiff, "defendant to have the custody of said child each year for a period of five weeks, as follows: From December 26th to and including January 2d, and from July 1st to 31st, both dates inclusive. Plaintiff to permit defendant to call for said child in Litchfield, Illinois, and without molestation or interference to take the child to her home in Carterville, Illinois, to remain there for the periods above designated, after which the defendant is to return the child to the custody of plaintiff at Litchfield, Illinois, all of which to be at the cost of defendant, should the child be in the custody of the mother of plaintiff by and with plaintiff's consent, plaintiff is nevertheless held personally responsible for the full performance of this decree."

A motion for new trial was duly filed by plaintiff, overruled, exceptions saved and the cause brought to our court on writ of error.

We have read all of the testimony in the case and see no reason to disturb the finding of the learned trial court. There is some conflict, but not very much; with few exceptions on immaterial matters, there is no conflict; and the evidence tended to sustain the allegations of the motion as to the exclusion of defendant from access to her son under the first order.

The assignments of error by learned counsel for plaintiff are two; first, error of the trial court in excluding evidence offered by plaintiff tending to prove that defendant's mother, who lives in the same town with defendant, and who, it is charged, must be presumed to associate with the defendant and with the child, if in the custody of defendant, is a woman of bad repute.

The second assignment is to the alleged error of the court in modifying the decree.

The first assignment is untenable. While a witness in behalf of defendant was under cross-examination by counsel for plaintiff, he was asked if he knew defendant's mother. He said that he did. Counsel then asked witness if he knew her general reputation for virtue and chastity in the community. That was objected to. The court sustained the objection, stating, however, that he did so unless counsel for plaintiff showed that the defendant "intends or has her mother under her charge and that the same association would be in the home." Whereupon counsel made this statement:

"I offer to show by this witness that the reputation of Mrs. B. (mother of defendant)—I will say this, your Honor: I ask for an answer to this question upon this theory: From my information, I wish to inquire of this witness, is it not true that the reputation of the mother of the defendant for virtue and chastity is not good? My theory of that is this: I do not claim I shall be able to show it is the intention to keep her in the same home with the defendant, but having shown the relationship of mother and daughter and that they will be in the same town, that the unavoidable result would be the associations of the home on the child."

Mr. Edwards: "We object to that."

The Court: "Objection sustained. That is a far-fetched proposition, Mr. Hay, I take it. I don't believe you have a right to infer that there will be any association there, unless you can show that there has been some association and that it will continue, and the Court may then find that."

Mr. Hay: "From my own mental operation I cannot infer anything else. I can't control any other inference but my own. That is all. We except."

[1-3] We see no error in this ruling of the learned trial court. At best, as remarked by the court, it was rather "a far-fetched proposition," and one from which the inference was sought to be drawn that there would be any association between the mother and daughter, unless it was shown that there now was such association and that it would continue. No such offer of testimony was made. The mere relation of mother and daughter does not necessarily carry with it the implication that there will be an intimate association between them, even assuming that the reputation of the mother of defendant was bad and that the daughter, whose reputation was proved by incontrovertible testimony to be very good, would associate with her or bring the boy into contact with her or under her influence. Moreover, this offer does not fall within the rule frequently announced by our courts, Supreme and Appellate, that the party offering testimony should set forth what the testimony would be if the witness is permitted to testify on the point, and unless that is done the appellate court is unable to say that the evidence which it is desired to offer is admissible, or whether, if admissible, its materiality is such that its exclusion would work a reversal of the judgment in the case. An offer to prove must be specific and definite. Linstroth et ux. v. Peper, not yet officially reported, but see 218 S. W. 431, loc. cit. 435, and authorities there cited.

[4] As to the second proposition, as before said, we think that the action of the trial court in modifying the decree in the manner in which it did, was warranted by the evidence in the case. It made that definite which before had been rather indefinite in the first order. The evidence tended to show that defendant bore an excellent reputation in the town in which she resides with her present husband; that the latter is amply able to provide for the child while it is with the mother and is willing to do so. Defendant is the mother, and with the good character which it has been proved she has, there is no reason why she should not have the society of her child during the limited period fixed by the court, which is not unreasonable as to time or duration. The learned trial court, with the witnesses before him, had ample opportunity to determine the weight to be given them by their demeanor and, particularly as far as the defendant is concerned, to determine her fitness to have the custody and society of her child during this period, and we have no reason to criticize or depart from his action.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

1. Corporations \S 432(12)—Evidence held to show secretary's authority to issue checks to himself.

In an action to recover from defendant the amount of checks of plaintiff corporation drawn by its secretary in favor of himself and indorsed to defendant in payment of his personal debts, evidence held to support secretary's authority to issue such checks.

2. Appeal and error \S 931(6)—Whether court considered evidence admitted subject to objection held not determinable.

In an action by corporation to recover money paid on plaintiff's checks, issued by its secretary manager to himself and indorsed to defendant, where the trial was to the court, it cannot be said whether he considered at all, in arriving at his conclusion, a certificate showing that such secretary manager had such authority with reference to plaintiff's deposits in another bank, objected to on the grounds that it did not affect the payee bank and was not known to defendant and admitted subject to objection.

3. Appeal and error \S 1010(1) — Finding of fact, sustained by substantial evidence, conclusive.

Finding of fact by trial court sustained by substantial evidence is conclusive on court of appeals.

4. Corporations \Leftrightarrow 425(3)—Knowledge of habit of officer in drawing checks to himself held to preclude objection by corporation.

Where plaintiff corporation had permitted its secretary to draw checks payable to himself for a number of years, and some of these checks had been indorsed by him to defendant to pay his debts, which plaintiff must have known, plaintiff cannot recover therefor from defendant.

5. Corporations \Leftrightarrow 425(4)—Established practice avoids rule that checks drawn by officer for his private business are invalid.

The rule that checks drawn by an officer of a corporation for his own private business are invalid is without application, where an officer was allowed for years to draw the company's checks for his salary and indorse these to others in payment of his debts.

6. Corporations \Leftrightarrow 432(6)—Certificate showing officer's authority to draw checks held competent.

In a corporation's action to recover from defendant money paid by depositary upon corporation's checks drawn by its officer to himself and indorsed to defendant, a certificate of the corporation, showing such officer's authority to draw checks, was competent and admissible.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Rhodes E. Cave, Judge.

Action by the Napoleon Hill Cotton Company against the H. Oetter Grocery Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. R. Boyd, of Memphis, Tenn., and W. M. Fitch and Homer Hall, both of St. Louis, for appellant.

Taylor R. Young, of St. Louis, and T. T. Hinde, of Madison, Ill., for respondent.

REYNOLDS, P. J. The petition in this case, after averring the incorporation of plaintiff and defendant, for the first cause of action avers that on February 11, 1911, defendant received a check of plaintiff for the sum of $225.00, drawn in the name of plaintiff on the Boatmen's Bank, to the order of one R. W. Upshaw, by him indorsed in blank and delivered to the defendant indorsed by the latter to the Mercantile Trust Company of St. Louis and paid by the Boatmen's Bank on February 13, 1911. Averring that the plaintiff at the date of the draft or check, was not indebted to R. W. Upshaw in any sum whatever, and that defendant received a check for the money on that date and is indebted to plaintiff in that sum as money had and received by it, judgment is prayed for the amount of that check and interest from February 11, 1911.

The second cause of action is on a check of plaintiff, dated June 28, 1912, drawn by Upshaw and to his order, for the sum of $225.00, and put through bank and collected by defendant, it being averred that plaintiff was not indebted to the defendant on the date of the check in any sum whatever. Interest is also prayed on this from July 31, 1911.

The third count is on a check in the name of plaintiff, of date December 16, 1912, for $241.00, payable to R. W. Upshaw and signed by him as secretary and manager of plaintiff. Averring that it was not indebted to R. W. Upshaw in any sum whatever, and that defendant received the money to the use of plaintiff and was indebted to it for that sum, judgment is prayed for that and for interest from February 1, 1912.

The answer, admitting the incorporation of the parties, sets up that plaintiff is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Missouri, with a capital stock of $250,000, with all of its stock, except 50 shares owned by the heirs of Napoleon Hill and Noland Fontaine; that Hill and Fontaine and their heirs were and are residents of Memphis, Tennessee, residing there, and that the business and office of the plaintiff company was and is in St. Louis, Missouri, and at the time these checks referred to were issued, was under the sole control, management and charge of R. W. Upshaw, who was the owner of 50 shares of stock in the corporation and its secretary and treasurer; that the corporation was organized as a matter of convenience for the parties, but that the corporate forms were seldom observed and the business and assets of the company were treated as if belonging to a partnership, the stockholders drawing from the treasury of the corporation such funds as they might from time to time need for their purposes; that Upshaw, secretary and treasurer of the corporation, was authorized by the stockholders and directors, both generally and specially, and by acquiescence in long custom, to deal with the assets and bank account of the corporation as he saw fit; that in pursuance of such authority, Upshaw was authorized to and did execute notes, checks and other instruments of various kinds and character on behalf of the corporation, and had authority and did issue checks for his own personal use on the bank account of plaintiff; that Upshaw was to receive a salary of $3,600 per annum for his services, which he paid himself from time to time by issuing checks for his personal use upon the bank account of plaintiff; that the stockholders of the plaintiff company knew of this fact, and authorized Upshaw to make payments to himself in this manner; that Upshaw and other stockholders in the corporation from time to time, for their own purposes, drew upon the treasury of the corporation, and there was carried overdrafts upon the books of the plaintiff charged against various stockholders, which practice was well known to the stockholders of the corporation and approved and authorized by them; that after twenty years the Fontaine and Hill interests in the company became dissatisfied with the management of Upshaw, claiming that he had abused the privileges conferred upon him by the stockholders and the board of directors of the corporation and had overdrawn his account largely in excess of the amount they had expected and in excess of what they believed to be due for his salary and other obligations due from the company or the stockholders thereof to Upshaw; that knowledge came to the Fontaine and Hill interests of the alleged breach of trust on the part of Upshaw in the year 1912, at which time they caused some investigation to be made, and subsequently, in the latter part of 1913 and the early part of 1914, the stockholders of plaintiff company made a further investigation of the books and records of the company and became possessed of all the facts with reference to the dealings of Upshaw with the company and with other stockholders therein, and that with the knowledge that Upshaw had not properly kept his books and had falsified his accounts, the plaintiff company continued Upshaw in their employ, and on June 5, 1915, for the purpose of settling the differences and adjusting all matters between Upshaw and plaintiff company, the stockholders in the company, through their board of directors, accepted 50 shares of stock in plaintiff company, then belonging to Upshaw, in full satisfaction and settlement of the over draft shown on the books of the plaintiff company against Upshaw; that the stock of Upshaw in plaintiff company represented the total assets of Upshaw; that plaintiff and its stockholders, Fontaine and Hill, appropriated to themselves all of the assets of Upshaw for the purpose of liquidating the obligations of Upshaw to the company, and in so doing deprived the other creditors of Upshaw of the benefit of his assets; that at the time of this appropriation plaintiff company had actual knowledge of all the facts with reference to Upshaw's alleged defalcations, and that he had issued the checks to the defendant described in plaintiff's petition; that these checks were issued by Upshaw in payment of his personal obligations for groceries furnished him by defendant for family use, and that defendant believes and has reason to believe that these checks were a part of the thirty-six-hundred-dollar salary of Upshaw, and that the primary liability to defendant on account of the issuance of these checks, if they were in excess of the salary, is that of Upshaw, and if Upshaw had exceeded the amount due him from plaintiff, then defendant was entitled to participate in the assets of Upshaw, represented by the 50 shares of stock which plaintiff and its stockholders appropriated for their own purposes, and which said stockholders now hold as beneficiaries thereof; that defendant had no knowledge of the alleged defalcation of Upshaw until December 9, 1915, at which time plaintiff notified it, making a demand upon defendant for the payment of the money received under the three checks; that had defendant been informed of the situation promptly and at the time the knowledge of it first reached Fontaine and Hill and plaintiff company, that Upshaw was then alive and defendant could have participated in his assets, which were appropriated by plaintiff and its stockholders, and could have protected itself by recourse against Upshaw; that since the institution of this action Upshaw has died, and by reason of plaintiff company failing to notify defendant of the alleged defalcations of Upshaw and its claim against Upshaw as soon as plaintiff had knowledge of the same, defendant is precluded and has been precluded from protecting itself against Upshaw; that in equity and good conscience plaintiff herein and its chief stockholders, Fontaine and Hill, should not be permitted to create a condition whereby Upshaw, as their agent and representative, could for a long period of time issue checks upon plaintiff's account under direct authority and permission and with the consent and knowledge of plaintiff and its stockholders, which checks were received current in the city of St. Louis for the payment of the personal obligations of Upshaw, and upon Upshaw proving false to his trust be allowed to appropriate for their own use and benefit the only assets which Upshaw possessed, without promptly notifying defendant and other creditors of Upshaw of his defalcations as soon as they became possessed of the knowledge, and thereby enable this defendant to pursue its recourse against Upshaw; that plaintiff and its stockholders by their conduct in dealing with this defendant, and with the assets of Upshaw, are in equity and good conscience estopped from asserting any rights against defendant on account of the checks described in plaintiff's petition; that although as set out in plaintiff's petition, the checks were paid at or about the time of their issue, no objection was made to the issuance and delivery of the checks until on or about December 9, 1915; that the defendant company, its officers, directors and stockholders knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, of the issuance of these checks and of the practice of Upshaw of issuing the company's checks in payment of his personal obligations long prior to December 9, 1915. By reason of all of which facts defendant alleges that plaintiff company is guilty of laches and estopped to assert that Upshaw, as secretary and treasurer and general manager of plaintiff company had no authority to issue and deliver these checks in payment of his obligations due this defendant, wherefore defendant prays judgment against plaintiff.

The cause was tried by the court, a jury being waived, and submitted to the court May 7, 1917. On September 10, 1917, the court made its finding and verdict and rendered judgment thereon in favor of defendant and against plaintiff. Motions for new trial were duly filed, overruled, exceptions saved and plaintiff appealed.

Plaintiff introduced the three checks in evidence, which are as before set out. It was in evidence that Upshaw drew a salary of $300 a month, as secretary and treasurer; that he was the only officer of defendant company in St. Louis who at the time had authority to sign checks when these checks were issued, and it was admitted that defendant had received payment for them.

One Robert H. Jones, secretary and treasurer of plaintiff, testified that he had been such for about two years prior to the trial and had been cashier of the company from May 15, 1914, but Upshaw had preceded him as secretary and treasurer of the company; that he (witness) lived in Memphis, Tennessee, before he came to St. Louis as cashier of plaintiff; that the principal owners of the Napoleon Hill Cotton Company were Napoleon Hill and Noland Fontaine. That Upshaw held a certificate of stock representing $5,000. Except that held by Hill, Fontaine and Upshaw, a few shares were held by others to qualify them as directors, these holding one share each; that Hill died in 1909, and Fontaine about two years afterwards, and their stock is now held in trust by the estates of their respective families.

[1] Without going into the evidence in detail, it is sufficient to say that that on the part of defendant tended to establish the material facts relied on by defendant in support of the authority of Upshaw to issue these checks. We have set out the answer in some detail, for it presents the issues as relied upon by defendant and on which the trial court undoubtedly acted.

Plaintiff is a Missouri corporation, having its domicile in the city of St. Louis. All of its stockholders and officers, except Upshaw, at the time of the transactions here involved, resided in Memphis, Tennessee, although meetings of its directors as well as of its stockholders were held in St. Louis at stated periods. Upshaw had entire control of its business in St. Louis. Napoleon Hill and Noland Fontaine died and on their death new directors were elected in their places on October, 1912, and at a meeting of the board held that year Upshaw was re-elected secretary and treasurer. On October 18, 1912, the board of directors instructed the president to engage a firm of auditors to audit the books. R. W. Upshaw continued to be elected secretary and treasurer, his salary fixed at $300 a month, and at a meeting on May 13, 1914, a cashier was elected or appointed, to him being committed the sole custody of all the assets of the company, he to countersign with the president, vice-president or secretary and treasurer all contracts, checks and notes issued by the company. It was in evidence that Upshaw had made overdrafts—at what time does not distinctly appear—some of which he charged to account and some of which were carried as "interest." A son of Napoleon Hill, who succeeded his father as president and in the company, testified that his father knew of Upshaw's overdrafts two or three years before he died. It seems there was some settlement made with Upshaw in June, 1915. He had taken some land in Arkansas in his own name, which he had paid for out of funds of the company, and this he turned over. The overdrafts of Upshaw were figured at some $7,000, and charging that off to profit and loss, the company demanded of Upshaw that he turn over to it 50 shares of stock which he owned in the company. This he did in settlement of his then known overdrafts. Thereafter he made none. Upshaw had drawn his salary up to September 1, 1915, but at that time had not an active share in the management of the business of the company, it being agreed that he would assist the auditor in tracing down the title to some real estate. He was discharged September 1, 1915. He was not re-elected secretary and treasurer at the June, 1915, meeting, his successor being elected. The checks sued on, it was in evidence, were charged on the books of the company to Upshaw or to "interest account" or "expense account." The man selected to audit completed his work, bringing it down to the time when Upshaw drew checks as secretary and treasurer, sometime in September, 1915, and about December 9, 1915, defendants demanded payment of these checks. Upshaw had not signed any checks after May, 1914, as secretary and treasurer alone; after that date they had to be countersigned by the cashier. Upshaw, during his occupancy of the office of secretary and treasurer, paid his own salary either by taking money from the cash drawer or writing a check. He had been secretary and treasurer from the time the company organized in St. Louis, in 1878, down to 1915.

There was introduced in evidence a by-law of the company as follows:

"VII. In the absence from sickness, death or inability of the president to act, his duties shall be performed by the vice-president. But in the absence of both president and vice-president, the business shall be transacted and under the control of the secretary and treasurer and he shall be empowered to sign all documents the same as if the president was present. He shall keep a faithful record of all business transacted at the meetings of the board of directors, countersign all certificates of stock, checks, deeds and formal written contracts, and perform such other duties as the board of directors may prescribe or as the president may from time to time require of him."

[2] There was also introduced in evidence a certificate from the plaintiff, which had been furnished to the Franklin Bank, with which it did business, but there was testimony that Upshaw "was the only man who had authority deposited in the banks to draw checks." In this certificate the substance of the by-law above quoted is set out and then follows the certificate from the president, F. W. Hill, and R. W. Upshaw, as secretary, of date June 9, 1913, in which it is set out "that R. W. Upshaw is the treasurer of said company (having been elected by board lastly on October 17, 1912) and, as such, is authorized to receive and give receipts for all money due and payable to said company, to draw checks against the deposits of the company, to his own order or to bearer, as well as to the order of third persons, to sign and indorse notes for the company, as shown by the above extract from its books, and that such authority remains unrevoked and unchanged at this date, and shall continue in force until written notice of the discontinuance thereof shall have been received and acknowledged by the Franklin Bank of St. Louis."

This was signed, as stated, by the president and by Upshaw as secretary and treasurer, with the seal of the bank attached.

When this certificate was offered by defendant it was objected to by counsel for plaintiff as incompetent and immaterial and as constituting no defense to the cause of action because it was given to the Franklin Bank and not to the defendant, and there is no evidence before the court that the defendant had any knowledge of the existence of such paper or relied in any way upon the same in accepting the checks of Upshaw. The court held it admissible against the company "as showing this was in the record." Whereupon counsel for plaintiff made the further objection that the minutes of the company would be the best evidence as to the authority of Upshaw, that any statement or interpretation of the meaning of the minutes or by-laws of the company should not be binding on the plaintiff and would not constitute any defense to the cause of action, and that it does not purport to give Upshaw the right or authority to issue checks on the funds of the plaintiff for the purpose of paying his own indebtedness to defendant or any one else. These objections were the only ones to this certificate and the trial court admitted it "subject to objection." It is to be remembered that the trial here was to the court and we cannot say whether he considered it at all in arriving at his conclusion. It will be noted that the by-law, which was abbreviated in this certificate, was introduced in evidence.

[3] It was in evidence that during the time of the issuance of the checks in controversy neither the president, nor vice-president of the company was present at St. Louis. That Upshaw had overdrawn his account was certainly known a year before the death of Napoleon Hill in 1909, possibly two or three years before that; in brief, there was substantial evidence in support of the averments of fact in the defendant's answer to sustain the action of the trial court in finding for defendant on these checks, to the effect that the course of business of plaintiff with Upshaw, and of Upshaw with them, was of such a character and so long continued as to estop the plaintiff from claiming recourse on the defendant. That finding is conclusive on us.

[4] It appears in evidence that for a long series of years, running back to the beginning of business by this corporation in St. Louis, Upshaw, as its secretary and treasurer, had been drawing his own checks on the funds of the company for the payment of his own indebtedness. It does not seem reasonable that he could have done this without the knowledge of the corporation. It would seem that the slightest examination of the books of the concern, its banking accounts, would have shown that this was a fact, and yet plaintiff company made no effort to check it or stop it until in 1915, when it discovered the large overdraft. Under these circumstances it does not seem equitable that plaintiff should now be permitted to recover from the defendant, which, as far as the evidence shows in the case, was entirely innocent of any lack of authority on the part of Upshaw to so use the checks of the plaintiff company. The president of defendant company testified that he had known Upshaw for 16 or 17 years; had furnished him groceries during that time and that during some of the time he paid in checks, at other times in cash, the checks similar to these sued on and signed in the same way. "That," said the witness, "ran on probably for ten or fourteen years." He further testified that at the time Upshaw died, he left no estate.

[5] We are aware that there are a number of cases, many cited by learned counsel for appellant, in which it is held that checks, drawn by an officer on his company for his own private business, were invalid or, as held in St. Charles Savings Bank v. Edwards, 243 Mo. 553, loc. cit. 567, 147 S. W. 978, voidable. We do not think that the facts in any of these cases are precisely parallel to the facts in the case at bar. As said by our Supreme Court in State ex rel. Bixby et al. v. St. Louis, 241 Mo. 231, loc. cit. 238, 145 S. W. 801, 803:

"It would be a wide and very mischievous departure from correct canons of interpretation to disconnect general language from the issues and facts of a given case and to apply that general language mechanically or automatically to the different facts and different issues of another case; for the sense must be limited according as the subject requires, and words take color from their context. In the House of Lords in Quinn v. Leatham (Appeal Cases 1901, L. c. 506), the Earl of Halsbury, Lord Chancellor, said: 'Now, before discussing the case of Allen v. Flood and what was decided therein, there are two observations of a general character which I wish to make, and one is to repeat what I have very often said before, that every judgment must be read as applicable to the particular facts proved, or assumed to be proved, since the generality of the expressions which may be found there are not intended to be expositions of the whole law, but governed and qualified by the particular facts of the case in which such expressions are found. The other is that the case is only authority for what it actually decides. I entirely deny that it can be quoted for a proposition which may seem to follow logically from it.'

Judge Lamm follows this with quotations from Vattel and other accepted authorities to the same effect. This rule was approved by our Supreme Court in Koerner v. St. Louis Car Co., 209 Mo. 141, loc. cit. 156, 107 S. W. 481, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 292, and in Bender v. Weber, 250 Mo. 551, loc. cit. 561, 157 S. W. 570, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 121.

In apparently departing from some of the cases cited we have applied to the case at bar the rule so forcibly stated and buttressed by authority in the above cited cases.

[6] Learned counsel complain of error in admitting evidence of overdrafts of various persons other than Upshaw, which had been made, and in admitting in evidence a paper called "Certificate of the Corporation," showing authority of Upshaw to draw checks, etc., the certificate given to another bank, and of error in admitting list of suits brought by plaintiff. Except the certificate referred to these were all admitted "subject to objection" by the court. We cannot possibly say what weight he gave to them. At any rate, their admission was not reversible error. As to the admission of the certificate referred to, we think its admission was competent. It tended to show the authority which the corporation had vested in Upshaw.

Some point is made by counsel for respondent as to the effect on this action of the Act of April 9, 1917, effective June 18, 1917, it being argued that no vested rights can be gained in rules of evidence and that such rule may accordingly be modified at the pleasure of the Legislature, and when so modified are applicable to pending actions. Counsel for appellant attack that act both as not here applicable and as unconstitutional. In the view we take of the case on the facts in evidence and as found by the trial court, it is not necessary here to consider these propositions and we do not determine them.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

(No. 16062.)

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Argued and Submitted May 11, 1920. Opinion Filed June 8, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 23, 1920.)

Corporations §425(3)—Knowledge of officer's authority on custom to draw checks payable to himself held to estop it to deny his authority.

In a corporation's action to recover money paid upon its checks drawn by its secretary to himself and by him indorsed to defendant in payment of his debts, where there was substantial evidence of such officer's authority, custom, and practice to so do, and plaintiff's knowledge thereof, plaintiff was estopped from denying such authority, and could not recover.

Bryan, Williams & Cave, of St. Louis, for respondent.

REYNOLDS, P. J. This case was heard by the court along with that of the same plaintiff against H. Oetter Grocery Company, 222 S. W. 876, the two cases argued and submitted together. The petition counts on seven checks drawn on the Boatmen's Bank at St. Louis, in the name of plaintiff and to the order of the St. Louis Union Trust Company, which are signed "R. W. Upshaw, Secretary and Treasurer," and run from February 1, 1911, to February 2, 1914, each of them for $200. The pleadings and facts in the case are substantially as in that of the same plaintiff against H. Oetter Grocery Company and, as in that case, it was tried before the court, a jury being waived and resulted in a finding and judgment for defendant on each count.

Without repeating what is said in the H. Oetter Grocery Company Case, it is sufficient to say that, as in that case, there was substantial evidence tending to sustain the allegations in the answer as to the authority and custom and practice of Upshaw, the knowledge of that by the plaintiff company, and of the acts of Upshaw and that company in the matter. Here, as there, we think plaintiff was estopped from denying the authority of Upshaw to draw these checks.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Boone County;

J. W. Patterson was convicted of unlawfully issuing a prescription for intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Harris & Price, of Columbia, for appellant.
George S. Starrett, of Columbia, for the State.

TRIMBLE, J. This a prosecution under section 5784, R. S. 1909, against a physician for unlawfully issuing a prescription for intoxicating liquor. The defendant stood on his demurrer to the evidence and offered no testimony. The jury returned a verdict finding defendant guilty as charged and assessing punishment at a fine of $200. The defendant has appealed.

[1] The first claim is that the information is not sufficient. We think it is. It charges the offense in the language of the statute. State v. Anthony, 52 Mo. App. 507; State v. Pomeroy, 163 Mo. App. 288, 147 S. W. 144; State v. Bates, 186 Mo. App. 365, 172 S. W. 79. The information has none of the defects contained in State v. Hume, 141 Mo. App. 489, 124 S. W. 1099, or State v. Bradford, 195 S. W. 523.

The instruction on the part of the state submitting the case is likewise unobjectionable and without error. Under it and all of the instructions the jury could not fail to understand that the intent and good faith of the physician as to the purpose for which the intoxicating liquor was to be used was the vital question, and not the purpose or intent of the person obtaining the prescription.

[2] The state prosecuted and submitted the case upon a prescription issued to one Ed. Prewitt on the 18th of November, 1918. As bearing solely upon the question of the good faith and intent of the physician in issuing the one he was charged with issuing unlawfully, the state introduced five other prescriptions issued by the defendant to the same prosecuting witness during the preceding days of that month each of which prescriptions called for a quart of liquor. The introduction of these prescriptions was objected to, but the objection was overruled, and this is assigned as error. But this was permissible. State v. Spaugh, 200 Mo. 571, 98 S. W. 55; State v. Roberts, 201 Mo. 702, 100 S. W. 484; State v. Sarony, 95 Mo. 349, 8 S. W. 407; State v. Cohen, 254 Mo. 437, 162 S. W. 216, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 86.

[3, 4] We see no error in the remarks of the court in ruling on the admissibility of these other prescriptions wherein it was ruled that they were admitted as bearing on the good faith and intent of the defendant in issuing the one upon which the charge was founded? However, if there had been objectionable matter in the language of the court in ruling on the admissibility of the prescriptions, it could not be relied upon here as reversible error, since no objection was made nor exceptions saved to such remarks.

[5] The claim that there was no evidence to sustain the conviction and that the verdict is the result of passion and prejudice is untenable. The defendant was not the prosecuting witness' family physician. The witness was not sick; he was able to be down in town, in pool halls and other places. The evidence is that the witness had a cold and told defendant he felt badly; that the defendant looked at his tongue and thumped him a little, and then the physician asked his patient(?) what he thought he needed, and when the latter said he thought whisky was the proper remedy, the prescription was issued. All of these things afforded substantial evidence which required the case to be submitted to the jury and upon which the jury could base their verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

In an action for rent, held, that an issue of eviction claimed by defendants was for the jury on the evidence, and it was error to direct a verdict for plaintiff.

2. Landlord and tenant \S 231(2)—Testimony of tenants as to trouble between parties relevant.

In an action for rent, testimony of tenants as to trouble that arose about coal held relevant as tending to show the truth of the tenants' claim that the landlord wanted to and did force them out.

3. Landlord and tenant \S 230(7)—Amendment of answer in action for rent not inconsistent with answer as it stood.

In an action for rent, an amendment by interlineation by inserting words quoted in the answer as to an eviction, stating that while said lease was in force and effect plaintiff, in order to deprive defendants of the use of said property, "ordered the defendants out of said property," took possession of said property, and from and after a specified date to the end of the lease did have and hold the possession, etc., was not inconsistent with the answer as it stood.

Action by Minnie L. Sloan against Tom Maradoes and A. Triatoes. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed, and cause remanded.

Noyes & Heath, of Kansas City, for appellants.

Francis E. House, of Kansas City, for respondent.

ELLISON, P. J. This is an action for rent in which the trial court gave a peremptory instruction to find for the plaintiff. It appears that plaintiff rented to defendants two storerooms in Kansas City known as No. 15 and No. 17 Missouri avenue, by a written lease for the term of three years from October 1, 1914, to September 30, 1917, at a rental of $50 per month, payable in advance. It was shown that the rent was paid up to and including September 30, 1916, but not afterwards. The defense set up in the answer is that plaintiff wrongfully evicted them for the time that rent is claimed. The matters constituting such eviction are set up as follows:

"Further answering, the defendants state that while said lease was in force and effect the plaintiff, in order to deprive the defendants of the use of said property [ordered the defendants out of said property], took possession of the said property, and from and after the 1st day of September, 1916, to the end of the lease did have and hold the possession of the same and refused to let the defendants use, have, or hold the same, and did deprive the defendants of the peaceful and lawful enjoyment of the said property and refused to let the defendants have the keys to the same."

[1] There is no doubt that these acts charged against plaintiff, if committed, constituted an eviction, and as to whether they were committed the evidence conflicted, and undoubtedly should have been submitted to the jury. One of defendants testified that plaintiff's agent by deception got the keys from him for some pretended use, with the promise he would return them next day, which he never did. Defendants said they would pay rent if plaintiff would let them have the property; while the agent testified that defendant came to him, "laid the keys to the premises upon the desk, and announced, 'I am out;' and thereafter refused to pay any more rent."

Prior to this, according to testimony in defendants' behalf, there was some complaint made by defendants to plaintiff about the condition of the premises, in that she had allowed coal to be thrown in, and "she told him to move." There was also testimony tending to prove that the agent told one of defendants that "he got his $50 more rent and I never could go back no more." There was also evidence tending to prove that defendants procured more room, but with no intention of giving up their lease from plaintiff, and that they never began to look for any other place until they had been told by plaintiff or her agent that they had to move, that she would make them move, and that she was getting $50 more rent for another piece of property. But all the while, according to their testimony, defendants intended to keep the property in controversy and did keep it until it was practically forced from them.

[2] From the face of the record it is manitest that plaintiff had little faith in defendants' testimony in their defense, and she was led too far from the beginning of the case for defendants on to the end. At the start defendants were overwhelmed with objections to testimony. These were so constant as to prevent an intelligible and connected story. Defendants started to tell of the trouble that arose about the coal. As far as we are able to judge from the little that cropped through the objections, that was relevant evidence. It perhaps would tend to show the truth of defendants' claim that plaintiff wanted to and did force them out of the premises.

[3] An amendment was made to the answer by interlineation. This consisted in the words "ordered the defendants out of said property." They are included in brackets in the above quotation from the answer. This was also objected to as being inconsistent with the answer as it stood. We do not see any inconsistency.

Defendants pleaded a counterclaim. A demurrer to that part of the answer was sustained by the trial court. Plaintiff insists that no judgment was rendered thereon and that there should have been. She also contends the matters set up were not a subject for counterclaim. We make no decision on these matters. It seems that, among other things, a shed for defendants' delivery automobile was built by them on the vacant part of the lot on which the buildings stood and that plaintiff destroyed it. Whether the vacant portion of the ground went with the buildings as described in the lease is not discussed or briefed. At another trial the matter of counterclaim can be examined and all questions made by plaintiff in regard thereto be settled by an examination of the authorities.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

All concur.

DAVIS v. CITY LIGHT & TRACTION CO. (No. 13382.)

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 14, 1920.)

1. Negligence §93(1)—Negligence of automobile driver not attributed to guest.

Negligence of the driver of an automobile struck by a street car is not attributed to a person riding therein as a gratuitous guest.

2. Street railroads §99(14) — Automobile guest must exercise care for his own safety.

A gratuitous guest in an automobile must look out for himself by exercising care in crossing a street railroad, and, if he fails to do so, he is contributorily negligent.

3. Street railroads §102(2) — Contributory negligence must be proximate cause of injury.

Negligence by a gratuitous guest in an automobile which did not contribute to his injury in a collision between the automobile and a street car does not bar recovery by him.

4. Street railroads §117(29) — Automobile guest's contributory negligence in failing to look held question for jury.

Where there was evidence that the driver of an automobile saw an approaching street car in time to stop, but could not because of trouble with his car, it was a question for the jury whether the negligent failure of a guest to look for the car contributed to his injury.

5. Appeal and error §1068(1)—Submission under humanitarian doctrine alone held prejudicial, regardless of verdict for defendant.

Error in submitting an action against a street railroad company for injuries to a guest in automobile under the humanitarian doctrine alone, where there was evidence to support a finding that plaintiff's negligence did not contribute to his injury, was prejudicial, notwithstanding a verdict for defendants, since it practically told the jury that plaintiff brought the injury on himself and could recover only from a sense of sympathy or humanity.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pettis County; H. B. Shain, Judge.

Action by A. G. Davis against the City Light & Traction Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Lamm, Bohling & Lamm, of Sedalia, for appellant.

George F. Longan, of Sedalia, for respondent.

ELLISON, P. J. Plaintiff's action is for damages resulting from personal injury received in a collision with one of defendant's street cars at the intersection of Ohio and Fifteenth street in Sedalia. The verdict and judgment in the trial court were for the defendant.

Plaintiff, 68 years of age, resides in Sedalia, and had been out in the country on some business connected with a farm which was formerly his home. Being ready to return, a former neighbor (Mr. Arnold) who was going into the city offered him a seat in his automobile. A Mr. Jeffries accompanied them. Plaintiff sat alone on the rear seat, while Jeffries and Arnold were seated in front, the latter driving. As above stated, Ohio street and Fifteenth street intersect; the crossing being much used by the public. The former of these streets runs north and south, while the latter runs east and west, and defendant's tracks are on the former.

Plaintiff and his companions arrived in Sedalia safely. The automobile was being driven east along Fifteenth street, approaching the crossing, at 4 or 5 miles an hour, while the street car was approaching from the north at the rate of about 15 miles an hour. When the automobile reached Ohio street, both Arnold, the driver, and his companion, Jeffries, saw the car coming, and Arnold undertook to stop, but something was wrong, the machine only slowed up a little, then started up and got "on the street car track, and it just kind of stopped, just about stopped and started again." The street car hit the back end of the auto, smashed one fender, broke one of the rear wheels, and carried the auto along the track a distance of 54 feet. The street car fender was broken off and glass in front of the car was broken out, and plaintiff was hit on the head and body making a large contusion on his forehead and fracturing several ribs, besides breaking his collar bone. He was unconscious for a time.

The refusal of the automobile to stop, the effort of Arnold to force it, the slowing up and starting forward, were all in plain view of the motorman on the street car and he put on his brake, slackened the speed of his car some, but released the brake which let the car resume its speed.

Plaintiff, as we have stated, was sitting on the back seat, the top of the auto was up, and the door shut, but the curtains were not on. His attention was drawn, and he did not look in the direction of the street car until a moment before the collision.

Plaintiff offered several instructions which were refused. It is apparent from the record that the trial court considered that, unless plaintiff made out a case under the humanitarian rule, he failed as a matter of law, for, after refusing instructions offered by defendant and most of those offered by plaintiff, it gave one on its own motion submitting the case on that rule, closing with these words "that the issue of contributory negligence is withdrawn by the court from the consideration of the jury." That was but another way of ruling that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and that, in consequence, he could only recover under the humanitarian rule. Therefore we have only to consider whether the court erred in this view.

[1-3] Plaintiff has rightly insisted that, even if Arnold, the owner and driver of the auto, were guilty of contributory negligence, it could not be attributed to him (Moon v. Transit Co., 237 Mo. 425, 435, 141 S. W. 870, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 183; Sluder v. Transit Co., 189 Mo. 107, 139, 88 S. W. 648, 5 L. R. A. [N. S.] 186; Neff v. City of Cameron, 213 Mo. 350, 362, 111 S. W. 1139, 18 L. R. A. [N. S.] 320, 127 Am. St. Rep. 606), and that, if defendant's servants were negligent, plaintiff should recover unless his own negligence directly contributed to his injury. So we are to judge plaintiff's actions alone in the circumstances attending his injury. We recognize that, while a driver's negligence will not be imputed to the passenger, yet it is the latter's duty to look out for himself by exercising care in crossing railway tracks, and that, if he does not do so, he will be guilty of contributory negligence. Leopard v. Street Railway Co., 214 S. W. 268. But it must be such character of contributory negligence as directly produces the injury. Any negligence that is too remote to be called direct, or any act or omission of the injured party which would not have changed the result had action been taken, or omission not have occurred, is not the proximate cause of the injury, and hence is not contributory negligence in the sense of the law. Moore v. Railroad, 126 Mo. 265, 278, 29 S. W. 9; Klockenbrink v. Railroad, 172 Mo. 678, 688, 72 S. W. 900; Whalen v. Railroad, 60 Mo. 323.

[4] Thus, if plaintiff had been on the lookout and had seen the car approaching, he could have done but two things—one to have warned the driver, and the other to have jumped out. Warning the driver would have been wholly useless, since the latter was aware of the car and was using his every endeavor to stop, but failed without fault of any one, if the evidence in his behalf is to be believed. His failure to open the door of the auto and jump out was not such an omission, in the circumstances, as to constitute negligence as a matter of law. The top of the auto was up. Plaintiff was 68 years old, and consequently not so agile as a younger person. But more than that, if he had observed the driver at all, he saw he was trying to stop. It is true plaintiff stated that when he first saw the car it was about 40 feet up the track, and that the crash came so quickly the auto must have been on the track. At another part of his testimony he said that he was not looking "until he felt a jerk of some kind." That was evidently the jerking of the auto. Then he said he looked and saw the street car 40 feet away, "and it seemed like just in an instant it crashed into the auto, and that is the last thing I knew." But there was abundant evidence tending to show that before and during this time Arnold was doing everything in his power to stop the machine until it got on the track and to start it after it got on; all in full sight of the motorman. In view of the situation and the circumstances to which we have referred, it seems clear that plaintiff's action and conduct presented a question for the jury.

[5] It may be suggested that, as the case was submitted to the jury on the humanitarian rule, and the verdict was for the defendant, the jury must have found the defendant's servants were not guilty of any negligence, and hence no harm could result from the court finding, as a matter of law, that defendant was guilty of contributory negligence. But to allow this would be taking away from a plaintiff the right to have his case submitted as it exists. It was highly prejudicial to plaintiff to have the jury told by an instruction, as they were, that "under all the facts and circumstances in evidence the plaintiff can only recover, if he recovers at all, under what is known as the last chance doctrine." That was equivalent to the court saying to the jury that plaintiff had brought the injury on himself through his own fault, and that only from a sense of sympathy or humanity would he be allowed to recover anything.

In view of another trial, we deem it proper to add that there was abundant evidence which, if believed, tended to prove that Arnold was a victim of unforeseen circumstances and free from negligence. It was shown that he would have crossed safely but for his unruly machine; on the other hand, tending to prove that the motorman saw the predicament in which the occupants of the auto were; that he nevertheless released his brake after once applying it; that he saw the auto and the loss of control in ample time to have stopped.

The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded.

All concur.

HUBBARD et al. v. HOME INS. CO. OF NEW YORK. (No. 2637.)

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri. June 5, 1920.)

1. Insurance \S 328(5)—Insured's transfer of equitable title avoids policy under change of interest clause.

If the insured without consent of the insurer makes a contract to sell, vesting equitable title in the purchaser, the purchaser acquires such an interest as to constitute a breach of an insurance contract change of interest clause so as to void the policy.

2. Sales \S 202(7), 208—Where full price not paid and goods had not been separated from others, title had not passed.

Where seller agreed to deliver hay on board cars at place where stored, buyer to furnish the cars, and buyer had paid part only of price before the hay was burned, and no portion of the hay sold had been separated or identified, and the sale was to be for cash, the title had not passed.

3. Insurance \S 328(2)—Where goods sold had not been separated or paid for when burned, there was no change of interest.

Where buyer had paid only part of cash sale price for hay and had not yet furnished cars at point where hay was stored as agreed so seller could deliver on board cars, and the hay had not been separated and title not passed when it was burned, no such interest was vested in buyer as to destroy seller's insurable interest under change of interest clause, and the fact that buyer could recover from seller for payments made did not constitute such a change, in view of the rules against forfeiture and for the construction favorable to the insured in case of doubt.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wright County; C. H. Skinner, Judge.

Suit by J. M. Hubbard and another, doing business as Hubbard & Perry, against the Home Insurance Company of New York. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fyke, Snider & Hume, of Kansas City, for appellant.

Lamar, Lamar & Lamar, of Houston, for respondents.

BRADLEY, J. On August 22, 1918, defendant issued its policy for $1,400 insuring plaintiffs against loss or damage by fire on some baled hay consisting of 59 tons, 710 pounds, then in a certain building. The hay burned on September 22d thereafter, and plaintiffs sought to collect under the policy, and payment was declined, and hence this suit. A jury was waived, and the cause tried before the court. Judgment went for plaintiffs for $1,378.40, and defendant brings the cause here by its appeal.

The policy contained a provision that it would be void "if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership of the said property, or if any change take place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of the insurance." On this clause defendant relies to defeat recovery. On September 5th plaintiffs contracted to sell 50 tons of this hay to one Lawler; the hay was sold to be delivered by plaintiffs on board cars at Mountain Grove, where it was stored in the building where it burned. The purchaser was to obtain the cars, and was to notify plaintiffs. Cars could not be readily obtained, and no time was fixed as to when the cars would be furnished. At the time of the purchase by Lawler his agent, Wheeler, gave plaintiff Perry a check for $250, and the next day, September 6th, gave plaintiff Hubbard a check for $350, and these checks were cashed. Plaintiff Hubbard seemed to be fearful that the payment of $250 might not be sufficient to impel Lawler to take the hay should the price drop considerably, and for this reason the $350 payment was requested. Cars were not obtained, and the hay burned as stated on September 22d. Plaintiffs sought to prove that Lawler was threatening suit to recover back what he had paid, and that they were compelled to and did pay Lawler back his money, but the court excluded this evidence.

Defendant contends that Lawler had acquired such an interest in the hay as to bring into operation the change of interest clause in the policy, and render it void as the clause provided. Plaintiffs contend that there was no separation or setting apart of the hay contracted to be sold, so that it could be identified from other hay in the building, and that there was no delivery which plaintiffs were required to make, and that the sale was for cash, and that full payment of the purchase price was a prerequisite to the passing of title, and that therefore there was no breach of the policy. In addition plaintiffs relied upon an alleged waiver, but we do not deem it necessary to consider the question of waiver.

Defendant relies on Manning v. Insurance Co., 123 Mo. App. 456, 99 S. W. 1095. In that case the policy was issued to one McElroy, who sold the lot and dwelling house insured to Manning, and with the company's consent transferred the policy. Afterwards, on September 19, 1904, Manning entered into a written contract with one Molesworth whereby the latter sold to Manning a farm valued at $4,000 to be paid for by paying $500 at the time, and conveying to Molesworth the lot and dwelling insured, the balance of the consideration to be paid on March 1, 1905. The contract recited that deeds were to be made upon payment of the balance of the consideration, and deeds were afterwards made. But after the contract was executed, and before the deeds were made, and before possession was given, the insured dwelling burned. The policy contained this clause:

"The entire policy shall be void if the interest of the insured be not truly stated herein, or if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership, or if the subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple, or if any change other than by the death of the insured takes place in the interest, title or possession of the subject of insurance, whether by legal process or judgment or voluntary act of the insured."

The court held that plaintiff could not recover; that the contract of sale vested an equitable interest in Molesworth, and that he obtained a right to the legal title; that the loss occasioned by the fire was Molesworth's loss, and not Manning's. The court in discussing the question in the Manning Case used this language:

"After a valid contract of sale of real property and before a deed is made the vendor merely holds the legal title in trust for the purchaser, and, if there be unpaid purchase money, as security therefor. All must agree that after a valid contract of sale all appreciation of the property is the purchaser's, and so also necessarily all depreciation. So, therefore, in all jurisdictions, where, as in this state, the property is at the risk of the purchaser between the execution of a contract of sale and of a deed, it must be held that the execution of such contract, binding upon both parties, changes the interest of the seller and brings him within the terms of the provision in the contract of insurance above set out and avoids the policy."

Snyder v. Murdock, 51 Mo. 175, is cited in the Manning Case as supporting the conclusion there reached. In the Snyder Case the court held that, after an executory contract for the conveyance of real estate has been entered into, by the execution of a bond for title and notes for the purchase money, the property is at the risk of the purchaser, and if it burns it is his loss, and if it increases in value it is his gain, and that this is the settled equity doctrine based upon the principle that in equity what is agreed to be done must be considered as done. In Moseley v. Insurance Co., 109 Mo. App. 464, 84 S. W. 1000, the policy contained this clause:

"This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if any change other than by the death of the insured take place in the interest, title or possession of the subject of the insurance, whether by process or judgment, or by voluntary act of the insured, or otherwise."

The day before the fire Moseley agreed to sell insured property which was a dwelling. The arrangement to sell was made by one Pollard, a real estate agent. Cusick, the purchaser, paid to the agent $400 on the contract for which the agent executed a receipt designating the lot as the "Moseley property." Moseley was to furnish the purchaser with an abstract of title, and the sale was to be consummated if the title proved satisfactory. Pollard's authority as agent was verbal. The court held that plaintiff Moseley could recover, that, Pollard's authority to sell not being in writing, the sale was not binding on Moseley, and that the purchaser could not have enforced specific performance, and had no equitable estate in the premises by virtue of the transaction. In the course of the opinion discussing the meaning and significance of the word "interest" as used in the clause in the policy, Judge Goode, speaking for the court, said:

"An interest in land is often used as synonymous with an estate in it, and is said to embrace estates, rights, and titles. Co. Lit. 345a; Hoge v. Hollister, 2 Tenn. Chan. 629. It has been said to be the most general term used to denote property in lands and chattels. Without going into the lore on the subject, which may be read in Coke and Blackstone, it is safe to say no one has an interest in land, technically speaking, unless he has some kind of property in it, either legal or equitable."

It was urged in the Moseley Case that the purchaser, Cusick, had an interest in the land to the extent of the purchase money paid as he could have charged the land with a lien to that extent, but of this the court says:

"But if he could that possibility certainly did not constitute a change of interest. If he had enforced the lien by process or judgment, there might be force in this argument."

[1] It seems that the rule in this state respecting insured real property is that, if the insured without the consent of the insurer makes a contract to sell vesting the equitable title in the purchaser, the purchaser acquires such an interest as to constitute a breach of an insurance contract containing a change of interest clause as here. Also to the same effect are Brighton Beach Racing Ass'n v. Home Insurance Co., 113 App. Div. 728, 99 N. Y. Supp. 219; Id., 189 N. Y. 526, 82 N. E. 1124; Grunauer v. Westchester, etc., Co., 72 N. J. Law, 289, 62 Atl. 418, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 107; Gibb v. Insurance Co., 59 Minn. 267, 61 N. W. 137, 50 Am. St. Rep. 405; Brickell v. Atlas Assur. Co., 10 Cal. App. 17, 101 Pac. 16.

It is held in Garner v. Ins. Co., 78 Kan. 127, 84 Pac. 717, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 654, 117 Am. St. Rep. 460, 9 Ann. Cas. 459, that the word "interest," as used in a fire insurance policy declaring that the policy shall be void if any change shall take place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of insurance, is not synonymous with "title," but means some right different from title; that the term "interest" cannot mean a greater estate than "title," since "title," as used in the policy, is intended to mean "estate," and that the word must therefore be used in contradiction to title, as including any right in property less than title, and that, if the insured was the owner of the title, the word "interest" would have no application. See, also, Hillyard v. Banchor, 85 Kan. 516, 118 Pac. 67.

[2] It is clear that the title to the hay had not passed to Lawler. The portion sold had not been separated or identified in any way, and it was sale for cash, and the full purchase price had not been paid. All the authorities are to this effect. See Grocer Co. v. Clements, 69 Mo. App. 446; Metal Co. v. Daugherty, 204 Mo. 71, 102 S. W. 538; Ficklin v. Tinder, 161 Mo. App. 283, 143 S. W. 853; Hamra Bros. v. Herrell et al., 200 S. W. 776; Boyer v. Lumber Co., 187 Mo. App. 523, 174 S. W. 113. Defendant does not contend that the title to the hay had passed, so we will not dwell longer on this feature.

[3] In a recent case in the Kansas City Court of Appeals, Terminal Ice & Power Co. v. Ins. Co., 196 Mo. App. 241, 194 S. W. 722, it was held that the change of interest referred to in the policy there, similar or like the one here, in view of the rules which frown upon forfeitures, and require that insurance policies be strictly construed against the insured, means some change which would cause the loss by fire to fall on the buyer. That the title to the hay had not passed seems clear, and is conceded, and no such interest therein had been vested in Lawler as to destroy plaintiffs' insurable interest. It appears, therefore, that the loss by fire of the hay was plaintiff's loss, and not Lawler's. The mere fact that Lawler would have had recourse for the recovery of the amount he had paid would not be in the nature of an interest in the insured property, or a change of interest, any more than was Cusick's right to enforce his lien for what he had paid in the case of Moseley v. Insurance Co., 109 Mo. App. loc. cit. 460, 84 S. W. 1000, supra. The purpose of a provision providing for forfeiture for change of interest is to prevent the interest of the insured in the subject of the insurance from being diminished; to keep the insured as much concerned during the whole life of the policy in the preservation of the property as he was when the policy was first issued. Moseley v. Insurance Co., supra. When this purpose is considered, and under the facts here, and with the rules against forfeiture in view, and also that, where there is doubt or ambiguity, the policy will be construed in favor of the insured, and against the insurer, we hold that Lawler had not acquired such interest in the hay destroyed as to work a forfeiture of the policy.

Reaching this conclusion, it follows that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

June 5, 1920.)

1. Witnesses \S 159(8)—Defendant in unlawful detainer action could not prove verbal contract with decedent.

In an action by a grantee in unlawful detainer, defendant could not prove a verbal contract with deceased grantor for a renewal of the lease under which he was holding.

2. Frauds, statute of \S 53, 129(4)—Oral contract for lease for year to begin at future date held void; possession under valid lease not part performance taking subsequent lease out of statute.

A contract for a lease for one year, to begin at a future date, is void under the statute forbidding the enforcement of a contract not to be performed within a year from the making of same unless in writing; and where the person making such invalid contract is already in possession of the land under an unexpired valid lease, then such acts of part performance as plowing the land or seeding same for future crops do not remove the barrier of the statute.

3. Frauds, statute of §125(2)—Remedy of tenant for one year to begin at future date stated.

The only remedy of a tenant for landlord's violation of a verbal agreement for a lease for one year, to begin at a future date, is for damages for work and labor performed thereunder, or the right to harvest the crops sown.

4. Husband and wife §14(2)—Conveyance to both creates entirety.

Where land is conveyed to husband and wife, they become tenants by the entirety.

5. New trial §26—Parties §75(8)—Defect as to party plaintiff must be raised by demurrer or answer.

In a suit by husband in unlawful detainer, the objection that the wife is a necessary party plaintiff must be raised by demurrer or by answer, under Rev. St. 1909, §§ 1800, 1804, and it cannot be raised by motion for a new trial.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jasper County; Grant Emerson, Judge.

Action by J. Frank Todd against A. Fitzpatrick and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

T. C. Tadlock, of Joplin, and Frank L. Forlow, of Webb City, for appellants.

George V. Farris, of Webb City, for respondent.

STURGIS, P. J. This is a suit for unlawful detainer of a large farm in Jasper county, Mo. The plaintiff purchased this land from one Hannum in December, 1918. At that time the defendants, father and son, were in possession of said farm under a written lease from Hannum for one year, expiring March 1, 1919. The deed of conveyance from Hannum to plaintiff was made subject to this lease. Defendants' lease, which expired March 1, 1919, specifically stated that they were to surrender possession at that time.

[1] The defense is that the former owner, Hannum, in the fall of 1918, and before selling the farm to plaintiff, promised defendants to renew the lease for another year, beginning March 1, 1919; and on the strength of such agreement defendants plowed and sowed in wheat 135 acres of the farm before plaintiff purchased same, and that plaintiff had notice of this fact at the time of such purchase. Hannum was dead at the time of this trial, and the court properly excluded defendants' proffered evidence as to his having made any verbal contract with Hannum with reference to such land. Such contract would also be void for the reason that it was not to be performed within a year from its making. Shacklett v. Cummins, 178 Mo. App. 309, 165 S. W. 1145. The defendants further claim, however, that after plaintiff's purchase of the land he also, in January, 1919, agreed to rent the farm to them in confirmation of the verbal agreement of Hannum, and that, relying thereon, they further plowed and sowed some land in oats and plowed some for corn. Defendants admit, however, that plaintiff on January 18, 1919, notified them to vacate possession of the farm on March 1, 1919, and at the same time made defendants an offer to cultivate the farm land on such farm, part of it to be sown to oats and the other part planted in corn, "all other possession of farm, buildings, pasture, and land not under cultivation to be returned to me [plaintiff], possession of all land to revert to me [plaintiff] when grain is harvested." Defendants rejected this proposition, claiming that they already had a valid lease of all the farm, including buildings, pasture, and hay land, for the coming year, beginning March 1, 1919, and ending March 1, 1920. The defendants expressly refused to consider or accept anything short of a fulfillment of the verbal agreement to rent them the whole farm for the year beginning March 1, 1919. This suit was begun March 4, 1919. Such also was the defendants' claim and attitude at the trial.

On these facts the court directed a finding for plaintiff. The question of the amount of damages and the monthly rents and profits was submitted to the jury, and the jury found that the damage to plaintiff for defendants' withholding the land was nothing, and the value of the rents and profits was nothing.

[2] The case of Shacklett v. Cummins, 178 Mo. App. 309, 165 S. W. 1145, affirmed in 270 Mo. 496, 193 S. W. 562, is decisive of this case. It is there distinctly held that a contract for a lease for one year, to begin at a future date, is void under the statute of frauds forbidding the enforcement of contracts not to be performed within a year from the making of same unless in writing; that where the person making such invalid contract is already in possession of the land under an unexpired valid lease, then such acts of part performance as plowing the land or seeding same for future crops do not remove the barrier of the statute of frauds.

[3] The plaintiff suggests that even if the verbal contract for a year's lease made in December, 1918, or January, 1919, to begin

March 1, 1919, is void, taken in its entirety, that the court should hold it valid so far as it can be performed within a year, and that it should be held valid as to the land to be cultivated, since the crops would be removed within one year from the date of the making of the contract. The plaintiff, however, offered to make just this contract with defendants after this controversy arose, and defendants refused any such limitation of the invalid contract, and insisted on holding the whole farm for a full year after March 1, 1919. This, too, was defendants' attitude at the trial. The only remedy to defendants for plaintiff's violation of his verbal agreement is for damages for work and labor performed thereunder or the right to harvest the crops already sown.

We are aware that at the present time plaintiff's right to the possession of this land is a moot question only, since this case did not reach this court till November, 1919, and was submitted in December, 1919. The one year from March 1, 1919, which is all the defendants claim, is now ended, and plaintiff will doubtless be in possession before the mandate of this court reaches the trial court. No damages were awarded, and nothing given for monthly rents and profits.

[4-6] The deed by which plaintiff became the owner of this land conveyed same to him and his wife. They were therefore tenants by the entirety. Hough v. Light Co., 127 Mo. App. 570, 106 S. W. 547; First National Bank v. Fry, 168 Mo. 492, 68 S. W. 348. It is claimed, therefore, that the wife was a necessary party plaintiff. This question was not raised in any way by the pleadings nor at the trial. Such issue must be raised either by demurrer or by answer. Otherwise it is waived. Sections 1900 and 1904, R. S. 1909. It was too late to raise it by the motion for new trial. Besides, under the authorities just cited, the husband is the only party to sue for possession of land held by himself and wife as tenants by the entirety.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

BROWN v. UNITED RYS. CO. OF ST. LOUIS. (No. 16096.)

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. June 8, 1920.)

Evidence ¶153—Error to exclude testimony of claim agent that none of defendant's employes knew of alleged assault on plaintiff by defendant's conductor.

In an action against a street railway company for an alleged assault by a conductor, court erred in not permitting defendant to prove by its claim agent, who investigated the case, that the crews on all cars operated on the line where the assault was alleged to have taken place were examined by the witness, and that none of them knew anything of the alleged occurrence.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Benjamin J. Klene, Judge.

"Not to be officially published."

Action by John J. Brown against the United Railways Company of St. Louis. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Charles W. Bates, T. E. Francis, and Chauncey H. Clarke, all of St. Louis, for appellant.

Claud D. Hall, of St. Louis, for respondent.

BIGGS, C. This action against the railways company for personal injuries arises out of an alleged assault upon plaintiff by the motorman and conductor of one of defendant's cars while plaintiff was a passenger. From an adverse judgment for $500 actual damages, defendant appeals, assigning as error the exclusion of evidence by the trial court.

Plaintiff's testimony tended to prove that the assault took place at about the hour of midnight on July 4 or 5, 1910, at or near the corner of Sixth street and Washington avenue in the city of St. Louis, while plaintiff was on a Page avenue car. On May 21, 1915, almost five years after the occurrence, plaintiff filed suit for his damages. The defendant denied the assault, and, after showing that no report of the case was ever made to the company prior to the filing of the suit, offered to prove by its claim agent, who investigated the case in 1915, that the crews on all cars operated on the Page avenue line in 1910 were examined by the witness, and that none of them knew anything of the alleged occurrence.

The evidence thus offered was rejected by the trial court upon objections thereto by plaintiff, and this ruling is the sole ground of complaint lodged against the judgment.

Failure to admit the evidence was plain error. As stated, defendant denied the assault. If none of its employes who were within its control and who were at the time operating the cars on the Page avenue line had knowledge of the alleged occurrence, defendant had the right to show by its witness who had investigated the case such fact, in order to rebut the unfavorable presumption that would naturally arise in the minds of the jury because of the failure of the defendant to produce as witnesses any of its employes who should have been cognizant of the occurrence if it took place. Defendant was not offering to prove by the witness what its employes said about the matter, but only the fact that such employes had no knowledge of it.

The question has been directly ruled by this court in the case of Fleishman v. Polar Wave Ice & Fuel Co., 163 Mo. App. 416, 143 S. W. 881, where the authorities from other jurisdictions are fully reviewed.

The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of BIGGS, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

The judgment of the circuit court is accordingly reversed, and the cause remanded.

CONLEY v. JOHNSON. (No. 13586.)

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 14, 1920.)

1. Witnesses \Leftrightarrow 158—Administratrix may testify as to bad reputation for truth and veracity of plaintiff's witness.

In an action on a note barred by limitations unless a credit was valid, the defendant administratrix was competent to testify as to the present bad reputation for truth and veracity of a witness in support of the credit, for such testimony did not fall within prohibition of Rev. St. 1909, § 6354.

2. Witnesses \Leftrightarrow 168—Party may testify as to matters occurring since administration.

A party to the action incompetent to testify, under Rev. St. 1909, § 6354, as to transactions and conversations had with the deceased, is competent to testify as to conversations, transactions, and things occurring since the granting of letters of administration.

3. Witnesses \Leftrightarrow 164(3)—Witness disqualified by death of deceased may testify as expert on handwriting.

A witness disqualified on account of the death of the deceased may nevertheless testify as an expert to the handwriting of the deceased.

4. Trial \Leftrightarrow 253(5) — Instruction eliminating defensive issues is erroneous.

In an action on a note, an instruction that if a credit relied on to toll limitations was valid plaintiff was entitled to recover was erroneous, where the question of the execution of the note by the deceased was in issue, as was its indorsement to plaintiff.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Boone County; David H. Harris, Judge.

Action by Laura A. Conley against Jennie G. Johnson, executrix of Spurgeon G. Johnson, deceased, begun in the probate court and appealed by plaintiff to the circuit court.

From a judgment there for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

George S. Starrett and N. T. Gentry, both of Columbia, for appellant.

Harris & Price, of Columbia, for respondent.

TRIMBLE, J. This action, originating in the probate court, is on a demand against the estate of Spurgeon G. Johnson, deceased, founded upon a promissory note dated February 1, 1907, due one day after date, for $1,216.60, payable to the order of John E. Johnson. The note was credited on the date it was issued with $600, and a further credit of $5 appeared on the back thereof, bearing the date of February 1, 1914. The maker of the note, Spurgeon G. Johnson, and the payee thereof, John E. Johnson, were brothers. Both were dead at the time of the trial. The defendant is Spurgeon G. Johnson's widow and his administratrix. The plaintiff was formerly the widow of the payee, John E. Johnson, but is now married to one Conley. She claims that during the life of John E. Johnson he assigned the note to her. Upon a trial in the probate court judgment went in defendant's favor, and plaintiff appealed to the circuit court, where it was tried de novo. Here plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment for $1,286.86, and defendant has appealed.

The two brothers lived some seven or eight miles out in the country from Columbia and were engaged extensively together in farming and raising stock. John E. Johnson died in 1910, and, as stated, his widow, Laura A. Johnson, afterward married and is now the plaintiff, Laura A. Conley. Spurgeon G. Johnson did not die till in January, 1919. The suit was instituted on May 18, 1919, and consequently, if the alleged credit of $5 as of February 1, 1914, was not a proper credit, such as would constitute an acknowledgment of the indebtedness by the maker, then the note was barred by the 10-year statute of limitations. The genuineness and validity of this credit was therefore a very acute and important issue in the case.

The only witness who testified concerning the alleged $5 payment was one Hopper, who was plaintiff's witness. He did not testify in the probate court, nor was he subpoenaed to appear at the trial in the circuit court until after he had reached the courthouse on the day of the trial. He resided upon plaintiff's farm and worked there. He testified that more than 5 years before the trial, some time in the latter part of January, 1914, he was residing on his brother's place, but happened to be at the John E. Johnson residence, and that Mr. Crane, Mrs. Johnson's father, was there; that Spurgeon G. Johnson came there and said to Mrs. Johnson he wanted to see her on some business, and they went into an adjoining room where they talked for perhaps ten minutes, and then Mrs. Johnson came to the door and called to her father, Mr. Crane, and he went in, leaving the door open; that he heard them talking about a payment on a note; that Mrs. Johnson told Mr. Crane, Spurgeon made a $5 payment on the note. Witness did not know what Crane said, but that "it was all right or something"; that Mrs. Johnson went out; witness could see her through the open door as she went; that she went into the west room and then Mr. Crane came to him (the witness) and told him he wanted him to witness that Spurgeon was going to make a payment on the note; that as witness came to the door Mrs. Johnson came by him into the room, holding what looked like a note in her hand; that Mr. Johnson handed her a bill or paper money; he supposed it was $5; he heard them say "Five dollars," anyhow. Witness did not see the credit put on the note, but says he heard them speak of a note; that Mrs. Johnson told him (Spurgeon) that $5 was "a mighty small payment on a six hundred and some odd dollar note," and that Mrs. Johnson asked something about what date it was and Mr. Johnson (Spurgeon) told her "it was so near the 1st of February to just put it down the 1st of February; that was the date of the note, or something like that;" that this transaction took place some time in the latter part of January; witness did not know just what date in January it was. Defendant had evidence to the effect that Spurgeon Johnson was not in Boone county on February 1, 1914, but some days prior thereto had left home and gone to his farm in Pettis county.

[1-3] As this witness was a new factor in the case, and defendant had no intimation that he would be a witness, defendant was not prepared with witnesses to impeach him. But defendant's counsel placed defendant herself upon the stand and sought to prove by her that she knew the aforesaid witness' general reputation for truth and veracity in the community in which he lived and that it was bad, that is, that it was then bad at the time of the trial. The court, upon objection, ruled that she was an incompetent witness to testify.

We think she was a competent witness to testify as to that matter. The evidence sought to be elicited from her was the present general reputation of the witness; it was not in regard to anything connected with the making of the contract or in reference to any conversations with either John E. Johnson, the payee, or Spurgeon Johnson, her husband. It was solely with reference to a present existing fact, which she would know herself as a citizen of the community. She was a party to the suit as administratrix and was qualified to testify, since she was not to be examined upon any of the matters contained in the proviso to section 6354, R. S. 1909. This statute is an enabling rather than a disabling statute, and it is well settled that a party to the action who is incompetent to testify to conversations had with the deceased is nevertheless competent to testify to conversations, transactions, and things occurring since the granting of letters. Chandler v. Hedrick, 187 Mo. App. 664, 670, 173 S. W. 93. And a witness who is disqualified on account of the death of the opposite party may nevertheless testify as an expert to the handwriting of the deceased. Banking House, etc., v. Rood, 132 Mo. 256, 263, 33 S. W. 816. Letters of administration on the estate of Spurgeon G. Johnson were granted in January, 1919, and the trial occurred in October of that year.

"The disqualification [of the statute] is not general but is limited to transactions between the witness and the party then dead." Elsa v. Smith, 273 Mo. 396, 408, 202 S. W. 1071, 1073.

See, also, Ring v. Jamison, 2 Mo. App. 586, 592, 593.

"The widow of a decedent may be a witness for or against the administrator * * * of the estate of her deceased husband, whether solvent or insolvent, as to all such facts as the policy of the law does not require to be kept sacred and secret between husband and wife, during marriage." Stein v. Weidman's Adm'r, 20 Mo. 17, 21; Brown v. Patterson, 224 Mo. 639, 652, 124 S. W. 1.

[4] Plaintiff's instruction No. 4 was erroneous, in that it told the jury "Your verdict must be for plaintiff," if they found that the $5 payment was made on the note at any time within ten years prior to May 19, 1919. This made the alleged credit the only issue to be determined before a verdict could be returned in plaintiff's favor, whereas there was still another issue in the case and possibly two, namely, the indorsement of the note to plaintiff and the execution of the note by deceased. Said instruction No. 4 therefore conflicted with other instructions given. Hence it was error. Smith v. Metropolitan R. Co., 126 Mo. App. 120, 103 S. W. 593; Mansur, etc., Co. v. Ritchie, 143 Mo. 587, 613, 45 S. W. 634; Shepherd v. St. Louis Transit Co., 189 Mo. 362, 87 S. W. 1007.

There is no merit in defendant's contention that the demurrer to plaintiff's evidence should have been sustained.

The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

The other Judges concur.

STILL v. GLASS et al. (No. 13680.)

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 14, 1920.)1. Appeal and error \S 758(1)—Points and authorities may supply formal assignments of error.

Points and authorities, distinctly pointing out errors of trial court relied on for reversal, may take the place of formal assignment of error in brief.

2. Appeal and error \S 758(3), 766—Points, not directing attention to erroneous ruling, cannot be considered assignments.

Points and authorities, which merely stated propositions without stating any rulings of the court nor pointing out errors in such rulings, cannot be considered assignments of error; and, where there is no other assignment of errors, the appeal must be dismissed.

3. Appeal and error \S 766—Court must enforce statute and rules.

It is the duty of the appellate court to enforce the statute and rules requiring assignment of errors in brief.

4. Appeal and error \S 883—Directed verdict for defendant held invited by plaintiff.

Where the record showed that plaintiff's counsel stated it would be all right for the court to direct a verdict, error in directing a verdict for defendant was invited, and plaintiff cannot complain thereof.

5. Appeal and error \S 662(1)—Record must be accepted as true.

The appellate court must accept the record as absolute verity; if it is not true, it should have been corrected in trial court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Thos. J. Seehorn, Judge.

Action by Mathias J. Still against William J. Glass and another. Judgment for defendants on directed verdict, and plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Geo. S. Shelton, Wm. T. Alford, and E. A. Scholer, all of Kansas City, for appellant.

Fred S. Hudson, of Kansas City, Chas. Lederer, of Chicago, Ill., and Simrall & Simrall, of Liberty, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action was instituted to recover damages for an alleged malicious prosecution. The trial court directed a verdict for defendants by peremptory instruction.

[1, 2] There was no assignment of errors made by plaintiff. But his brief contains "Points and Authorities," which if errors of the trial court relied upon for reversal were distinctly pointed out therein would take the place of a formal assignment of errors. But no rulings of the court are stated, nor errors pointed out, in such points and authorities. We copy them (omitting authorities cited):

"Points and Authorities.

"I. Respondents' instigation, maintenance, or participation in the prosecution was a question for the jury.

"II. Under the evidence in this case Kenyon's suppression of the facts amounted to instigation.

"III. Kenyon's act in reporting nonpayment to the captain without full disclosure, when he believed plaintiff innocent, was evidence of want of probable cause and malice.

"IV. Kenyon's offer to dismiss the prosecution on payment of $25 was evidence tending to show want of probable cause and malice.

"V. Respondents' failure to sign the complaint does not, as a matter of law, eliminate them as the procuring cause of the arrest.

"VI. Failure to report purchase under the ordinance does not act as a matter of law constitute probable cause of an arrest three months later.

"VII. Whether Kenyon's acts were within the scope of his authority as general manager of the Kansas City branch was a question for the jury."

The case is controlled by Frick v. Millers' Natl. Ins. Co. (Sup.) 213 S. W. 854; Hayes v. McLaughlin (Sup.) 217 S. W. 262, 264; Squaw Creek Drainage Dist. v. Hayes (Sup.) 217 S. W. 20; Vahldick v. Vahldick, 264 Mo. 529, 175 S. W. 199; Cook v. St. Joseph, 220 S. W. 693 (decided by us April 5, 1920).

[3] It is the duty of the court to see to the enforcement of the statute and rules. St. Louis v. Young, 248 Mo. 346, 348, 154 S. W. 87; Hutson v. Allen, 236 Mo. 645, 139 S. W. 121.

[4] There is another reason why plaintiff cannot sustain his appeal. It is a familiar rule that where he invites or requests a ruling he cannot make it a basis for error. We find from the record that plaintiff requested the trial court to give the peremptory instruction of which he is now complaining. At the close of the evidence the defendants requested the peremptory instruction, whereupon the court said:

"The jury will retire to the hall, and remain there until called. (Jurors here retire from courtroom. Here followed discussion between court and counsel.)

"The Court: By agreement of parties, the plaintiff is authorized to amend petition by changing the amount sued for to $5,000 actual damages and $2,500 exemplary damages. (Petition here amended by interlineation.)

"The Court: What do you want to do?

"Mr. Alford: Well, you direct the verdict. That will be all right.

"The Court: Call the jury, Mr. Sheriff. (Jurors here return to jury box.)"

And the court gave the instruction.

[5] We must accept the record as absolute verity. If it is not a true representation of the facts, it should have been corrected in the trial court.

The appeal will be dismissed.

METCALF et al. v. RUNNELS. (No. 13661.)

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 14, 1920.)

1. Account stated § 6(1) — Not created by mere payment on account knowing its amount claimed.

A mere payment on an account, the amount of which is known to the debtor, is not an admission that the whole amount is due, and does not create an obligation to pay the balance.

2. Trial § 296(1) — Omission from plaintiff's instruction held not cured by defendant's instruction.

Omission from plaintiff's instruction of a condition necessary for recovery is not cured by it being put in defendant's instruction.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; O. A. Lucas, Judge.

"Not to be officially published."

Action by E. M. Metcalf and another against Moses T. Runnels. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Joseph S. Brooks, of Kansas City, for appellant.

Metcalf & Brady, of Kansas City, for respondents.

ELLISON, P. J. This action is based on an ordinary itemized account for legal services running through a space of three or more years. Several credits are entered, which, subtracted from the total, leaves a balance of $299.60, for which sum plaintiffs had judgment in the circuit court, where it had been taken by appeal from a justice of the peace. When defendant's motion for new trial was under consideration, a remittitur of $50 was entered and judgment rendered for $249.60.

[1] At the trial the court gave the following instruction for plaintiffs:

"The court instructs the jury that if you find from the evidence that plaintiffs were claiming an amount due them for services rendered to defendant and that Moses T. Runnels, the defendant in this case, on or about the 7th day of June, 1915, paid to Mr. W. W. Brady the sum of $1 to apply on his account with Metcalf & Brady, if you find there was an account, and that at that time he was informed and told and knew that the balance plaintiffs were claiming as due was $299.60, your verdict will then be for the plaintiff for the sum of $299.60."

It is clear that the instruction should not have been given. It announces the proposition that if a creditor presents an account to his debtor for a certain sum and the latter pays $1 on it, knowing that the creditor was claiming a balance was due him, he became legally bound to pay that balance, whether he agreed to do so or not, and whether the whole amount claimed was correct or not. In other words, a mere payment on the account, the amount of which is known to the debtor, makes a binding and conclusive obligation to pay the balance. Part payment of an account, standing alone, is not an admission that the whole sum is due, nor is it an obligation to pay the whole.

[2] It is true that the court instructed the jury for the defendant that unless the jury believed from the evidence that when defendant paid the $1 on the account he agreed that he owed the balance of $299.60 they must find for defendant. But that important condition was omitted from plaintiffs' instruction, and the jury required to find for plaintiffs whether defendant agreed to pay them or not. The fact that the condition was put in defendant's instruction will not cure the error in plaintiffs', for the agreement to pay was a necessary part of plaintiffs' case, which they cannot omit to submit to the jury. Hall v. Coal & Coke Co., 260 Mo. 351, 367-369, 168 S. W. 927, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 375; State ex rel. v. Ellison, 272 Mo. 571-583-587, 199 S. W. 984.

The matter of, and the rule in, an account stated has been discussed, but, so far as the instructions for either party are concerned, is wholly ignored. The law as to an account stated is laid down in Bambrick v. Simms, 102 Mo. 158, 14 S. W. 935; Cape Girardeau v. Kimmel, 58 Mo. 83; Risk v. Dale, 188 Mo. App. 726, 176 S. W. 529; and Stewart v. Railroad, 157 Mo. App. 225, 137 S. W. 46.

Plaintiffs' brief is entirely made up of a paragraph from Niehaus v. Gillanders, 184 S. W. 949, but nothing in that paragraph was submitted in the instruction.

The judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded.

All concur.

Crory. Judgment for plaintiff, and defend-

Harry Howard, of Kansas City, for plain-

E. A. Scholer, of Kansas City, for defendant in error.

ELLISON, P. J. This action was instituted to recover damages for malicious prosecution of a civil suit against the plaintiff.
The judgment in the trial court was for the plaintiff.

Plaintiff owned real property in Kansas City, Mo., and defendant owned real property in the state of Texas. They exchanged properties and afterwards defendant instituted an action in the state of Texas against plaintiff for rescission, and it is for the institution of that suit that plaintiff has brought this action. Plaintiff was put to the expense of employing counsel and attending court in Texas at the time set for trial, when defendant dismissed the case and plaintiff was discharged. Defendant did not appear or offer defense to this suit, and judgment by default was rendered against him.
The trial court heard evidence as to the amount plaintiff had been damaged and rendered final judgment therefor. No appeal was taken, but defendant sued out a writ of error on the record, his complaint being that plaintiff did not allege facts in his petition sufficient to sustain a cause of action, and that is the sole question in the case.

The petition is half made up of a mixture of statement of evidence and argument, going so far in one place as to allege what defendant admitted as to his bad faith in a certain deposition. That part of it purporting to state his case is as follows:

"Plaintiff, for his cause of action against above-named defendant, alleges that at all times hereinafter mentioned defendant was engaged in the business of buying, selling, and trading real estate in Missouri and many other states, and followed said occupation as a business or profession. Plaintiff alleges that some time in February, 1917, he was the owner of a certain 21-apartment flat building located in Kansas City, Mo., and that about said date defendant and plaintiff entered into negotiations for the exchange of properties, defendant offering to trade plaintiff for said flat building 980 acres of land in the Texas panhandle country in Hale county, Tex., such exchange being subject to mutual inspection and investigation; and plaintiff alleges that thereafter defendant inspected the flat, examining its condition, rooms, questioned its tenants, and that thereafter, some time in May, 1917, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract for the exchange of the properties as hereinbefore mentioned, said transfer to be consummated in August, 1917.

"Plaintiff alleges that thereafter, in December, 1917, defendant, Crary, instituted suit in Hale county, Tex., for the rescission of said exchange of properties, cancellation of notes, and other relief, on the ground of misrepresentation alleged to have been made by this plaintiff and his agent as to the number of rooms and toilet improvement in said apartments, as to the rentals and insurance and location of said property in Kansas City. Plaintiff alleges that each ground of rescission set forth in defendant's petition was false and known to be false by defendant when made. * * * Plaintiff alleges that said suit in Hale county, Tex., was brought by defendant without probable cause, in bad faith, and with malice, for the purpose of harrassing and annoying plaintiff, and for the purpose of extorting from plaintiff, through expenses and hazards of litigation, money that defendant was not entitled to. * * * Plaintiff alleges that defendant, with full knowledge of the falseness of each and every allegation in his petition contained, * * * without probable cause, with malice and bad faith and an intention to injure plaintiff and cause him loss of valuable time, expenses of attorneys' fees, had said suit set for trial for September 10, 1918, at Plainview, Hale county, Tex., when he well knew that he would be unable to maintain his suit, and never intended to actually try the same, and compelled plaintiff with counsel to come from Kansas City to Plainview, Tex., and wait there for several days while said suit was being reached, and then on the final calling of the cause for trial voluntarily dismissed the same.

"Plaintiff alleges that all of defendant's actions as above set forth were malicious and oppressive; that said suit was instituted in bad faith and without probable cause, for the purpose of harrasing and annoying plaintiff and extorting a money settlement from him, and plaintiff was compelled from the first institution of the suit to engage counsel in Kansas City and at Plainview, Tex., spend money for depositions, was compelled to get a two weeks' lay-off from his work to attend said court. Plaintiff alleges that he has expended in attorneys' fees, traveling expenses, hotel expenses, and loss of time on account of said suit and on account of being compelled to attend said court at Plainview, Tex., the full sum of $680.20, all of which expenditures were the direct result of defendant's wrongful acts as above described.

"Wherefore, plaintiff prays he may recover judgment against defendant in the full sum of $680.20 and for his costs herein expended."

[1] In an action for malicious prosecution of a civil suit it is necessary to allege that such suit was instituted and prosecuted, and this must be done by the allegation of such facts as will disclose to the court that a suit was brought in court against the plaintiff. And it is not sufficient to allege merely that a suit was instituted, for that is merely an allegation of the plaintiff's conclusion, which is never allowable. The charge is that "defendant, Crary, instituted suit in Hale county, Tex." What did he do to institute the suit, and did he institute it in a court, and if so, what court? The petition does not enlighten us. What constitutes the institution of a suit is frequently a serious question and one that has been much litigated in this state.

[2, 3] Facts, and not evidence nor conclusions of law, must be distinctly stated. Every fact which the plaintiff must prove to maintain his suit is constitutive, in the sense of the Code, and must be alleged. Pier v. Heinrichoffen, 52 Mo. 333. A defendant is under no obligation to deny conclusions set out in the pleadings. They are as if unpleaded, count for nothing, and may be reached by general demurrer. Mallinckrodt Chemical Works v. Nemnich, 169 Mo. 388, 69 S. W. 355. In that case the complaint was that defendant had become engaged in prosecuting the manufacture of certain chemicals he had agreed not to for a certain length of time. The charge was that he had entered upon the manufacture of chemicals, drugs, and other articles of the same kind and character as those manufactured by the plaintiff, and that he "was utilizing and applying for his own use the knowledge and information so acquired and obtained by him while in plaintiff's employ." Of this Judge Sherwood said:

"In what way is defendant utilizing and applying for his own use the knowledge, etc.? What are the facts? Surely defendant was entitled to a statement of the constitutive facts which compose plaintiff's cause of action, if it had any, for this is the rule of our Code. Pier v. Heinrichoffen, 52 Mo. 333. And equally as surely, such facts plaintiff did not set forth. The allegation quoted is simply the averment of a legal conclusion; not the statement of issuable facts; and not, therefore, either traversable or demurrable, and is to be treated as no statement at all, and consequently obnoxious to attack by general demurrer. [Authorities.] 'The allegation of a conclusion of law raises no issue, need not be denied, and its truth is not admitted by a demurrer to the complaint containing it.'"

In Lappin v. Nichols, 263 Mo. 285, 172 S. W. 596, it was alleged that—

The "defendants seized a large portion of the products of said lands, thereby increasing plaintiff's disability to redeem said lands."

The court said that—

"The defendants should be informed by the petition as to the value of said products thus seized in order to determine whether their seizure materially decreased the ability of plaintiffs to pay. Instead of the fact as to such value, the averment is that of the mere conclusion that the plaintiffs were rendered less able to pay."

[4] Plaintiff answers defendant's claims against his pleading by the statement that "The interpretation of the petition must be directed by the law concerning aider by verdict." If a cause of action is stated, a verdict will cure defects of statements which must have been proven at the trial. But it is a fundamental rule that a verdict cannot supply the statement of the cause of action itself. This view makes it unnecessary to discuss defendant's point that aider by trial or verdict cannot apply when the judgment is by default.

Other suggestions by plaintiff have been disposed of in what we have written. The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

All concur.

HALVORSON et al. v. COMMERCE TRUST CO. (No. 13665.)

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 14, 1920.)

1. Assignments ¶4, 41—Written consent to handing over money that might become due hold a valid assignment.

Where sale of land was made, and check for $10,000 to be deposited pending close of sale, and a writing were given to the agent making the sale, reciting, "If the sale is finally concluded, you have our consent to pay over to F. [the agent] $3,750 out of said sum as his commission," and the agent deposited them with a trust company, there was a valid assignment, any language showing intention of owner of chose in action to transfer it being sufficient, and it not being essential that the fund assigned should have an actual existence at the time; it being sufficient if it exists potentially.

2. Trusts ¶38—Acceptance of money and papers without objection an acceptance of trust.

When a trust company without objection received money and papers containing directions as to the disposal of the money, it accepted the trust.

3. Assignments ¶59—Not revocable by assignor.

An assignment of part of a fund in the hands of a third person could not be revoked and ownership reviewed at the pleasure of the assignor.

4. Assignments ¶30—Persons claiming by assignment cannot complain it is partial.

Where a contest is between interpleaders, each contending to be assignees of debtor of a fund in the hands of a trustee, neither of the parties can complain that there was an assignment of only a portion of the debt; neither the debtor nor the trustee making any objection to the division.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Daniel E. Bird, Judge.

"Not to be officially published."

Action by Halvorson & Chappelle against the Commerce Trust Company, in which Fred B. Gillette was required to interplead. Judgment for interpleader, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Guthrie, Conrad & Durham and Hale Houts, all of Kansas City, for appellants.

Harkless & Histed and Hogsett & Boyle, all of Kansas City, for respondent.

ELLISON, P. J. The Publishers' Realty Company owned some real estate in Kansas City, which it sold to one Rahe for $150,000. Rahe was to pay $10,000 at once, to be deposited in the Commerce Trust Company until it was known that the sale would be consummated. Each of two real estate agents (Halvorson & Chappelle and one Gillette) claimed to have made the sale, and each presented a bill for $3,750 commission to the Publishers' Company. One of them, Halvorson & Chappelle, brought suit against the trust company for the amount of the commission. The latter company filed an answer, admitting it had the money, but setting up the rival claimants and asking that Gillette be made a party defendant, and that they be required to interplead. Appropriate orders were made, the trust company paid the money into court, and was discharged. A trial resulted in favor of respondent Gillette, and Halvorson & Chappelle appealed.

The foregoing is a mere synopsis, from which it is not possible to understand the merits of the controversy without these further statements: It is conceded by the parties that each of the claimants performed service for the publishing company in the sale of its property, and that that company is liable to both. The question between them is, Which is entitled to the money awaiting one of them in the hands of the court? The importance of this question will be appreciated when it is known that the publishing company is conceded to be insolvent.

The sale was made to Rahe on the 24th of March, 1917, and on the 27th of March the publishing company informed the trust company that $10,000 of the purchase price was to be deposited with it pending the close of the sale, and "If the sale is finally concluded you have our consent to pay over to F. B. Gillette three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars out of said sum, as his commission." The conceded fact was that this letter, addressed to the trust company, was written when the sale was made at Gillette's request, as an assurance that he would get his commission. Then Gillette in company with the publishing company and Rahe took the contract of sale, together with this letter and Rahe's check for $10,000, and deposited them with the trust company, and it accepted them. Rahe then told Halvorson of the assignment, and the latter said, "You are safe enough; but the publishing company owes me a commission."

On the 14th of May the publishing company notified the trust company that the sale was closed, and directed it to pay $6,250 of the $10,000 to Mr. Beardsley, but that, since it gave its consent that $3,750 could be paid to Gillette as his commission, "it had developed that other parties (Halvorson & Chappelle) are contending that they have a right to this sum and have filed suit therefor; you are therefore directed not to pay the sum to any one until further orders from us."

More than a year afterwards (July 30, 1918) the publishing company and Halvorson & Chappelle, parties to the foregoing suit, entered into a written agreement, reciting, substantially, the foregoing facts, concluding with the agreement that Halvorson & Chappelle would dismiss their suit against the publishing company, and in consideration therefor the "publishing company does hereby assign, transfer and set over to Halvorson & Chappelle the aforesaid sum of $3,750, and any and all causes of action therefor, or choses in action on account thereof, and any and all rights and causes of action whatsoever which it may at this time have growing out of any of the transactions connected with the said sale and the moneys arising therefrom, against said Commerce Trust Company or said Fred B. Gillette."

On the same day of the last paper, and as part of the transaction, Halvorson & Chappelle executed a contract to the publishing company, whereby, for the latter's indemnity, they agreed that if they recovered anything from the trust company on the assignment to them it should be deposited in a certain other trust company, known as the Pioneer Trust Company, to be held for a time named as indemnity to the publishing company in the event it became liable to the Commerce Trust Company or to Rahe by reason of making the assignment to Halvorson & Chappelle.

The respondent, Gillette, claims the money ($3,750) owing to him by the publishing company as his commission, and deposited with the trust company, was assigned to him by the publishing company in the letter of March 27th referred to above; and that the attempted revocation of that assignment May 14th and the assignment to appellants more than a year afterwards (July 30, 1918) were nullities as to him, especially when it is considered that he had the order on the trust company to pay him $3,750 as his commission when the deal should be finally consummated.

[1, 2] Appellants attack respondent's assignment on the ground that it was, by its own terms, a mere consent or direction to the trust company to pay part of the funds in its possession at a future time, and that it was not an agreement for an assignment then made; that it was subject to be, and was, revoked prior to the time at which payment was authorized. We think the written "consent" or "direction" that the money should be paid to Gillette and handed over to the trust company with the deposit of the money was a valid assignment. "Any language, however informal, if it shows the intention of the owner of the chose in action to transfer it, will be sufficient to vest the property therein in the assignee." 5 Corpus Juris, 906, 910, 915, citing Sanguinett v. Webster, 153 Mo. 343, 370, 54 S. W. 563; Macklin v. Kinealy, 141 Mo. 113, 122, 41 S. W. 893; Smith v. Sterrett, 24 Mo. 200. It is said in same authority (page 924, § 85) that—

"It is not essential that the fund assigned should have an actual existence at the time the order is drawn, but it is sufficient if it exists potentially."

But in this case the fund and the order of assignment were, as we have seen, deposited with the trust company together. For when it, the trust company, received the money and papers without objection, it accepted the trust. Robbins v. Kline, 60 Ohio St. 199, 54 N. E. 94; Hackett v. Campbell, 10 App. Div. 523, 42 N. Y. Supp. 47.

[3] It follows on the most simple principle that, if the assignment to Gillette was valid, it could not be revoked and ownership revived at the pleasure of the assignor. 5 Corpus Juris, 938, sec. 101.

[4] There is a rule of law that one having a single claim against a debtor cannot split it up into many and thus harass the debtor with several actions. This rule is without application to this case, for neither the publishing company, as debtor, nor the Commerce Trust Company, has made any objection to dividing the $10,000 deposit into two claims. In fact the publishing company, as seen in its letter to the trust company attempting to revoke its assignment to Gillette, itself divided the fund by directing the trust company to pay $6,250 of it to Mr. Beardsley, thus only leaving $3,750 in the trust company's hands. We disposed of a like question in Johnson County v. Bryson, 27 Mo. App. 341, 349, in these words:

"It is insisted that as this was an assignment of only a portion of the debt, it cannot be enforced. Such is the law in this state as between an assignee and the debtor. Burnett v. Crandall, 63 Mo. 410. But it must be borne in mind that the contest here is between the interpleaders, each contending to be assignees of Keene. Johnson county is not making the objection, and it has been held in a recent case that the right to object to splitting a single debt into many is one which the debtor may waive. Fourth Nat. Bank v. Noonan, 88 Mo. 372."

The same is said in Turner v. Lord, 92 Mo. 113, 117, 4 S. W. 420.

We cannot see any good reason for a discussion of the merits of the "finding of facts" which were submitted by the appellant for the court to find, nor for an extended consideration of the several declarations of law. Some of these declarations would doubtless be proper in a case to which they applied. But here, as we have already said, the undisputed facts—the facts upon which no issue exists—are these: That respondent, Gillette, earned a commission of $3,750 for his effort in the sale of the publishing company's property to Rahe; that it was agreed that $10,000 of the purchase money was to be deposited with the Commerce Trust Company at the time of the signing of the contract of sale; that the publishing company by writing directed or consented that on the closing or consummation of the sale the trust company should pay to respondent, Gillette, $3,750 as commission due him; that the contract of sale, together with the $10,000 payment and the order to pay respondent, Gillette, commission of $3,750 out of said $10,000 were all taken by Gillette and handed over to the trust company, which accepted the same; that in a few weeks afterwards the publishing company, by writing, notified the trust company that the sale was closed, and to pay $6,250 of the $10,000 on deposit with it to H. M. Beardsley, but not to pay the $3,750 it had before consented should be paid to respondent, Gillette, until further orders.

Practically all of this was in writing. There is no dispute except as to the law on these conceded facts, and that we have already discussed. It is true that appellant denies the assignment to Gillette, but that is merely a denial that these conceded facts constituted an assignment. And appellants say in closing their brief that—

"Finally, referring to the statement of facts hereinbefore set out and the discussions as to findings of fact under point 1 and declarations of law under point 11, we insist that upon the record appellants, as a matter of law, are entitled to the fund in question. This is so both for the reasons set out in discussion of declarations 3, 4, and 6, to wit, that there was no assignment at all and for the reasons set out in discussion of declaration 5, to wit, that the Exhibit 2, if an assignment, it was at most a partial assignment, and therefore ineffective to pass title as against appellants' assignment."

We see no likeness between this case and Pickett v. School Dist., 193 Mo. App. 519, 186 S. W. 533, Alexander v. Grand Ave. Ry., 54 Mo. App. 66, and Mo. Pac. Ry. v. Wright, 38 Mo. App. 141, cited by appellants.

After a careful examination of the record we conclude that the judgment should be affirmed.

All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Schuyler County; N. M. Pettingill, Judge.

"Not to be officially published."

Suit for divorce by Otha Revercomb against Alice Revercomb. From decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Harry J. Libby, of Shelbina, for appellant. Higbee & Mills, of Kirksville, for respondent.

TRIMBLE, J. Herein a husband sues for divorce on the ground that his wife has been guilty of such indignities as to render his condition intolerable. The wife files no cross-bill and asks no affirmative relief, but does file an answer admitting the marriage and the settlement of the property rights as alleged in the petition, but denies everything else and contests the suit. The trial court granted plaintiff a divorce as prayed, whereupon defendant appealed, and the question for our determination is whether plaintiff is entitled to a divorce.

The parties were married in Shelby county

September 17, 1904, he being then 23 and she 20 years of age. At that time she was in perfect health and had been so all her life. Each was reared on a farm within five miles of one another, and their courtship had extended over a period of five years. They were poor, the husband having only a horse and a cow and the wife a horse, cow, and $50 in money. They were ambitious, industrious young people, and both worked and strove to get along in the world, the husband seeking to educate himself, and the wife striving with all her energy to help him in every way she could. The first six months of their married life they lived on the farm at his mother's home. In March, 1905, the couple went to Chillicothe where the husband enrolled as a student in the Chillicothe Normal and Business School and they rented rooms and did "light housekeeping." In June or July following the husband became sick, and on that account the young couple returned to his mother's home. They stayed there until in December, when they moved to an adjoining farm which plaintiff had purchased in the October preceding. Here they lived for two years, during one of which plaintiff farmed, and the other he taught the district school. From this farm they moved in the fall of 1907 to a Mr. Michaels' farm in Marion county, where they lived till February, 1908, the husband teaching school. They then moved to Lakenan, Mo., and lived there two years; from there they went to Hunnewell, where they resided two years; and from there they went to Sturgeon in the fall of 1913. They lived there during the school term for three years and part of the fourth, or until the last of February, 1917, which is an important date, as will hereinafter appear. The parties seem to have striven with a mutual ambition to be economical and save for a home and for the husband's education. This latter aim they appear to have pursued successfully, for during the vacation periods the husband attended the Normal School at Chillicothe and Kirksville and was for a time in Chicago University; and he is at the present time, or was at the time of the trial, teaching mathematics in one of the higher schools of the state.

Except for the time they lived with plaintiff's mother, and for a while at Sturgeon when they were waiting for their household goods to arrive, and for a time after said household effects were destroyed by a fire, the couple kept house, the wife doing all the work thereof, and keeping matters neat and tidy, except during periods of illness which will shortly be mentioned. The witnesses describe the wife as being a good housewife, keeping her home in order, attentive to her domestic duties, economical, industrious, quiet, and retiring in disposition, and apparently devoted to her husband. When they lived at Hunnewell, she taught as one of the teachers in the grade school, receiving the munificent sum of $30 or $35 per month, which, with the exception of one month's warrant which she used to buy clothes, was deposited to her husband's account.

In the spring of 1916 the house in which they lived at Sturgeon was destroyed by fire and their household goods were burned. A part of these goods had been procured by the wife in "taking orders," which we interpret to mean selling something on a commission. These household goods were insured for $1,200.

Unfortunately, whenever the wife became pregnant she was affected with such violent and continued vomiting that, in order to keep her from dying, physicians were compelled to perform operations on her to relieve the womb of its contents. She seems to have been anxious to have children, but each time she became pregnant the results were as above stated, and five times an operation was performed on her, of which two produced the most serious effects, once in November, 1914, and once thereafter while they lived at Sturgeon. At these times she was rendered very ill, exceedingly so in November, 1914, and even on the last occasion she was confined to her bed for some weeks. The evidence of the physician who treated her during one of these times is that the effect of such disturbance upon the nervous system is one of extreme depression, and that it might or could produce delirium, though he did not notice that she was delirious at the times he waited on her. These abortions, however, produced a marked and lasting effect upon her health. When finally it became certain that it was impossible for her to bear children, she besought her husband to permit her to adopt a child, and this seems to have been agreed upon but was never done.

On account of the wife's health the husband did not want her to teach any more, so when they left Sturgeon for the summer vacation of their second year there the wife did not attend the Normal summer session with her husband, as formerly, but went to stay at her father's while he attended school; the intention being that she could finish her training after he had completed his educational course. They returned to Sturgeon for the school year of 1915-16 and kept house as before. As heretofore stated, the household goods were destroyed by fire in the spring of 1916, and when the parties returned to Sturgeon that fall they boarded for about three weeks at the hotel. The wife says that at this time the husband thought it would be less expensive if she would return to her father's, and she did so. She says that a short while before Christmas of 1916 the husband wrote her that, owing to some gossip concerning him and a woman in Sturgeon, he thought it best for her to come back in order to stop the gossip. She did so, and they got a house and set up a household. They lived thus until in February, 1917, when, according to the wife's version, the husband again decided it was cheaper to board; and, as they were planning to go to school together the following year, he suggested that she go to her father's and raise a garden and put up fruit in order to lessen living expenses. (The petition alleges that the separation took place in February, 1917, and the husband testified that they separated at that time, and denied that he suggested she go to her father's to save expenses and to can fruit.) The wife, however, did go to her father's, and she says she put up a large quantity of canned goods, intended for their use the next year when they would be in school together. It is conceded that when the wife left Sturgeon in February, 1917, the husband did not tell her he was going to separate from her. She says she had no idea he was going to do so. He says she knew it as well as he did, but just how she knew it is not disclosed. He says they quarreled and their parting was not pleasant. He admits he wrote to her thereafter and sent her $5 a month, and on her birthday, May 30, 1917, sent her $5 additional as a birthday present.

In March, 1917, the husband was attacked with appendicitis and went to the hospital in Kirksville to be operated on. He did not notify his wife until a week after the operation was performed, when he had a man friend, a fellow school-teacher, to write her he was doing nicely, getting along all right, would be able to come home in a few days, and that she "should not come on account of the expense." While the husband admits he had the letter written, he attempts, in a way, to deny that he directed her not to come. But the letter was introduced in evidence showing that this direction was in it, the friend who wrote it testified he sent it, and the wife did get it, and the husband, on cross-examination, when asked if he did not tell his friend to write his wife not to come on account of expense, answered, "I am not sure, on account of expenses; I might have said there was no need of it." When pressed if he did not say to tell his wife she ought not to come on account of expense, he said, "I am not sure; it wasn't necessary." We regard it as clear that he did direct her not to come. She had no money of her own, and because of this letter advising her not to come she did not go to him, but wrote.

After he recovered from the operation, he, some time in May, 1917, or near that, went to his mother's and had her to telephone his wife he was there. She came and stayed all night with him, and the next morning took him to the train so that he could return to his work. On the way to the station, and while waiting for the train, they planned their work in school together during the coming winter, and thereafter he continued to send her money until the fall of that year, 1917. The first the wife knew of any intended separation was when she received a letter, dated October 27, 1917, from a firm of Kirksville lawyers, telling her they had been consulted by her husband with reference to procuring a divorce and asking that a meeting be had to discuss a property settlement.

Upon receipt of this letter the wife called her husband, who was at Kirksville, over the phone, and wanted him to come to her, but he said he was sick, and when she told him she would come to Kirksville, he told her not to come. The wife then went to her husband's mother and besought her to use her influence with her son to get him to live with her, the defendant, but the mother refused. The next day the wife went to Kirksville, found her husband in bed, and when she asked him how long he had been sick he told her to take the first train back home. She sat down and pleaded with him for them to live together, and he told her he did not want a divorce; that all he wanted was a settlement of their property rights. She begged to be allowed to stay and wait on him, but he refused. He promised her that, if she would go home and wait, he would come and talk it over with her. Upon this promise she went to a friend's in Kirksville, to whom he suggested she should go, but when she returned to his boarding house the next morning he was gone, although he had led his wife to believe he was very ill when she left the night before. She stayed in Kirksville several days waiting for him to return to his room, but, as he did not come, she returned to her father's.

Not hearing from him, she asked two of his men friends to use their influence with him. They informed her he was at his mother's. When at Kirksville, in promising her they would meet and talk it over, he had told her they would meet at his mother's, so when she heard he was there she went over to meet him, but he was not there. She stayed most of the day but he did not put in an appearance.

The day after Thanksgiving he sent the two friends, whom she had asked to intercede for her, to arrange for a meeting at Shelbyna. With her father and three friends of both parties they met, and a settlement of their property was finally entered into. The disinterested friends testify that she did not want a divorce, was very much opposed to it, and would not sign any settlement until the husband assured her he did not want a divorce and was not going to seek one. Upon this she signed the contract settling their property rights. This was in December, 1917.

It is in evidence by disinterested witnesses that, both before and after this contract was signed, the wife made repeated efforts to get her husband to live with her. The husband himself conceded on cross-examination that his wife had asked him to live with her, he was unable to say how many times, but would not say it was many. He also admitted that when the two friends sent by her to intercede with him came to him he told them "they could do no good"; that when she asked him to be reconciled he told her "it was impossible." That when the friends asked him to reconsider, he gave the same answer, "Impossible."

To these two friends, who a number of times talked to him at his wife's request to effect a reconciliation, he did not give any reason for not living with her, but always his statement was that he positively would not live with her.

One evening the wife was at the home of one of these friends and the husband came in. As soon as he saw his wife he turned and went out and asked the friend to come outside as he wanted to see him on business. The wife prevailed upon her host and hostess to get her husband to come back into the house and talk matters over with her. They did so, and he finally came in, and an hour was spent in talking matters over by the four, the friend and his wife and the two parties hereto. The friend, or host on this occasion, testified that in this conversation the wife expressed a desire that they live together again, but the husband said "he positively would not live with her"; that on this occasion he gave as his reasons for not living with her she was "high-tempered and nagged him" and refused to "prepare his meals for him"; "he had lived out of tin cans a week;" and that he had often taken a razor from under her pillow. To this the wife said that she was sick at those times and was not at herself and did not know what she was doing; that she would "do any way in the world to live with him again"; that he gave as additional reasons why he would not live with her that she had threatened to take her life, and that when he was sick in the hospital for several weeks she not only did not come to see him, but did not write to him or send any word; that if she had come to him at that time there might have been a reconciliation. This referred to the time he was operated on for appendicitis, when, as we have already seen, he did not notify his wife of his illness until a week after the operation, and then had a friend to write her not to come on account of the expense. In this same conversation at the friend's house he also said his wife had accused him of being intimate with another woman; whereupon his wife spoke up and said, "Otha, you know there was talk of you and that other teacher down there, and you know I didn't believe that and shielded you in that." (The facts about this matter will be hereinafter stated, from which it will appear that this could not be regarded as any ground for divorce.)

The wife of the aforesaid friend (the hostess on the occasion when the four had the conversation hereinabove related) testified that in said conversation the wife begged her husband to live with her, but that his only answer to her was he positively would not live with her; that the reasons he gave were that they were not congenial, and he did not think he was sufficiently fed; that she had threatened her life, and he had taken razors from under her pillow; he never said she had threatened his life, but hers; that the only thing the wife said on this occasion which could be regarded as being a veiled accusation that he had had unlawful abortions performed upon her was, "Otha, you know why my health is ruined," and she did not say this in an accusing way, but in a pleading manner.

The husband brought suit for divorce on September 26, 1918; and it is unquestioned that between the time he first had her notified by letter in October, 1917, and the time suit was brought, the wife made repeated efforts to effect a reconciliation and to be allowed to live with him, and, in addition to her own efforts, had friends to intercede for her, but to all her pleadings and to those who were sent to him, he was adamant, giving as a reason for not living with her that it was "impossible."

What was it the wife had done which was so intolerable that nothing could change his settled determination not to have anything further to do with her, and make him turn a deaf and unforgiving ear to all her efforts at wooing him back, and when was it that he arrived at this irrevocable decision?

With regard to the time when he realized matters were intolerable and decided to separate, it should be observed that the petition alleges that the separation took place February 27, 1917; and, as before stated, the husband testified they separated at Sturgeon on that date after a quarrel, that their parting was not pleasant, and that his wife knew he was going to separate from her as well as he did. He admitted, however, that he wrote to her after his wife returned to her father's, and that he sent her money regularly and gave her the $5 birthday present. He also admitted that when he went to his mother's after his operation he had his mother to telephone his wife he was there. He did not tell his mother they had separated; for the mother says he did not tell her they had separated, and she says that the first she knew of the separation was when the wife came to her with the divorce papers and wanted the mother to induce plaintiff to come back and live with her, his wife, which the mother refused to even attempt to do. (It may be, although it is not altogether clear and beyond doubt, that the "divorce papers" here referred to by the mother was the letter of October 27, 1917, from the Kirksville lawyers, and not the process in the divorce suit after it was brought in September, 1918; but, even so, this was long after plaintiff says he and his wife had separated, she knowing it as well as he.) Although plaintiff alleged in his petition and testified that the separation occurred in February, 1917, at Sturgeon, and that the wife knew it then, yet, later on in redirect examination, in speaking of his operation for appendicitis, he said it was before the separation. The operation was in March, 1917; consequently, if it was before the separation, the latter could not have taken place in February, 1917.

The evidence offered and relied upon in support of plaintiff's right to a divorce and to justify his claim of "intolerable indignities" consists solely of the testimony of plaintiff and his mother and certain excerpts from letters written by defendant to plaintiff. The matters testified to by plaintiff relate wholly to things occurring when he and his wife were alone, and this evidence, and also the letters, were objected to on the ground that they were privileged communications between husband and wife and were therefore not admissible. It is contended by the respondent that the incompetency of this evidence was waived; but before passing upon this feature of the case we prefer to set out the evidence relied upon to justify the granting of a divorce.

The husband testified that during the first part of their married life his wife did not often get angry, but in the latter part thereof she was frequently "very pouty and angry"; that whenever she had an "angry spell" she would accuse him of burning the house to collect the insurance on the household goods; that she also accused him of falsely performing criminal abortions on her; that at the time of these accusations as to abortions her manner was "angry" and her attitude was "threatening"; that upon one occasion his wife got angry with him because he was going to send his mother some clothes to make a comfort and had bought her a watch for a present the preceding Christmas, and on this occasion she said to him, "I will kill you," and came at him with a knife. He did not know what kind of a knife it was, and says she did not touch him; nor does he say anything was done by him to avoid or prevent the threat from being carried out. In fact, his testimony does not impress us as being a full and complete picture of the various matters complained of, but consists, many times, of sententious answers which carry the impression that only a scant and limited light was to be let in on the matters to illuminate the setting and surroundings.

He further testified that she threatened to kill herself; that sometimes in the night he would be awakened by her groaning, and on putting his hand over on her he would find that she had his razor in her hand which she had put under her pillow when she retired; that on these occasions he would take the razor away; that once she had the butcher knife and once a pair of scissors, and once he was awakened by her groaning, and upon investigation he found she had tied one end of a rope around her neck and the other end was around the bedstead, and she was pulling on it; that in about a week the same thing occurred again, and he burned the rope; that she threatened to poison herself, and he threw the only poisonous thing they had out of the house and hid the razor; that once, the second year after they were married, they were returning home in the buggy, and she was holding the lines and they got to "scuffling," and "in some way she got hurt, but not bad, just a little slap"; that she, upon getting to the house, said she was going home, and went out to the well curb and sat there for two hours, but when her husband went to her and told her "it was all playful" and he "didn't mean a thing," she got in a good humor.

He further testified that in December, 1916, he went to Moberly to meet a man friend there by appointment at the hotel to talk over some educational work, this friend of his being also a school-teacher, and that after their business was transacted this friend took him to the picture show, and then they went back to the hotel, where he spent the night, he leaving the next morning at 5:30 and going back home; that, upon happening to remark that he had gone to the picture show, his wife "got angry about me spending money and throwing money away on people that just wanted to use me." When asked by his counsel what her appearance was on this occasion, he replied, "Angry," and when asked what she said when angry, his answer was, "She said I was throwing away money on people that didn't care anything for me." He further testified that his wife was jealous of him, and when asked to tell about the jealousy, he said, "She was jealous of my men friends and of my mother, any one that was a friend of mine," and when asked what she ever said that led him to believe she was jealous, he replied, "She said I cared more for other people than her; that I cared more for mother and more for Mr. Cosby." He further testified that she told him he had no loyal friends, his relations and cousins did not care for him, and that she said this "in an angry manner" and repeated it "on different occasions." He further testified that the last year they lived at Sturgeon often when he would leave in the morning she would tell him she would not be there when he got back.

On cross-examination he denied having told his wife it was too expensive for them to board at Sturgeon, and denied having induced her to go to her father's to raise a garden and put up fruit for the next year. He also denied having written his wife to come to Sturgeon for the purpose of quieting the gossip about him and a woman there. He admitted that while he was teaching the first year there one of the directors cautioned him that he was "showing too many favors" to a lady teacher there, but asserted that these favors were not undue attentions on the part of a man toward a woman, but only the favors of putting her at the head of the school and appointing her to tasks her ability warranted, and that the caution was so as not to make the other teachers dissatisfied. He denied knowing of any gossip connecting him with a lady. But he was pressed to say if, while his wife was at her father's, he did not write her to come to Sturgeon, that there was talk, and if she were there the gossip would cease. He did not answer the question as to whether he so wrote his wife, but went on to say that the last year he was at Sturgeon his wife was at her father's and he was staying at the hotel in Sturgeon, and he "heard gossip about the hotel," and he asked the president of the school board "if there was anything to it," and the president said he "didn't know, but there had been the past year," and he (plaintiff) thereupon asked him "if he didn't think it would be better if we were keeping house," and that then he procured a house from a lady who was going to Kansas City. He denied telling his wife about the gossip when she came. He says that his wife was very sick four times during their married life. He would not say she was "desperately" sick, but on one of the occasions it was thought the likelihood was she would die. He testified that on one occasion, Sunday morning, after he had made the fire and gone for the mail, his wife refused to get up and get breakfast or to get dinner, and he got his meals out of tin cans. His wife says she never failed to get his meals except on the occasions when she was ill, and that they both lived a great deal on canned goods from motives of economy.

Plaintiff's mother testified that once when she was at their home plaintiff wanted to go and nurse a sick neighbor, as it was plaintiff's turn to wait on him, but defendant objected, saying she would lock the door and not let him in when he came back. He went, but his wife did not lock the door. When he returned his wife accused him of being somewhere else, but she, the mother, reassured her by calling her attention to the fact that her husband's clothes smelt like chloroform, the medicine used upon the man he went to nurse. This must have been when the wife was sick, as the mother says in that connection she went to their home when she was called in sickness. However, in another place she says she kept house for them a while when they both were teaching at Hunnewell, but otherwise was with them in sickness. She testified that when she was with them in Sturgeon she knew they were not getting along, but did not know the cause; that on one occasion when a message came over the phone purporting to be from the husband's "Cousin Charley" at the hotel the husband invited "Charley" to come down to the house, but the latter said he could not, and wanted plaintiff to come to the hotel, and the wife said "it was spending money; didn't think he went to the picture show, and didn't think his cousin was in town."

The mother testified that the wife came to her and wanted her to have her son live with her, his wife, and in this conversation the wife made accusations against her husband. An attempt was made to show by her that the wife in this conversation accused her husband of performing criminal abortions upon her, but her testimony as to what the wife said was that "she took treatment from him that she knew nothing about," or "took treatment from him while she knew nothing about it." The mother further testified that the wife tried to get her to induce her son to come and live with the wife, and upon her refusing to do so the wife said she knew enough about the fire to put him in the penitentiary, and if he did not come to live with her she would use what she knew and his mother would look at him through the bars. It developed on cross-examination that these alleged accusations on the part of the wife were stated by her to the mother when the wife came to her "with the papers for divorce," whereupon a motion was made to strike out the testimony because, being made after the alleged cause of action, if any, had accrued, they could not constitute indignities to be relied on. Before this motion was ruled on, evidence was elicited from the witness tending to show that the occasion to which she alluded "must have been" in 1917, and that what the witness continued to call "the papers for divorce" was in fact the letter from the Kirksville attorneys hereinbefore referred to. Thereupon the motion to strike out was overruled. On recross-examination the witness said that when the wife came to her with the letter she had received was the first time she knew the two had separated; that her son had never told her nor had he ever intimated to her that he was having trouble, nor had the wife said a word to her about it, though she staid awhile at witness' home that spring. The witness said the wife had "pouty spells." With regard to the mother having charged the wife with taking the mother's watch, the mother explained the circumstance from her viewpoint by saying that she, the mother, merely asked her daughter-in-law, "Did you pick up my watch?" and did not charge her with having stolen it. The mother says she, the mother, had been wearing the watch and had left it lying on the dresser in the bedroom, and after her daughter-in-law had been in the bedroom she, the mother, missed it and asked her daughter-in-law the above question, whereupon the daughter-in-law said to her, "You have charged me with stealing," and the daughter-in-law's sister thereupon called her attention to the fact that she, the mother, had the watch on her person.

The wife testified that she had always treated her husband with the highest respect and the best she knew how; that she was always fond of him and foolish over him; that she did not quarrel with him; that they did have misunderstandings sometimes, but they never let the day go by without making them up, except once, when his mother was there and caused trouble between them; that the mother's attitude was sometimes friendly, but that she would criticize the way the household duties were performed, more particularly the washing. The wife regarded the mother as opposed to her, but she was not allowed to testify as to things the mother did to wound her feelings. The wife testified that there was no quarrel between her and her husband when she left Sturgeon to go to her father's; that she did not make any accusations against him concerning another woman, but only pleaded with him to be careful of his actions so as to give no occasion for gossip; that when she came to Sturgeon in response to his letter to come and thus stop the gossip she did not believe the charges against her husband and refused to allow others to talk to her concerning them; that the reason she did not go to him when he was in the hospital was because of the letter he had caused to be written concerning the expense; that she was advised by the husband's mother not to telephone him as she had started to do, but this was excluded by the court as being immaterial.

The wife denied that she had ever threatened to kill her husband; that at times following the operations when she was seriously sick, and even when she was able to go about the house, her nerves were for a time in such condition that she was not at herself; also that, after she got word from her husband to go to Shelbyna to make the contract with reference to the property settlement or he would leave for France and she would never see him again, she was in a delirious condition so that a doctor was sent for, but she knew nothing of it; that her then disturbed mental condition did not get all right until a few days after the settlement contract had been signed; that she did not accuse her husband of setting fire to the house, and did not charge her husband "in an accusing way" of having performed criminal abortions upon her; that after her operation as Sturgeon there were "lots of times" when she did not know what she was doing, but only knew of it from what they told her; that she never knowingly told her husband she would take her life. She says the first she knew of the rope episode was when her husband took it from her; that it occurred after they had retired at night; that she had no recollection of having locked herself in the closet threatening to kill herself, but presumed her husband must have broken the door open, as he says he did, for she saw that the side piece was broken and he told her he broke it; that her husband did not get angry at her for having attempted to take her life on the occasion mentioned, for he realized her condition and was kind to her except when his mother was there.

With regard to the matter of gossip concerning the husband's relations toward a woman in Sturgeon, the president of the school board testified that he went to the husband at the time and "cautioned him against some criticism I had heard of him," and when plaintiff's counsel, in an endeavor to show that it was not of an improper nature, and that his caution was merely against showing too much favoritism to one school-teacher over another, pressed the witness as to the husband's reputation for morality, the witness said his reputation in that regard the last year he was at Sturgeon was not good. It is true the defendant had announced that she made no attack on plaintiff's morality, and such evidence cannot be accepted for that purpose, but it can be regarded as throwing great light upon her husband's complaint, as one of his grounds for divorce, that his wife accused him with regard to other women. She says she never did accuse him and never believed him guilty, but only pleaded with him not to act in a way to create talk. Even if her statements to him be regarded as accusations, they would not constitute indignities unless they were unfounded.

The foregoing is a résumé, somewhat in detail, of the evidence upon which a divorce is asked, except as to the so-called accusations made in the letters written by the wife to the husband. The plaintiff offered in evidence as Exhibits B, C, D, E, and F certain excerpts from defendant's letters to him. Exhibit B was an excerpt from page 2 of an undated letter; and Exhibits D, E, and F, were excerpts from a letter dated May 17, 1918. These excerpts were offered to show the alleged accusations which the husband claims constitutes some, at least, of the indignities on which he seeks a divorce. These matters relate to the alleged charges of the wife as to intimacy with other women, the burning of the house to get the insurance, and the performing of unlawful abortions upon her.

[1] We have now reached the point where we must take up the question of the admissibility, not only of these letters, but also of the verbal communications taking place between the husband and wife when no one was present. It is well settled that private communications between husband and wife are not admissible. Berlin v. Berlin, 52 Mo. 151; Miller v. Miller, 14 Mo. App. 418, 421; Ayers v. Ayers, 28 Mo. App. 97, 100, 101; Long v. Martin, 152 Mo. 668, 674, 54 S. W. 473; Gruner v. Gruner, 183 Mo. App. 157, 171, 165 S. W. 865. But the plaintiff says the incompetency of these was waived, and, as we understand it, this claim of waiver can be classified under three heads: (1) Because defendant cross-examined plaintiff as to other communications; (2) that defendant herself also testified to confidential communications; and (3) that defendant requested the whole of the letters be introduced in evidence. The record, however, discloses that whatever was done by defendant on which plaintiff predicates waiver was done after her objection to the competency of the entire line of testimony concerning confidential communications had been overruled by the court. When the first testimony concerning communications was offered by plaintiff, the defendant elicited the fact that they were private and made when no one was present, and then objected to any testimony on the part of the husband with reference to conversations between them, on the ground they were privileged, and asked that any testimony of that character be excluded. The court said: "The objection is overruled for the present." The defendant excepted, and plaintiff was allowed to answer. Further evidence of communications was elicited, and the record shows this statement, apparently made by the court, though the record does not affirmatively so state: "It is understood that, unless for some other reason, the same objection is made to this line of testimony." A little further on, when evidence of other communications was offered, the defendant, before allowing the question to be answered, elicited that they were made privately and when the parties were alone, and again objected to the testimony as not being competent. But the court overruled the objection, this time without qualification, and again defendant excepted. When the answer was given, the defendant moved to strike it out for the reasons assigned, and this also was overruled, the defendant excepting. A little later, when other evidence of private communications, notably her threats to take her own life, was asked about, the defendant again renewed her objections on the ground that they were private communications between husband and wife. The court overruled the objection, and defendant excepted. Three and perhaps four times thereafter the defendant made the objection, and each time was overruled, and defendant excepted. Whereupon, at the close of a long answer by plaintiff to which the above objection had been made, the court ruled: "I don't know about going too far. I will admit only epithets and verbal acts which amount to indignities." Later on other questions were asked as to communications and defendant again objected "because it is a private communication between husband and wife." The court overruled the objection, and defendant excepted. When the excerpts from her letters were offered, the defendant objected to them several times on the same ground, but the objections were overruled, and exceptions were saved. And when the excerpts were introduced in evidence, over defendant's objections, her counsel then requested that the whole of the letters be introduced.

[2, 3] Now, the alleged waiver did not occur until after defendant had unavailingly objected to the introduction of that kind of testimony and had been overruled. As to what defendant did to constitute waiver, the record shows that the plaintiff was cross-examined in regard to what he had testified to over defendant's objections, or that defendant gave her version of the communications plaintiff had thus testified to. The only instance where it might seem that defendant had elicited other evidence of that character from plaintiff was when he was asked if he had told all his wife said and did on these occasions about which he had been interrogated by his counsel, and the witness proceeded to relate another communication taking place at another time, and about which he had not testified in chief, whereupon the defendant objected to it, but the court ruled that he should proceed. So far as concerns the testimony of the wife as to what her husband said while apparently sick in bed in Kirksville, the record does not disclose that no one else was present, and all her other evidence as to what he said was either giving her version of what he had testified to or else was concerning conversations at which others were present. Under these circumstances, we do not think the defendant waived the incompetency of these private communications. McKee v. Ruda, 222 Mo. 344, 370, 121 S. W. 312, 133 Am. St. Rep. 529. The defendant had at the very outset made the objection and raised the point that all such testimony was inadmissible, and what occurred thereafter was not a waiver thereof, but was a fight made upon the ground to which her adversary, under the ruling of the court, had driven her. The objections and exceptions properly and clearly made were sufficient to preserve the point and defendant did not have to thereafter preserve her rights by continually objecting. Bailey v. Kansas City, 189 Mo. 504, 512, 87 S. W. 1182; Schlerbaum v. Schlerbaum, 157 Mo. 1, 22, 57 S. W. 526, 80 Am. St. Rep. 604. We think the evidence as to the private communications between the parties should have been excluded; and the letters were in the same category. Hall v. Hall, 77 Mo. App. 600, 603; Brown v. Brown, 53 Mo. App. 453. These communications were not such as come within the exception to the rule—that is, ex necessitate rei—since the exception is not one of general necessity where no other witnesses can be had, but on a particular necessity, such violence or injury, etc., of one to the other. State v. Vaughn, 136 Mo. App. 645, 118 S. W. 1186. The alleged threat to kill the husband, coupled with the coming at him with a knife, may come within the exception, but none of the other things do. And, as to this threat, the evidence of it is too meager, too inconsistent with the conceded conduct and course of action by both parties, to be regarded as having any real basis in fact. It is manifest that the husband never regarded the wife's putting the razor under her pillow as any threat or danger to him, and it is also clear that whatever was done in this regard was the result of the profound disturbance to the wife's mental and nervous system, which abortions will so often produce. It is clear that he never acted upon any idea that she ever threatened to kill him, but only that she, in her depression, thought of taking her own life. Not only his entire course of conduct, but his reasons for not living with her, given to the two friends at their house and hereinabove related, show that he never at any time considered himself in danger.

[4] If the matters involved in the private communications be eliminated from the case, there is little left upon which to predicate an action for divorce. The alleged threats and accusations made by the wife to the husband's mother were, of course, not privileged. But we do not understand that a private communication which is incompetent is made competent merely because the same things which formed the subject-matter of those communications were also asserted, upon a different occasion, by a spouse to some one else. But, whatever was said by the wife to the mother, it unquestionably was not the cause of the husband's estrangement, for the reason that at the time they are charged to have been said the husband had already decided upon a divorce. The wife had been notified of that fact, and had gone to the mother to enlist her efforts in behalf of a reconciliation. That a wife, striving to get her mother-in-law to bring the husband back to her, would in the same breath make charges and accusations against the husband in such way as to constitute indignities for which a divorce should be granted, is strange indeed. It is wholly inconsistent with the pathetic, earnest efforts which the wife continually made to retain her husband, from the time she was first notified of his intentions clear up to the last. And when we see the alleged charges and accusations relied upon in the letters and read them, not as bare unrelated excerpts, as plaintiff would have us do, but read the entire letters and grasp the spirit, purpose, and intention of the writer, we cannot resist the conclusion that what the wife said to the mother has likewise been misconstrued and misinterpreted as indignities when they should not be so regarded.

The defendant, after her objection to the excerpts were overruled, asked that the whole of the letters be read in evidence, and, if this be given the effect of a waiver as to the letters, then we may examine them to see what light they throw upon the whole of such alleged charges and accusations which the husband now relies upon as indignities; for his evidence of oral communications in regard thereto are concerning the same charges.

[5, 6] When these letters are read as a whole—there are three of them—they are seen to be, not the manifestations of contemptuous, uncivil, or insulting conduct, or of settled hatred and estrangement, but rather the efforts of a distracted wife frantically trying by every means in her power, even coercion, to get her husband to come back to her. No doubt, ill-advised and incoherent statements are contained therein. No doubt statements were made that are irritating and which were better left unsaid, but, in the light of the manifest spirit in which they were written, they do not constitute indignities. For indignities are such acts as "consist of unmerited contemptuous conduct; any act towards another which manifests contempt for him; contumely, incivility or injury accompanied with insult and amounting to a species of cruelty to the mind." Lynch v. Lynch, 87 Mo. App. 32, 37; Goodman v. Goodman, 80 Mo. App. 274, 281. See, also, Lewis v. Lewis, 5 Mo. 278; Hooper v. Hooper, 19 Mo. 355; Brown on Divorce, p. 208; Bishop on Mar., Divorce & Separation, § 1827. Nor will one or two unconnected acts, or a single indignity, be sufficient; there must be a series of them or a course of conduct as distinguished from an isolated indignity. Kempf v. Kempf, 34 Mo. 212; Dowling v. Dowling, 183 Mo. App. 454, 167 S. W. 1077; Gruner v. Gruner, 183 Mo. App. 157, 165 S. W. 865. Where accusations are relied upon to constitute indignities, they must not only be false, but must have been made without warrant or foundation and with the intent to wound. These letters nowhere contain anything of this character or an element impeaching the wife's good faith in her admonitions to her husband. On the contrary, they show on her part a deep and abiding affection for him, a deep concern for his spiritual welfare, and exhorting him to do right. Listen to this plea in the very opening sentence of the first letter, begging him not to go on with his contemplated divorce:

"Dear, I am writing you once more, although I do not expect to get an answer. I have done everything within my power to keep you from going wrong, but if you still persist you will have to go. I can do no more. If you really want to be rid of me and have tired of me, I shall not try to keep you, though I love you. I do not think you know what you do want; I know you better than you know yourself. Why didn't you come to me and tell me you wanted to do this?"

Although she refers to the operations performed on her and charges him with the "ruination" of her health, yet even this sentence closes with the statement:

"But I always thought you did it to relieve my suffering, though you acted unwisely. Then there are other things. I know you would have something studied out to offer, but remember truth will prevail above all things else. I have always upheld you because you were my husband and I loved you more than anything else, and let me say now I would try to find excuses for you if you repented of this act and made things right. Dear, every one has to live his own life and answer for his own acts, whether right or wrong."

What was this "act" she wanted him to repent of? Not the act of performing a criminal abortion, but the act of leaving her and seeking a divorce.

The alleged charge of his having no loyal friends is made in the course of an argument against his persisting in his determination to leave her, the consequences of which, as well as the spirit and purpose of the writer, are contained in the concluding words of this part of the letter, viz.:

"No one around here who knows this would have confidence in you as before. This will follow you through life; no matter where you go, you cannot get away from it. It will all come home to you. Then God pity you. Otha, how can you take advantage of one who has trusted you as I have?"

In this same letter from which an excerpt only is offered to show "Intolerable Indignities" occurs these passages:

"I sit and cry, but I know that does no good. I am not telling you this to arouse your sympathy if you have any; I only want you to know in what condition you are leaving me, which makes your act seem the more contemptible. It hurts me to think that you may some time suffer as you have before, and will have no one to care for you. For, Otha, no one will ever wait on you as I have. Who would carry your slop jar when you were sick the same as when you were well, etc., as I have always done? But some men do not appreciate such things. Have you ever thought of these things? You and I were each born on Saturday, engaged on Saturday, married on Saturday, you sought the lawyers on Saturday, and we saw one another last on Saturday. Do you wonder that Saturday has become a day of terror for me? * * * I shall not try to force my presence on you if I am not wanted and am in your way. Otha, although people say you want to marry some one, I cannot believe you so dishonorable. I know how you like to have a good time, and as I said before you are sometimes careless in your actions, which may lead people to gossip, but I believe in you in that respect. I know there have been some who exercised an influence over you, but I cannot believe you care for them. It is hard to realize what a mean girl can do once she has an influence over any one. Don't be angry with me if I ask you once again to be careful of your actions. I am in earnest, for there has been a great deal of gossip about you at Kirksville. I have not let it influence me against you."

Even the letter of May 17, 1918, excerpts from which are relied on as charging him with arson, starts out thus:

"Otha, I am writing you again because I want you to know some things which perhaps you do not know, and also I realize you may have been in such a state of mind as to have misunderstood things I have written before. I understood you to say that you did not request Mr. Cosby to write the letter telling of your operation. He says you did and I think the letter proves that. He also says he did not expect me to write to thank him for sending me the information. Neither did you expect me to come to Kirksville to see you, as you said not to come on account of expense, the same as you told your mother. Did you accuse her of not caring for you because she did not go? And she could have gone on her own money, while I would have had to use yours, and if I had disobeyed you and gone up there you would have been angry. What else could I do, but worry over your condition and wait for you to come home."

In the course of this letter are the following passages:

"But I believe you do care for me, but [I] have just been thrown aside for a time. I do not see how you can but care when you think over our life together. How I have always trusted you, even before marriage. You may think to put me out of your life, me and all that I have been to you, but you will learn something; there are bridges that won't burn. You will sometimes think of me. You said that night I was at Kirksville that I didn't care for you; that I only thought you could make a better living for me than some one else. Dear, why did you say such a thing? * * * If I did not care for you why did I always worry about you if you were late coming home—afraid something had happened to you. Mr. Shouse said, if I was a sister of his, he would not want me to live with you, but I love you and still believe this act of yours is a family weakness and hope you may overcome it. * * * Oh! how I wish I could help you to go the right way. I am praying earnestly and sincerely for you. I remember telling you once that I would not pray for you any more. I was ashamed of saying that and asked forgiveness, for it was said in thoughtlessness and I have never failed to pray for you. I wonder if you sometimes think of how we used to kneel together with an arm around each other while I said my prayers aloud, a part of which was 'forgive us our sins and help us to forgive those who sin against us.' I say us because you were always included and my prayer is the same today. * * * I cannot stand it any longer the suspense, the worry, and worst of all the loneliness. I have tried, but each passing month only makes it harder. I was so happy with you and even as you read this I am thinking of you, loving you, and praying for you, and each night as I go to sleep my heart beats faster and warmer at the thought of all there had been. God bless and keep you, dear."

The reference to the burning of the house is in the nature of an exhortation to him to pay back the insurance; and it clearly appears that whatever she thought he may have done in that regard was caused by what he said to her about it and the way he acted when they left the house prior to its burning.

In a letter of November 20, 1917, she says:

"Dear Otha: I am writing as I could not talk with you, and I want you to read it through, for your sake as well as mine. I did as you said and came home and have not bothered you since, taking your word of honor that you would come home at the end of the year; have talked with a few of our friends, for, Otha, I feel that this is a spell in your life which you cannot help. I never dreamed this would happen to us. I always thought you different and much broader minded. What is education for, if not to help us to overcome family weaknesses and all trials and to be real men and women. I know you are in a weakened and nervous condition, and I can sympathize with you, for you know after my sickness I was under a nervous strain. Little things seem very great and little misunderstandings seem very serious. At times life seemed not worth living, but when you get strong again things will seem different. As for saying you do not care for me, I pay no attention to that, as I think you do not mean it. You said that once before, and it nearly killed me at first, but you got over that, and I forgave you the speech, as I have forgiven you of all unpleasant things in our life. Though, granting you do think that you do not care for me, aren't you man enough to stand by your marriage vow? Otha, you are all I have to live and work for, and I feel that I could forgive you of almost anything. We can let the unpleasant past be forgotten and begin anew. * * * There is but one right way—to live for each other and to make each other happy. I know I have not had an equal chance at schoolwork with you, I having to do housework, washing, and ironing along with my schoolwork, as well as being sick so much, but you know I was always willing to sacrifice that you might go on with your education. Then when we could better afford it I could take up schoolwork under less strenuous conditions, as you always advised your students to do when entering other schools. * * * Otha, when you told me about the gossip about you staying at the hotel, did I question you or appear to doubt you? No, I did not care to know of it, for I believed it false; even when those old gossippers were bold enough to come to me, didn't I turn them down? You know I never let any one talk to me about you. I always upheld you. Then when I tried to talk to you and asked you to be careful of your actions that they would have nothing to base their gossip upon, you resented it, and thought I meant to accuse you.

If I had meant to accuse, I would have lost confidence in you. Can't you see that? * * * Otha, haven't I stood loyal to you in all your trouble? When ——— attacked you through the newspapers, didn't I stand by you and uphold you, though I lost a few friends? Oh! can't you see that this would ruin your life; no matter where you went, it would follow. It would be the very chance the above person would want. He could publish it everywhere because it would be the truth. Oh! don't let it happen. I have always said and still say any two people can get along if both will try. Think this over, and oh, please write to me.
"Alice."

[7, 8] We have carefully studied this record, and cannot escape the conviction that plaintiff has not made out a case for divorce on the ground of indignities. We are aware of the deference that should be paid to the conclusion reached by the trial court, but, with all that, it is well settled that the duty rests with us to examine the record for ourselves and determine the very right of the case as we see it from the evidence. Gruner v. Gruner, 183 Mo. App. 157, 167, 165 S. W. 865; Clarkson v. Clarkson, 22 Mo. App. 236, 246, 247. We need not further analyze the testimony, or the course pursued by the respective parties, to show the construction we place upon the different theories of the case nor the motives actuating the respective parties. Sufficeth it to say that, if the privileged communications be eliminated from the case, there does not remain sufficient evidence to justify a divorce when viewed in the light of the course pursued by the parties hereto. On the other hand, if we consider the case on the whole evidence, including the private communications, we are impressed with the fact that a strained interpretation has been put upon the wife's acts and conduct; that the respective courses pursued by the parties at and after that time show that there was nothing up to the time of the agreed physical separation in February, 1917, which was regarded as "intolerable indignities." There has undoubtedly grown up in the husband a desire to be rid of this wife who, after having striven so earnestly to aid her husband in getting along in the world and whose health is now broken, is now to be put away and divorced, but we are not impressed with the justice and soundness of the reasons advanced therefor.

The judgment is reversed.

LUKENS v. INTERNATIONAL LIFE INS. CO. (No. 13677.)

(Kansas City Court of Appeals, Missouri.
June 14, 1920.)

1. Costs —148—Judgment for item of costs on appeal proper under stipulation.

Despite Rev. St. 1909, §§ 2284, 2285, stipulation of parties, venue of which was laid in trial court, providing for settlement of litigation and judgment for plaintiff for a certain sum, together with all court costs, held to have authorized judgment for plaintiff for an item of costs consisting of the expense of the transcript made out by the clerk of the Supreme Court on appeal.

2. Costs —282—Independent action does not lie for omitted item.

An independent action does not lie for an omitted item of costs.

3. Costs —207—Evidence held to make prima facie case for plaintiff of payment of item.

On plaintiff's motion for judgment under stipulation for the cost of preparing transcript in the Supreme Court as an omitted item of costs, evidence consisting of the certificate of the clerk of the Supreme Court that plaintiff had paid the item to the clerk held to make a prima facie case for plaintiff.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; O. A. Lucas, Judge.

"Not to be officially published."

Action by Maggie L. Lukens against the International Life Insurance Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, which reversed and remanded the cause (269 Mo. 574, 191 S. W. 418), and plaintiff brought error to the Supreme Court of the United States, the case, while pending in such court, being settled by mutual agreement, and plaintiff filed motion for judgment in the amount of an item of costs. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Humphrey, Boxley & Reeves, of Kansas City, for appellant.

Scarritt, Jones, Seddon & North and E. C. Mead, all of Kansas City, for respondent.

ELLISON, P. J. This case was originally tried in the circuit court of Jackson county and judgment rendered on April 1, 1913, in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of $2,690. Defendant appealed the cause to the Supreme Court of this state, and that court reversed and remanded the cause to the circuit court of Jackson county. 269 Mo. 574, 191 S. W. 418. Plaintiff then prosecuted a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, and while the cause was there pending it was settled by mutual agreement to the effect that defendant should pay plaintiff $750 and all court costs. Thereupon the writ of error in the Supreme Court of the United States was dismissed. Defendant paid the sum of $750 and all costs, with the exception of an item of $54, which the plaintiff paid to the clerk of the Supreme Court of the state of Missouri for a transcript of the record in the cause, sent by him to the Supreme Court of the United States, which item the clerk of the Supreme Court of Missouri omitted to show on the mandate sent by that court to the circuit court of Jackson county when it remanded the cause. The clerk, however, issued a supplemental certificate under his hand and the seal of the Supreme Court, certifying that said item of costs had been paid to him by the plaintiff.

Thereafter, on the 7th day of October, 1919, plaintiff filed her motion in the assignment division of the circuit court of Jackson county to allow as a proper item of costs under the stipulation above set out this item of $54, and for judgment for said amount in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant in accordance with the stipulation. At the same time there was filed with the motion the certificate of the clerk of the Supreme Court of Missouri, heretofore mentioned, and the stipulation of the parties, wherein defendant agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of $750 and all court costs, and agreed that, in case such payment was not made within 10 days after the date of said stipulation, judgment should be entered in the cause in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant for $750 and costs of suit. No contention is made by the defendant that the 10 days had not expired. On the 11th day of October, 1919, the motion came on for hearing in the assignment division of the circuit court of Jackson county and was submitted upon the motion, stipulation, and certificate. No other evidence was adduced. The court sustained the motion and rendered judgment against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff for $54.

It is the contention of the plaintiff that, since the writ of error had been dismissed in the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court of Missouri had reversed and remanded the cause for a new trial, and its mandate was on file in the circuit court of Jackson county, the said circuit court had jurisdiction to entertain said motion and render judgment in accordance with the stipulation of the parties, and that there was sufficient evidence before the court to sustain such judgment. The stipulation between the parties, referred to above, is as follows:

"In the Circuit Court of Jackson County, Missouri, at Kansas City, January Term, 1919. Maggie L. Lukens, Plaintiff, v. International Life Insurance Company, Defendant. No. 69423. Stipulation.

"It is agreed and stipulated between the parties to this cause that all matters in controversy therein are compromised and settled, and in consideration thereof the defendant shall pay to the plaintiff the sum of seven hundred fifty dollars within ten days from this date, and all court costs.

"If such payment is not made within the time stated, judgment shall be entered in this case in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for seven hundred fifty dollars, with interest from this date at the rate of six per cent. per annum, and costs of suit."

[1] Defendant has presented several objections to the action of the trial court in sustaining plaintiff's motion. It claims that the court was without jurisdiction, citing Wilson v. Stark, 47 Mo. App. 116, Berberet v. Berberet, 136 Mo. 671, 38 S. W. 551, and Roberts v. Modern Woodmen, 146 Mo. App. 71, 123 S. W. 60. Those cases are not applicable. They did not involve costs, such as statutory clerical fees, which go along with the case and are taxed by the proper officer. They were cases where the court must adjudicate the claim for printing abstracts and fix the amount thereof as a part of the judgment, which must be had at the term or not at all. The item of cost involved here was for the transcript made out by the clerk of the Supreme Court of Missouri, and we think it clear should be considered as a part of the costs in the case, made up from the statutory fees allowed for such work. The court did not fix or adjudicate the amount, as in the cases above cited, but merely allowed the sum of items as fixed by the statute.

In a reply brief defendant cites us to section 2284, R. S. 1909, providing that "the clerk shall tax and subscribe all bills of costs arising in any causes or proceedings instituted or adjudged in the court of which he is the clerk," and section 2285, reading as follows:

"Any person aggrieved by the taxation of a bill of costs may, upon application, have the same retaxed by the court in which the action or proceeding was had, and in such retaxation all errors shall be corrected by the court."

It says that these sections make evident that any action taken for correction of the costs should be taken in the Supreme Court. But defendant leaves out of consideration the stipulation of the parties, the venue of which was laid in the court in which the original case was pending and the title to the case set out as it had been from the beginning, in which court (that is, the trial court) a judgment for a certain sum was to be rendered, together with "all court costs." This is a binding obligation. As said by the Supreme Court in Schwacker v. McLaughlin, 139 Mo. 333, 343, 40 S. W. 935, 938, "that stipulation is binding upon all competent parties who made it." That case was where they were endeavoring to hold a surety on a cost bond wherein there was a stipulation, and it was claimed the stipulation bound the surety. The court said that:

"The answer to that contention is that such expenses only become chargeable as costs by virtue of contract [stipulation], and only those who join in the contract are bound thereby."

In Murphy v. Smith, 86 Mo. 333, 338, the Supreme Court said:

"If a party in his compromise agreement stipulates for an adjudication of costs, in such a matter that a court would feel justified in enforcing it, irrespective of any judgment on the cause of action, such stipulation might afford special authority to the court to render judgment in accordance with its requirements."

In Thompson v. Union Elevator Co., 77 Mo. 520, 522, it is said that—"If a party would have the costs adjudged against his adversary, who prevails in the suit by reason of a compromise, under which the suit cannot be further prosecuted, he should so stipulate in his compromise agreement."

So in the case before us the parties have stipulated that the trial court shall render judgment for "all court costs." That this included costs in the Supreme Court is made clear by the interpretation of the parties themselves, since all costs have been paid save the one item inadvertently omitted.

[2] But defendant insists that if plaintiff has a claim for the omitted item of costs, it is by an independent action. The Supreme Court has held that such an action would not lie. McGindley v. Newton, 75 Mo. 115, 117; State ex rel. v. Railroad, 78 Mo. 575, 577. In the latter case the court said:

"The fact that everything else which was taxed by the clerk has been paid does not change the obligation of the defendant to pay the fee now claimed, and which should have been taxed at the time of the judgment. An application upon notice in the original action is the proper method of making the correction. A distinct and independent suit to effect this purpose would not lie."

[3] Finally, it is claimed that the evidence in plaintiff's behalf did not show that the item of cost has not been paid by defendant. We think a prima facie case was made. And it seems defendant must have thought so, too, for it submitted the case without asking a declaration in the nature of a demurrer. But, putting that aside, it is conceded that defendant paid the compromise sum of $750 agreed upon and all the costs, save the omitted item of $54. That item was paid to the clerk of the Supreme Court by plaintiff. This was shown by the certificate of the clerk of the Supreme Court, admitted without objection from defendant. We think a prima facie case was made, without regard to the proposition of the onus being on defendant to prove payment.

The judgment should be affirmed. All concur.

CENTRAL NAT. BANK v. WALTER-SCHEID. (No. 13568.)

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. June 14, 1920.)

1. Bills and notes \S 92(1)—Liability of defendant to bank on accommodation note supported by cashier's note as consideration.

Though defendant gave plaintiff bank his note for its accommodation, if cashier's firm gave their note to defendant in consideration for note which defendant signed defendant is liable to bank on his note; otherwise if when defendant received note of cashier's firm it was understood it was not to be paid, so that it was not consideration for defendant's note.

2. Bills and notes \S 504—Indorsement of payment admissible as tending to show note was for accommodation.

In action by bank on note executed to it, as defendant maker claimed, for its accommodation only, indorsement of payment of the note as of the day following its date, though stricken out by the bank's attorney after the note was handed him for suit, held admissible in evidence for defendant as tending to show note was accommodation paper.

3. Evidence \S 432—Proof of understanding note not to be paid admissible on issue of no consideration and accommodation.

In action by bank on note claimed by defendant maker to have been given for accommodation, evidence of verbal understanding that note was not to be paid held not inadmissible as contradicting its terms; action being between original parties, and evidence being received on issue of no consideration and accommodation.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cooper County; J. G. Slate, Judge.

Action by the Central National Bank against John E. Walterscheid. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. G. Pendleton, of Boonville, and E. D. Williams, of Kansas City, for appellant.

Jerry M. Jeffries, of Moberly, Jeffries & Corum, of St. Louis, and W. V. Draffen, of Boonville, for respondent.

ELLISON, P. J. This is an action on a promissory note for $3,790.60 due in 60 days from date, given by the defendant to the plaintiff bank. The judgment in the trial court was for the defendant.

The defense was that the note was given without consideration and for the accommodation of the bank. The evidence tended to show that A. H. Stephens was assistant cashier of the bank and controlled the management of its business, and that on the 9th of September, 1915, he requested defendant to sign the note for the bank for its accommodation that it might be shown to the "bank examiner" as a part of its assets. Defendant did business at the bank and was a close friend to Stephens, but he hesitated about signing the note; yet after Stephens assured him no harm could come of it, that he would not be expected to pay it, and offer to give his (Stephens') own note to him for same amount, not to be paid, but merely to cover or show the transaction, he signed the note. Neither principal nor interest was ever demanded of him, and the note was indorsed as canceled in these words: "June 30—paid July 1, 1916." It was not shown who made the indorsement, but it was made while in plaintiff's possession. A line was drawn through this indorsement after the note was placed in the hands of plaintiff's attorney. No effort was ever made by defendant to collect the Stephens note, and it had been lost.

There was evidence in plaintiff's behalf that Stephens and his son, as partners, were operating a garage in Boonville with an overdrawn account at plaintiff bank, and that the note was given by defendant for the accommodation of Stephens & Son and was used by them in the bank as a credit on the account of Stephens & Son. The issue in the trial court was whether the note was given for accommodation of plaintiff bank or the firm of Stephens & Son, and the court gave instructions for each party on the respective theories. Instruction A for plaintiff was amended by the court by inserting an addition as to defendant accepting the note signed by Stephens & Son, just preceding the words "in consideration for the note which defendant had signed to the bank," and striking out a phrase at the close of the instruction. This action of the court did no possible harm to plaintiff and made the instruction clearer. A clause as to consideration was stricken out of instruction B, which, in view of the direction following, was useless.

[1] But the court also instructed the jury that, although the note may have been given for the accommodation of the bank, yet, if Stephens & Son gave their note to defendant in consideration for the note which defendant signed for the bank, the verdict must be for the plaintiff. On the other hand, the court instructed the jury to the effect that, although when defendant executed the note to the plaintiff bank for its accommodation he received from Stephens & Son their note for the same amount, with the understanding that it was not to be paid and was given and received merely to show the entire transaction, there was no consideration, and the verdict should be for defendant. These instructions, as shown by the authorities hereinafter cited, properly declared the law, and we must abide by the verdict of the jury.

[2] As has been already stated the note is indorsed as "paid July 1, 16." This was done while in plaintiff's possession. A line was afterwards drawn through the indorsement by plaintiff's attorney after the note was handed to him for suit. But no explanation is given why it was done; and, in the absence of explanation, the indorsement, while not showing payment in a case where it is conceded no payment, in the ordinary meaning of that term, had really been made, yet it is very strong evidence that the note was not regarded as an obligation against defendant and that it was in plaintiff's hands merely as accommodation paper. The indorsement was clearly admissible in evidence in defendant's behalf.

[3] So we think the point made by plaintiff that evidence of a verbal understanding that a note was not to be paid could not be received to contradict its written terms is not well made. This action is between the original parties, and the evidence was well received on the issue of no consideration and accommodation. First National Bank v. Freeman (W. Va.) 98 S. E. 558, and authorities cited below.

That the case was properly tried and that the result is justified by the law is abundantly sustained by authority. Chicago Title & Trust Co. v. Brady, 165 Mo. 197, 85 S. W. 303; Messmore v. Meyer, 56 N. J. Law, 32, 27 Atl. 938; Citizens' Trust Co. v. McDougald, 132 Tenn. 323, 178 S. W. 432, L. R. A. 1917C, 840; Woodbury v. Glick, 151 Iowa, 648, 132 N. W. 67; Central Bank v. Ford (Tex. Civ. App.) 152 S. W. 700; Bank v. Keith, 85 Mo. App. 409.

The judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

VERNON et al. v. AMERICAN RY. EXPRESS CO. (No. 2721.)

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 5, 1920.)

1. Pleading §418(2)—Objection of inconsistency in counts waived by answering and going to trial.

Objection by demurrer that petition contained inconsistent counts was waived by answering and going to trial after the demurrer was overruled, under Rev. St. 1909, § 1804.

2. Carriers §108—When insurer of freight.

A common carrier is an insurer of freight, except as against an act of God, the public enemy, and the inherent nature of the freight.

3. Carriers §119—Extraordinary hot weather an act of God.

Extraordinary hot weather is an act of God, and a carrier is not liable for injury to freight caused thereby.

4. Carriers §123—Extraordinary hot weather must be sole cause of damage to goods.

Extraordinary hot weather, as an act of God, does not relieve a carrier from liability for damage to a shipment of dressed poultry, if the carrier's negligence contributed to the loss.

5. Carriers §120—Liable for damage to perishables caused by negligent delay.

If goods are lost or damaged on account of their inherent perishable nature without fault of the carrier, there is no liability; but a carrier is liable where it negligently delays in delivering a shipment and permits the inherent tendency to have its natural effect.

6. Carriers §134—Evidence sufficient to show negligent delay in delivery of perishable goods.

In an action for loss or damage to a shipment of dressed poultry, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that the carrier was guilty of negligent delay in delivering shipment at destination.

7. Carriers §118—Express company liable for negligence of railroad.

A railroad is the agent of an express company when carrying goods for it, and the express company must respond for the negligence of the railroad in transporting a shipment.

8. Carriers §89—May sell perishable goods on consignee's refusal to receive.

A carrier which is not negligent has the right to sell and dispose of a shipment of damaged perishable goods to the best advantage, where the consignee refuses to receive it, in which case consignor can only recover the amount for which the shipment sold.

9. Trial §386(2)—No error in refusing instruction.

In action against carrier for loss or injury to perishable goods, where court found that defendant was negligent, case being tried before court without a jury, there was no error in refusing a declaration of law as to the measure of damages where a carrier is not negligent.

10. Carriers §132—Burden on carrier to account for unreasonable delay in making delivery.

Where shipper by express showed arrival of dressed poultry in consignee's city in the early morning of a very hot day, and failure of defendant express company to deliver to consignee until six hours later, the burden then shifted to the defendant to account for the unreasonable delay in making delivery; the facts relating thereto being peculiarly and exclusively within its knowledge.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Laclede County; L. B. Woodside, Judge.

Action by James Vernon and W. R. Mayfield against the American Railway Express Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Hartung, of New York City, and A. W. Curry, of Lebanon, for appellant.

I. W. Mayfield & Son, of Lebanon, for respondents.

STURGIS, P. J. Plaintiff's cause of action is based on defendant's failure as a common carrier to well and safely carry eight barrels of dressed poultry from Lebanon, Mo., to St. Louis, Mo., and there deliver the same to the consignee, Levy Bros. Commission Company. This poultry was delivered to defendant for shipment on the evening of December 7, 1918, and it is alleged should have been delivered to the consignee on the morning of December 8th, but was not delivered till the middle of the afternoon of that day, when it was found to have been spoiled and so damaged that the consignee refused to accept same. The defendant thereupon sold such poultry for the best price it could obtain and tendered the proceeds to plaintiff. This amount plaintiff refused to accept in full settlement. On trial without a jury in the circuit court, plaintiff obtained judgment for the full value of the shipment, and defendant appeals.

The evidence shows that Lebanon is some 180 miles from St. Louis, and that defendant used the trains of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad in making its shipments. The first train carrying express after plaintiff delivered this poultry to defendant at Lebanon left there near midnight and arrived at St. Louis at 6:55 the next morning. The other trains carrying express left Lebanon later that night and arrived at St. Louis about 8:30 and 9 o'clock, respectively, the next morning. The consignee testified that the weather was very warm for that time of year and, expecting this poultry and knowing that it might spoil, he called the defendant's St. Louis office in regard thereto about 7:15 in the morning and was informed that the shipment was then there. This shows that it arrived on the first train. The consignee offered to himself send for the shipment, but was informed that it would be sent out at once. The general foreman of the defendant's commission department said that the train carrying this shipment was due about 8 a. m., so that there is abundant evidence that the poultry arrived in St. Louis early in the morning of December 8th. The evidence of the clerk of defendant's superintendent that the express cars were not delivered till a later hour on December 9th is of no importance, as that was a different date. All the evidence shows that this poultry shipment was not delivered to the consignee till 3 p. m. of December 8th, and there is no question as to its being delivered in a damaged condition. The uncontradicted evidence also is that, while the weather was unusually warm for that time of year, the poultry had been carefully packed in ice in good condition, and would easily stand the ordinary trip from Lebanon to St. Louis and delivery there. It was also shown, and this seems obvious, that after the ice has melted dressed poultry will spoil by standing five or six hours uncared for. That plaintiff made a case on the facts seems too plain for argument.

[1] The petition is in two counts; one alleging a conversion of plaintiff's poultry by defendant in failing to deliver it to consignee, and the other for damages based on the negligent delay in shipping and delivering. The petition was demurred to on the ground of inconsistency in the two counts, and on the ground that one was based on tort and the other on contract. By answering and going to trial after the demurrer was overruled the defendant waived this point. Section 1804, R. S. 1909. Besides this, plaintiff was required to elect, and did elect, to stand on the second count of the petition. That count and the cause of action there stated is all that is before this court.

[2-4] A common carrier is an insurer of freight, except as against an act of God, the public enemy, and the inherent nature of the freight. Singer v. Amer. Express Co., 219 S. W. 662. It is claimed that the damage to this shipment of poultry was due to the first exception mentioned, in that the weather was unusually warm for December. Extraordinary hot weather at a particular time would come within such exception, but to excuse the carrier on such ground the extraordinary weather condition must be the sole cause of the loss. If the carrier's negligence contributes to such loss, then there is liability. Such is the holding in the cases cited by defendant. Vail v. Railroad, 63 Mo. 230; Hance v. Railroad, 48 Mo. App. 179. While the weather was unusually warm, the uncontradicted evidence is that this poultry was carefully packed in ice, so as to easily stand the time required for shipment and delivery at destination. The unusual and unexplained delay of at least six hours in making delivery combined with the warm weather in causing the loss. Defendant knew of the warm weather and the perishable nature of the shipment, demanding prompt delivery.

[5] We agree, also, that a carrier is not an insurer of perishable goods as against loss due solely to such cause. If goods are lost or damaged on account of their inherent perishable nature without fault of the carrier, there is no liability. Singer v. Amer. Express Co., 219 S. W. 662. In Funsten Fruit Co. v. Railroad, 163 Mo. App. 426, 437, 143 S. W. 839, 842, the law is well stated thus:

"No one can doubt that the carrier is not liable for such damages as may result solely from an inherent infirmity in the goods in his care, no more than is he liable for loss entailed solely by the act of God, the public enemy, or the carelessness of the shipper. See Hutchinson on Carriers (2d Ed.) § 216a; Libby v. St. L., I. M., etc., R. Co., 137 Mo. App. 276, 117 S. W. 659. But, though such be true, it is true as well that the carrier is liable to respond for the results of his own negligence, and if it appears that his negligent conduct conduced to set the inherent infirmity of the goods in motion, to the damage of the owner, it will suffice; in other words, the exemption on account of the infirmity of the goods obtains only where the loss is solely attributable to such infirmity, for if the carrier's negligence commingles with the infirmity and contributes in part to the damage, liability is entailed therefor against the carrier for its tortious conduct."

Had the defendant permitted the consignee to call for and take the poultry early in the morning of its arrival in St. Louis, or had itself delivered same promptly, as it promised to do, there would have been no damage, or, if there had been, defendant would not be liable. The delay in delivering permitted the inherent tendency of dressed meat to decay in warm weather to have its natural effect, and where such delay is negligent the carrier is liable.

[6] It was claimed that there was no evidence as to what was a reasonable time in which to make delivery to the consignee after the shipment arrived in St. Louis. We think there is. The address of the consignee is 707 North Fourth street in that city. It is also shown that, on the same morning this shipment came to St. Louis, another shipment came from the same town of Lebanon over the same route to the same consignee, and this other one was delivered by defendant at an early hour in the forenoon. That the other shipment was delivered early in the day is evidence that this one could have been so delivered also, and that the failure to deliver this one till some six hours later was negligence.

[7] A number of declarations of law were asked by defendant and refused. As the case was tried by the court without a jury, these are of no importance, except to show that the court decided the case on the wrong theory of the law. What we have said shows that the defendant had a wrong theory of the law rather than the court. One or more of said declarations of law exempted defendant from any negligence of the railroad which it used in transporting the goods delivered to it for carriage. To this we do not agree, as the defendant made the railroad its agent in carrying goods, and must respond for the negligence of such agent. But there was no evidence of negligence here in transporting the shipment to St. Louis. The negligent delay occurred after the shipment reached St. Louis. The delay was in the delivery rather than the transportation.

[8-10] The declaration of law that defendant was not liable unless it was negligent, and in that event had a right to sell and dispose of the shipment to the best advantage after the consignee's refusal to receive same, and that in such case plaintiff could only recover the amount such poultry sold for, might well have been given. But, as the court found that the defendant was negligent, there was no need of instructing on the measure of damages on the contrary theory. After reading all the refused instructions, we find nothing to indicate that the court's finding was due to any misconception of the law. In fact, all the material facts of this case are uncontradicted, and make a prima facie case for plaintiff. The burden then shifted to defendant to account for the unreasonable delay in making delivery to the consignee, since the facts relating thereto were peculiarly and exclusively within its knowledge. Hance v. Express Co., 48 Mo. App. 179, 184. Quoting again from Funsten Fruit Co. v. Railroad, 163 Mo. App. 426, 439, 143 S. W. 839, 842, this is said:

"For when the relation and situation of the carrier and shipper are considered, but slight evidence in respect of such matters will suffice, as the parties are in no sense on equal footing. It would be difficult, indeed, for the shipper to point out the precise cause of delay and that it was a negligent one, and the law reckons with this by casting the burden of proof on the carrier, who is possessed of all the facts which may explain its otherwise seeming default, when the shipper has been shown collateral facts and circumstances sufficient to suggest a reasonable inference of neglect on the part of the carrier."

See, also, Hunt v. Railroad, 187 Mo. App. 639, 173 S. W. 61, 63. No such explanation of the delay was forthcoming.

The judgment for plaintiff is for the right party, and is affirmed.

MONTI v. McCAUGHEN. (No. 16077.)(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 8, 1920.)Appeal and error 301, 719(6), 1078(4)—
Submission of question to jury not considered where not complained of.

Whether court erred in submitting an issue to jury will not be considered on appeal where appellant did not complain in motion for new trial, assignments of error, brief, or argument before appellate court of instruction submitting the issue or of court's refusal to give any other instruction asked by him.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Kent K. Koerner, Judge.

"Not to be officially published."

Action by Martin Monti against William McCaughen, doing business as McCaughen & Burr. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edward J. Monti, of St. Louis, for appellant.

Thos. E. Mulvihill and R. M. Nichols, both of St. Louis, for respondent.

NIPPER, C. This is a suit to recover rent. The petition seeks to recover $1,204.26.

The answer, after denying generally the allegations of the petition, pleads an oral agreement, whereby it is alleged that appellant agreed in September, 1915, to reduce the rent from $266.66 a month to $200 per month. Although not set out in the record it is stated that respondent also filed a counterclaim.

The reply admitted respondent's claim for $179, and asked judgment for $1,024.26.

At the trial in the court below, there was a verdict and judgment for defendant, from which plaintiff appeals.

There is but little controversy about the facts in this case. Appellant is the owner of the premises located at 919 Locust street, in the city of St. Louis. Respondent occupied these premises under a written, ten-year lease, dated April 15, 1905. This lease expired April 15, 1915, and respondent continued to occupy these premises and pay the same monthly rental that he did under the terms of the lease, namely, $266.66 per month, until some time about the month of September, 1915.

Respondent testified that after the expiration of the lease he frequently made complaints to appellant about the amount of the rent, until finally, about September, 1915, he told appellant that he could not pay more than $200 per month for these premises, and gave his reasons therefor. He says that appellant's only answer was, "Oh, pshaw!" or some expression of that kind. He further stated that he was not able to pay his rent in advance, and that he made the payments when he could. His contention is that appellant, by his words and conduct, led him to believe that appellant had agreed to these terms. He says that, when sending checks to appellant's agent for the payment of this rent, he did not specify on the checks the months for which the payments were to be applied, but that the money was to be applied on his account for rent, and that the receipts he received from appellant's agent for the money so paid receipted for the payments merely as "payment on account."

Respondent vacated the premises about November 4, 1916.

Appellant states that he at no time agreed to accept $200 per month, nor did he enter into any such agreement, verbally or otherwise.

At the close of all the evidence, appellant asked for a peremptory instruction in the following words:

"The court instructs the jury that your verdict must be for plaintiff in the sum of $1,203.26."

This instruction the court refused to give. The court then, at the request of plaintiff, gave to the jury the following instruction:

"The court instructs that, if you find from the evidence that the defendant did occupy the premises known as 919 Locust street from the 15th day of September, 1915, to November 4, 1916, and if you further find from the evidence that defendant held over at the expiration of the lease and continued to pay the rent as specified in said lease, you are hereby instructed that there was an implied agreement and that the said agreement created the relation of landlord and tenant, at the rental specified in said lease, and if you find the relation of landlord and tenant existed, you must find for the plaintiff, the sum of $1,024.26, unless you find the facts to be as stated in instruction No. 2."

The court then, of its own motion, gave to the jury instruction No. 2, which told the jury that, if plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement during the months of September or October, 1915, whereby the rent to be paid for said premises was to be $200 per month, then the verdict must be for the defendant. Instruction No. 3 was on the burden of proof.

Appellant, in his motion for new trial, gives five reasons why the same should be granted, which we here copy:

"(1) The verdict and judgment in said cause is against the evidence, against the weight of the evidence, and against the law under the evidence.

"(2) The said verdict and judgment is for the wrong party.

"(3) The said verdict and judgment is the result of prejudice and passion of the jury.

"(4) The court erred in refusing to give the peremptory instruction, offered by plaintiff at the close of the entire case.

"(5) Because under the pleadings and evidence the verdict and judgment should have been in favor of the plaintiff."

In appellant's "Assignment of Errors," in his printed brief, only two errors are complained of. We copy these:

"I. The court erred in refusing to give plaintiff's peremptory instruction at the close of the whole case.

"II. That the verdict is against the law and the evidence."

There was no error in refusing to give plaintiff's peremptory instruction to find in his favor, for the reason that the instruction asked directed the jury to find for appellant in a greater amount than he would be entitled to, as shown from the evidence and his instruction given at his request, as he would not have been entitled to more than $1,024.26 under the pleadings and the evidence.

Appellant saved his exceptions to the giving of instructions Nos. 2 and 3 by the court of its own motion, but he makes no complaint of them in his motion for new trial, nor in his assignment of error, nor any other place in his brief and argument before this court. Neither does he make any complaint as to the refusal of the trial court to give any other instruction asked by him. Therefore we are precluded from considering whether or not it was reversible error to submit to the jury the question of whether or not there was any agreement made between the parties, fixing the rent at $200 per month. In this condition of the case, the Commissioner recommends that the judgment be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of NIPPER, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

The judgment of the circuit court is accordingly affirmed.

REYNOLDS, P. J., and ALLEN and BECKER, JJ., concur.

McCAUGHAN v. JOHN HILL CONST. CO. (No. 16031.)

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. June 8, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 26, 1920.)

1. Evidence ¶215(1)—Affidavits for tax returns admissible as admission to show value of damaged goods in negligence case.

In a case of trespass and negligence for damages to a stock of oil paintings, etc., which plaintiff testified were worth over $20,000, the court erred in excluding affidavits of plaintiff made for his tax returns in which he swore that the gross amount of goods owned by him was $4,000.

2. Pleading ¶211—General charge of negligence held good as against demurrer ore tenus at trial.

A count charging that defendant's agents carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully committed certain acts to plaintiff's damage at least contained a defectively stated cause of action embodying a general charge of negligence, and was good as a basis for proof, unless proper objections were made before the trial, and demurrers ore tenus on the ground that negligence and unskillfulness were inconsistent and could not be united in one charge, made on the trial, were properly overruled, under Rev. St. 1909, § 1804.

3. Damages ¶188(1)—Plaintiff should be required to prove damage with all certainty case permits.

In an action for damages to numerous photographs and carbons, numerous statuary casts, numerous gold and gilt frames, etc., plaintiff should be required to prove the damage with all the certainty the case permitted, and it was not sufficient to allege and prove that numerous articles were damaged without specifying of what the articles consisted and the number.

4. Evidence ¶155(8)—Letters of plaintiff admissible in trespass and negligence case.

In an action of trespass and negligence, there was no error in admitting in evidence letters from plaintiff to defendant complaining of defendant's acts of trespass and negligence and requesting compensation therefor; defendant's reply denying the acts and refusing to recognize the claim being admitted.

5. Negligence ¶134(1)—Finding of negligence in damaging property sustained by evidence.

In an action for damages to oil paintings caused by breaking through of ceiling, held that the jury could infer from the evidence that one of defendant's employes while working in the attic over plaintiff's room, stepped between the joists, and that such act was negligent.

Action by William M. McCaughan against the John Hill Construction Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Marshall & Henderson, of St. Louis, for appellant.

Thomas E. Mulvihill and R. M. Nichols, both of St. Louis, for respondent.

BIGGS, C. Defendant appeals from an adverse judgment for $4,796 rendered against it, based upon various alleged acts of trespass and negligence committed by it against plaintiff's rights and property while defendant was constructing a building on Locust street, in the city of St. Louis. Plaintiff was the lessee of property known as 919 Locust street, and there conducted an art store and salesroom. Defendant, by contract with the owners of the adjoining property on the east, known as 915 and 917 Locust street, was constructing a 12-story building on said property in the years 1913 and 1914. Plaintiff alleges that during the period of construction the agents and servants of defendant committed various alleged acts of negligence and trespass against plaintiff's property, resulting in damage to a number of oil paintings and other art goods of plaintiff.

The petition is in 12 counts, the odd-numbered counts being bottomed upon trespass and the even-numbered ones upon negligence, there being six alleged causes of action, each stated in the alternative of trespass and negligence. Upon the filing of a general denial there was a trial before a jury, resulting in a verdict for plaintiff on the second count for $1,110, on the third count for $437, on the sixth count for $1,461, on the seventh count for $1,625, on the ninth count for $88, and on the twelfth count for $75. Judgment was rendered for a total of $4,796.

The court nisi sustained demurrers to the first, fourth, eighth, tenth, and eleventh counts, and put the fifth and sixth counts, both causes of action therein stated arising out of the same acts of defendant, to the jury, leaving it to decide if they found for plaintiff, whether the said acts constituted a trespass or were acts of negligence.

The defendant assigns 25 reasons why the judgment should not be allowed to stand. A reading of the record convinces us that reversible error was committed by the lower court in excluding certain evidence hereinafter referred to, which calls for another trial, and hence it will be unnecessary to consider the various specifications of error, as most of them, if meritorious, are unlikely to again occur upon a second trial. Such as we think may occur again will be given consideration in this opinion.

[1] The court erred in excluding the affidavits of plaintiff made for his tax returns for the years 1913 and 1914, and in which plaintiff swore that the gross amount of goods, wares, and merchandise owned by him at any time between the first Monday of March and the first Monday of June of each year was $1,000. The affidavits were excluded on the theory that they tended to impeach the plaintiff upon a collateral issue. The plaintiff claimed that defendant's acts of negligence and trespass caused damage to his personal property consisting of a line of art goods, principally valuable oil paintings. One of the main issues was the question of the value of these paintings, which was a very material inquiry, for manifestly in case a very valuable painting is marred or otherwise injured by the acts of defendant the damage to plaintiff would be greater than if the painting was of small value. Plaintiff went upon the theory that the paintings were of great value, and prima facie established that fact by his testimony and that of his manager, Lange. Plaintiff testified that the property that was damaged was worth $20,870. Lange placed the aggregate value at $22,655. Plaintiff claimed damages in the sum of $7,151.50, and, as stated, recovered a judgment for $4,796, for damage to a portion of his property. All of plaintiff's paintings were not damaged, as he testified that, in addition to a number of framed oil paintings on the walls of his art gallery, he had in 1913 some 400 unframed oil paintings on shelves on the south wall of the third floor. Plaintiff claimed that about 40 paintings were damaged, so it appears that a small portion of plaintiff's goods were damaged. That portion he valued in his testimony at over $20,000. In the affidavits offered in evidence he placed the value for taxation purposes at $1,000 for his entire stock.

The affidavits offered tended to contradict plaintiff's evidence as to value by showing that he had placed a different value on his property at another time. The evidence was admissible as an admission by plaintiff of the value of his property under the well-established rule of evidence that the admissions and declarations of a party made against his interest may be given in evidence against him.

The above rule, as stated by Judge Brace in Bogie v. Nolan, 96 Mo. loc. cit. 91, 9 S. W. 16—

"has had no respect for time or place, always presuming that a man's statements as against himself are truthful, whether made in court or out of court, on oath or in casual conversation, orally or in writing. They all rest on the same principle, that a man is not apt to declare a fact against his own interest unless it be true."

Plaintiff's counsel assert that the general estimate of $1,000 made in the affidavits was for the purpose of taxation only and was not evidence of value, and therefore without probative force. Cases are cited from other jurisdictions to the effect that assessments for taxes are not competent evidence to aid the jury in fixing the value. We are not concerned with the law as declared elsewhere when our own courts have settled the problem, especially when we think it correctly settled.

In the case of St. Louis O. H. Ry. Co. v. Fowler, 142 Mo. 670, 44 S. W. 771, a condemnation suit in which the question of the value of defendant's land was in issue, the assessment list made by defendant in which he placed a value on his land was admitted in evidence as an admission of the defendant and as affecting his interest.

So in the case of Wilcoxson v. Darr, 139 Mo. loc. cit. 671, 41 S. W. 228, the court held that a certified copy of the garnishee's tax list was properly received in evidence on the question as to whether the garnishee owed a debt to the defendant. The court there says:

"It would certainly have been competent for the jury in an investigation in which the very existence of a debt is the issue, to have known that the person who claimed to owe the debt had sworn in a proceeding required by law, that he had no such debt or had evaded the fact by a sworn list, omitting said debt."

In the case of Steam Stonecutter Co. v. Scott, 157 Mo. loc. cit. 526, 57 S. W. 1076, being a suit against stockholders of a company, by reason of a grossly excessive valuation placed upon lands turned over to the company in payment of its capital stock, it was held that defendant's assessment lists placing a value upon the property were properly received in evidence on the question of value. In fact the only objection made to the assessment lists were that they were not sworn to.

In the case of Copper & Iron Mfg. Co. v. Manufacturers' Ry. Co., 230 Mo. loc. cit. 81, 130 S. W. 294, the Supreme Court says:

"The usual ground on which assessors' books have been admitted in evidence is that they constitute record admissions made by the opposite party in listing his lands for taxation."

Other cases in point are Boyer v. Tucker, 70 Mo. loc. cit. 459, and Probst v. Ins. Co., 64 Mo. App. loc. cit. 412.

[2] Defendant's demurrer ore tenus to the second, sixth, and twelfth counts was well ruled under the circumstances of the case. These are negligence counts and charge that the defendant's agents carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully committed certain acts to plaintiff's damage. Defendant contends that negligence and unskillfulness are inconsistent and cannot be united in one charge, and, further, that the charge is general negligence, whereas plaintiff should be compelled to charge specific negligence. No motion to elect or to make more definite and certain or other objection was made prior to the trial. At least the counts contained defectively stated causes of action embodying a general charge of negligence and were good as a basis for proof unless proper objections were made before the trial. Such a petition is to be distinguished from one that states no cause of action at all. Section 1804, R. S. 1909; Allen v. Lumber Co., 171 Mo. App. loc. cit. 506, 157 S. W. 661; Machinery Co. v. Roney, 185 Mo. App. loc. cit. 474, 171 S. W. 681; Collingsworth v. Zinc & Chemical Co., 260 Mo. loc. cit. 703, 169 S. W. 50.

[3] As to the seventh count, plaintiff alleges that numerous photographs and carbons, numerous statuary, casts, numerous gold and gilt frames, and numerous other articles were damaged, including a large quantity of material and unframed oil paintings. The proof was not much more definite than the allegation. Plaintiff should be required to prove the damage with all the certainty the case permits. It will not do to allege and prove that numerous articles were damaged without specifying of what the articles consisted and the number. The jury should not be allowed to transfer money from the pocket of the defendant into that of plaintiff by guess or specification.

[4] We do not think error was committed in admitting letters from plaintiff to defendant written at the time complaining of defendant's acts of trespass and negligence and requesting compensation therefor. Defendant's reply denying the acts and refusing to recognize the claim was also admitted. Houts v. Dunham, 162 Mo. App. loc. cit. 489, 142 S. W. 806.

[5] The objection made by defendant to instruction No. 1 given for plaintiff, in that there was no evidence of defendant's negligence, we think untenable. While no one testified that they saw defendant's employé break through the ceiling of the room on the third floor, it was shown that defendant's employes were in the attic of plaintiff's building at the time, and plaintiff testified that defendant's foreman admitted that his employes broke through the ceiling. The jury could infer from the evidence that one of defendant's employes stepped between the joists while at work in the attic and that such act was negligence.

For the error noted, the Commissioner recommends that the judgment be reversed and the cause remanded.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of BIGGS, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

The judgment of the circuit court is accordingly reversed and the cause remanded.

REYNOLDS, P. J., and ALLEN and BECKER, JJ., concur.

O'DONNELL v. KANSAS CITY LIFE INS. CO. (No. 13620.)

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. June 14, 1920.)

1. Insurance §391—Admission after death of insured that policy was in force admissible as evidence of waiver.

Though an admission by an insurance company, made after the death of insured, that the policy was still in force, is not a waiver of forfeiture, it is admissible in an action on the policy as evidence that the company had, before the death of insured, waived the forfeiture.

2. Insurance §310(2)—Policy providing for forfeiture for failure to pay note void after nonpayment.

Where the policy provides that failure to pay when due any premium note shall, without further action on part of the company, work a forfeiture of the insurance, a default in the payment of the premium note renders the policy void.

3. Insurance §361—Charging note against agent does not defeat forfeiture, where policy requires note to agent to be given company.

Where a life insurance policy provided that any premium note given to the company or its agent should be deposited with the company and applied on the premium, and that the policy should be void for failure to pay any premium note when due, the fact that the company charged the amount of a premium note against its agent does not show that it looked solely to the agent for payment of the note, so as to lose the right to forfeit the policy for nonpayment thereof.

4. Insurance §654½—Evidence that note to agent was indorsed to company held admissible.

Where a life insurance policy provided that any note, whether to the agent or the company, should be deposited with the company and applied on the premium, evidence by the agent that he immediately indorsed to the company the premium notes made payable to him was admissible.

5. Insurance §668(15)—Evidence held to raise jury question as to waiver of forfeiture for nonpayment of note.

In an action on a life insurance policy, evidence that after default in payment of the premium note the company notified insured that the next premium was due, and after the death of insured stated to beneficiary that the policy was in force, held sufficient to take to the jury the question whether the company had waived forfeiture for nonpayment of the premium note.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Harris Robinson, Judge.

"Not to be officially published."

Action by Sallie B. O'Donnell against the Kansas City Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

George Kingsley, of Kansas City, for appellant.

Gilmore & Brown, of Kansas City, for respondent.

TRIMBLE, J. This is an action upon a policy of insurance issued September 14, 1915, by defendant upon the life of James H. O'Donnell for $5,000, payable upon his death to the plaintiff, beneficiary therein. Insured died on August 19, 1918. There is no controversy over these facts. They are admitted. The defense is that for the first annual premium due on the policy the insured gave his two promissory notes; that the insurance contract provided that failure to pay any premium note when due rendered the policy null and void without action or notice on the part of the company; that insured did not pay said notes and same were never paid, and in consequence thereof the policy was void. The reply denied this, and pleaded that if there was a default in the payment of the notes when due the company waived the forfeiture. A trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff, from which the defendant has appealed.

The application upon which the policy was issued contains the following provision:

"And I further agree that any money, note, or other thing of value given to this company or its agent taking this application on account of the first premium charge on the policy applied for, in whole or in part, shall be held by this company as a deposit merely and not as payment, until such time as this application shall be accepted or rejected; if same be accepted, such money, note, or other thing of value shall be applied on such first premium charge; if rejected, same shall be returned to me, my heirs, administrators, or assigns."

The policy contained these provisions:

"Upon failure to pay a premium on or before the date when due, or upon failure to pay any premium note when due, this policy will become null and void without any action or notice by the company, and all rights shall be forfeited to the company, except as hereinafter provided. * * *

"In case of default in the payment of any premium hereunder or of any premium note when due, the company will reinstate the policy, if not previously surrendered, at any time upon written request by the insured to the company at its home office, accompanied by evidence of insurability satisfactory to the company and the payment of all premium arrears and the payment or reinstatement of any indebtedness existing at the date of default, together with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per centum per annum."

There is no question but that insured did not pay cash for the first annual premium of $123.45, but executed two promissory notes, both dated August 27, 1915 (the date of the application), both due six months after date.

both payable to the order of T. F. Walsh, with 8 per cent. interest from maturity, compounding annually if not paid annually. One of said notes was for $74.07 and the other for $49.38, the two aggregating the amount of the annual premium, to wit, $123.45. T. F. Walsh was the agent who solicited the insurance, obtained the application, and procured the making of the insurance contract.

Plaintiff introduced the policy in evidence, proved the death of her husband, and introduced a letter from defendant's secretary, dated August 24, 1916, which read as follows:

"We hold in this office the note of Mr. O'Donnell for the premium on this policy, which note is long past due and which he failed to pay, and therefore said policy, by its terms and conditions, is not in force, for the reason that he did not pay the premium thereon."

Defendant admitted plaintiff had been paid nothing on the policy and thereupon plaintiff rested. A demurrer to the evidence was offered and overruled, whereupon defendant introduced evidence in behalf of its defense of forfeiture. This was to the effect that nothing was ever paid on the policy; that the two notes were taken at the time of the application and were, by the payee, Walsh, indorsed and sent in to the company along with the application; that nothing had ever been paid on them or either of them, and that they were still in the possession of the defendant; and the two notes were offered in evidence.

It was elicited from the witnesses offered by defendant that the amount represented by one note, to wit, $74.07, was the amount which was due the agent as his commission out of the first annual premium, and that the $49.38 represented by the other note was the net amount due the company out of the first annual premium. The secretary of the company testified on cross-examination that the amount of the two notes was not charged against the agent upon the books of the company, but he did admit that the agent was charged with the difference between the amount of the notes and his commission, that is to say, he was charged with $49.38, the amount represented by the second note above mentioned, and which was the net amount due the company out of the said first year's premium. He further testified that the notes were carried as the property of the company; that the notes fell due February 27, 1916; that when they fell due they notified insured, and after that the company "held them waiting settlement." He further admitted on cross-examination that on the books of the company a running account with the agent was kept and that the items involved herein would show on that account; but he insisted that the charge against the agent of the net premium due the company was made only as a matter of bookkeeping, and that Walsh's account was credited with the amount of the unpaid note; but he was unable to say when this was done, whether before or after insured's death, and admitted that the books would show. At this point plaintiff had him identify a card as being the notice of payment of next premium sent out by the regular renewal premium department of the company, and plaintiff offered it in evidence to show that, long after the default in the payment of the notes, the company notified insured that the next premium would be due September 14, 1916, but this offer was denied and the evidence excluded by the court.

Although the secretary testified that only the difference between the amount of the notes and the agent's commission was charged against the agent's account, and that he was given credit for that at some time, either before or after insured's death, yet, later on, the following occurs in his cross-examination:

"Q. When did the company come into possession of these notes? A. At the time the application was taken.

"Q. Did Mr. Walsh ever get credit on his account for the payment of this premium? A. Yes, sir; for his interest."

[1] The witness further admitted that they kept a record of the lapses and defaults, and thereupon the plaintiff offered to prove that after the death of insured one of plaintiff's counsel, over the phone, called him in his office and, without telling him insured was dead, asked him what condition the policy was in, and that the secretary, after asking for a moment in which to look at the books, returned and reported that the policy was in force. This was, of course, long after default in the payment of the notes, and while such occurrence would not, of itself, constitute a waiver, since the insured was then dead, yet it would seem to be a circumstance which would throw light on the question whether the company had theretofore regarded or treated the policy as forfeited because of the default in the payment of the notes when due, which default had occurred months before and which default was known to the company when it occurred. In other words, it was a circumstance the jury were entitled to know in passing upon the question whether the company had theretofore waived the default and were still considering the policy in force, looking to the agent for the premium if the insured did not pay it. If such was the fact, then the company was, from the time of the default, occupying an equivocal position, in this, to wit: As long as the insured was alive and the policy was a possible premium getter, the company would regard it as in force so far as its being a source of possible premiums was concerned, but the moment insured died, then the policy would be treated as being long since forfeited because of the default in the payment of the notes when they became due. Such equivocal position is not permitted or looked upon with favor. Thompson v. St. Louis Mut. Ins. Co., 52 Mo. 469, 472; Hanley v. Life Association, 4 Mo. App. 253, 258. The evidence as to this was, however, excluded by the court upon objection that insured was dead and the status of the parties to the insurance contract had become fixed and the company could not then waive since they did not know insured was dead. As stated, we do not say this would constitute a waiver at that time, but it was a circumstance tending to throw light on whether the default had been theretofore waived.

The defendant put the agent, Walsh, on the stand. He testified that the two notes were taken for the first year's premium; that the note for the $74.07 was for his commission and the one for $49.38 was the net premium going to the company; that he did not tell this to the insured, and so far as the latter was concerned both represented the premium. He further testified that after the notes became due one of them, the $74.07 note, was sent to him by the company and he spoke to the insured about it and insured said he could not pay it; that some three months after the notes were due he saw insured about it and insured said he could not pay him then but would let him know later about it, and the last time insured was spoken to he said the agent "would hear from him"; that at two or three of those times the agent told insured he "could go across the street to their (the company's) office and pay the $49.38." (It will be noticed that the company did not return to the agent the net premium note for $49.38, which they naturally would not do if they intended to hold the agent for that.)

The agent further testified that, while the net premium note was charged to him on the books of the company, it was only as a matter of form. And yet he testified as follows:

"Q. Did you ever pay the company their share of the insurance premium? A. No, sir; I never paid them anything.

"Q. You never did? A. No, sir; I turned them over the notes for security."

He said that of all the notes he had ever taken and turned over to the company only one, aside from these, was not paid, and when asked, in reference to that one:

"Q. The company's share of the premium—did you pay that? A. Yes, sir; I still owe the company for it."

In cross-examination concerning the $49.38 charged to him "as a matter of form" he was asked:

"Q. When the note is not paid, what happens then with reference to that account, is your account changed, is that amount remitted to you or how is it? A. Well, they charge it. * * *

"Q. Well, who bears the loss, you or the company—you know what arrangement you have with them—tell us? A. Well, I don't know.

"Q. Well, you do not go as far as to say the company bears the loss and you do know they have charged you on the books in either case? A. Where I did not pay the cash."

He then testified that he never had been held by the company for a note that was not paid, and he "judged" he was given a credit on the books for the net premium note in this instance. He stated the books would show the situation, but he had no particular remembrance of the credit to his account of the unpaid note and did not know when his account was thus credited whether before or after September 1, 1916.

The secretary was then recalled and an attempt was made to show by him when the credit was made, but, upon objection that the books were the best evidence, the evidence was excluded. An attempt was then made to show the nature of the real liability of the agent to the company upon a note taken by him which is not paid, but in the course of this attempt it developed that the witness was not the one who hired the agent, or who hires any of the agents, and that the contract of Walsh's hiring was in writing, whereupon plaintiff objected to the testimony on the ground that the contract would be the best evidence, and the objection was sustained. The case was tried in Kansas City, the home office of the company, where presumably the books are kept, and yet the books were not offered in evidence nor was any request made for an opportunity to get them. Nor was the bookkeeper offered as a witness.

At the close of the evidence the defendant again demurred, but was overruled. Thereupon the case was submitted to the jury upon an instruction for plaintiff to the effect that, if the jury believed from the evidence that "the defendant charged the net premium due it for the first year on the policy sued on to its agent, T. F. Walsh, and held said Walsh alone responsible for the company's share of said premium, and the said Walsh extended his personal credit to Jas. H. O'Donnell for the amount of the premium and took said O'Donnell's notes payable to himself for the amount of said premium, then the fact that said premium notes were not paid, if you find from the evidence that such is the fact, will be no defense to this action, and your verdict will be for the plaintiff" for the amount of the policy with interest from date of demand.

[2] It is well settled that where the insurance contract provides, as in this case, that failure to pay when due any note given for the premium shall, ipso facto, and without further action on the part of the company, work a forfeiture of the insurance, then such default in the payment of the premium note renders the policy void. Leeper v. Franklin Ins. Co., 93 Mo. App. 602, 87 S. W. 941; Kazee v. Kansas City Life Ins. Co., 217 S. W. 339; Iowa Life Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 187 U. S. 335, 23 Sup. Ct. 126, 47 L. Ed. 204; Stephenson v. Empire Life Ins. Co., 139 Ga. 82, 76 S. E. 592; Iles v. Mutual Reserve, etc., Ins. Co., 50 Wash. 49, 96 Pac. 522, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 902, 126 Am. St. Rep. 886; Sexton v. Greensboro Life Ins. Co., 157 N. C. 142, 72 S. E. 863.

[3] And it has also been decided that where the note, made to the agent, has been treated as the agent's property and the company has looked to the agent as its debtor for the credit the agent has extended to the insured by taking his note, then the failure of insured to pay the note to the agent cannot be relied on by the company to defeat the insurance. Wytheville Ins., etc., Co. v. Telger, 90 Va. 277, 281, 18 S. E. 195 (in which case, however, there was no clause rendering the policy void without further action); Mooney v. Home Ins. Co., 80 Mo. App. 192, 197 (in which case the premium due the company had been paid to it by the agent, and if the clause in the insurance contract was also for the benefit of the agent it could not be relied on since he had waived prompt payment); Jacobs v. Omaha Life Ass'n, 146 Mo. 523, 542, 48 S. W. 462 (in which case the agent paid the premium due the company in cash and the only credit extended was by the bank to whom the agent discounted the note); Lebanon Mutual Ins. Co. v. Hoover, 113 Pa. 591, 8 Atl. 163, 57 Am. Rep. 511; Union Life Ins. Co. v. Parker, 66 Neb. 395, 92 N. W. 604, 62 L. R. A. 390, 103 Am. St. Rep. 714.

In the case at bar, however, one clause of the insurance contract provided that "any * * * note * * * given to this company or its agent taking this application, on account of the first premium charge on the policy applied for, in whole or in part shall," etc., be deposited with the company and applied on the premium if the insurance is accepted. And then the other clauses provide that the policy shall become null and void upon failure to pay any premium note when due. Thus it would seem that, since the contract provided that a note, whether given to the agent or to the company should be deposited with the company and applied on the first premium charge if the insurance was accepted, and that a failure to pay any such note when due would nullify the policy, such provision would apply even if the company did charge the amount of the net premium coming to it against the agent. In other words, the clause in regard to default would cover the note even if it was given to the agent, especially where the agent, in accordance with the above-quoted clause, endorsed the notes over to, and deposited them with, the company. See the remarks of Judge Gill in the first opinion in the Mooney Case, 72 Mo. App. loc. cit. 97.

[4] In the case at bar defendant tried to show by Walsh that, although the notes were made payable to him, yet he immediately indorsed them over to the company, and in reality took them as agent for the company, and that he had no interest in the one for $49.38. This, however, was excluded. In Thies v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 13 Tex. Civ. App. 280, 35 S. W. 676, it was held error to refuse to allow the plaintiff therein to show that a note, similarly given, belonged to the agent and that the company had no interest in it. But that was in keeping with, and not contrary to, the terms of the note as such evidence would have been in the case at bar. However, in view of the provision that any note taken, whether to the agent or the company, should be deposited with the latter, and, if the insurance was accepted, would be applied on the premium, we think the evidence as to whose property the note, at least the net premium note, really was, should have been admitted.

So that, so far as the default in the payment of the notes (or at least the net premium note) is concerned, that would render the insurance null and void, in the absence of any other facts counteracting that result, even if the company did charge the net premium against the agent in addition to holding the note against insured. The company could avail itself of the benefit of the note as well as of the agent's credit for the payment of the premium due; and, if the contract provided that default in the payment of any note given for the premium would render the policy null and void, we see no reason why this provision of the contract would not operate to cancel the insurance, if the provision was not waived. Hence we do not see how the plaintiff herein can recover upon any theory that the taking of the premium notes was an extension of credit to the insured on the part of the agent, Walsh, and that the company "held said Walsh alone responsible." There is no evidence that the company looked to him alone, or that the notes given were regarded as the agent's individual property. On the contrary, the clause first above quoted in the contract, together with what was actually done, all point directly the other way, namely, that the notes, or at least the net premium note, could not be regarded as the property of the agent, and that the company did not look to the agent alone for the payment thereof; and hence the company would not be precluded from insisting upon the forfeiture on account of the default, unless that was waived. In other words, plaintiff's right to recover cannot be predicated upon any theory that the default in the notes was a matter merely between insured and the agent and not affecting the relations between insured and the company. So that there was no ground for submitting plaintiff's case upon the theory contained in the instruction hereinabove set out, and hence this was error.

[5] But, although the contract provided for a forfeiture in case of default, yet the effect of that may be nullified if the same be waived; and it would seem that in this case there is room for a jury to find that the prompt payment of the notes was waived by the company and by the agent also, if the forfeiture clause be for his benefit too. For this reason we do not reverse the case outright, as defendant so earnestly insists, but reverse the judgment and remand the cause for a new trial on the theory of waiver if the plaintiff chooses to do so.

COWAN v. HYDRAULIC PRESS BRICK CO. (No. 16086.)

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. June 8, 1920.)

1. Master and servant ¶109—Master must furnish team reasonably safe for the purposes.

The master must furnish his servant with a team reasonably safe for the purposes intended, in determining which the age and experience of servant must be considered.

2. Master and servant ¶286(11)—Negligence in furnishing team to boy held question for jury.

In an action for injuries to a 16 year old boy who was thrown from a wagon when the mules he was driving shied, evidence that the mules were apt to shy and were hard to hold, and that plaintiff had complained he could not manage them, held to warrant submission of the case to the jury.

3. Trial ¶191(10)—Instruction held to assume mules were vicious.

In an action for injuries to an employé thrown from a wagon when the mules he was driving shied, an instruction predicated recovery on a finding that defendant furnished plaintiff with a team of mules with vicious and dangerous habits, known to defendant, was erroneous as assuming that the mules were vicious and dangerous.

4. Trial ¶252(11) — Instruction predicated recovery on fact not supported by evidence is error.

An instruction predicated recovery by an employé upon finding by the jury that the mules furnished by the master were vicious and dangerous, which there was no evidence to support, was erroneous.

5. Appeal and error ¶1066—Instruction predicated recovery on fact not supported by evidence held prejudicial.

An instruction predicated recovery upon a finding that the mules furnished servant were vicious and dangerous, which was unsupported by evidence, was prejudicial, notwithstanding that servant might have recovered because the mules were not suitable for him to drive, since the jury might have inferred from the instruction that the court considered there was evidence that the mules were vicious and dangerous.

Werner & Penney, of St. Louis, for appellant.

Charles A. Lich, of St. Louis, for respondent.

BIGGS, C. From an adverse judgment for $3,000 in a negligence case arising out of the relation of master and servant, defendant appeals, specifying as error the failure of the court nisi to direct a verdict for defendant and error in giving plaintiff's main instruction to the jury, which covered the whole case and upon which a liability was predicated.

On October 18, 1916, when plaintiff was 16 years of age, he was employed by defendant as a driver of a team of mules delivering brick about the city of St. Louis. It is alleged by plaintiff, that defendant, in disregard of its duty to furnish plaintiff with a proper, suitable, and safe team, did furnish him with a team of mules of vicious, dangerous, and incorrigible habits and tendencies, which habits and tendencies were known to the defendant, or might by the exercise of ordinary care on its part have been known to it; that on account of his youth and inexperience in driving said team of mules, and while acting under the orders of defendant's foreman and in the usual course of his employment, and while driving said team across the Compton avenue bridge, said team became vicious, unmanageable, incorrigible, and unruly and with a sudden jerk started to run away, and that as a result of the sudden jerk of said team, and the severe jolting of the wagon caused by the speed at which said team was going, plaintiff was thrown from his seat on the wagon to the street, dragged for about 10 feet, and severely injured.

It is further alleged that plaintiff complained to the defendant's foreman about the habits of said team, with the statement that plaintiff could not manage the team on account thereof, and that plaintiff was assured by the foreman that the team was not vicious and dangerous and that he could safely handle them, and that plaintiff was told by the foreman to proceed with his work; that plaintiff thereupon, relying on the foreman's superior knowledge, continued his work with the team.

The case as made is bottomed entirely upon plaintiff's version of events. In considering the demurrer to the evidence we must concede plaintiff's statements to be true and draw from them every inference that may reasonably be drawn in his favor.

Plaintiff started to work for defendant when 12 years of age, driving a small (donkey) mule to a cart. In September prior to the accident, which happened October 18, 1916, plaintiff commenced driving a brick wagon drawn by two mules. The wagon was without brakes, but was equipped with a chain to lock the wheels when going down grade.

In the language of the witness:

The team they furnished me in the beginning was a gentle young team of mules; a small team they had been driving on the clay hill a long time. They were gentle and weren't mean and shy or anything like that. Their names were Buckskin and Frank, and I drove them from August up to October 11th. On October 11th I was 15 minutes late. There was nothing but that big team in the stable. The stable boss said I had to take that team. I went out that morning with that team and I came back at 5 o'clock in the evening. This team I continued to drive up until the time of the accident. I had to; they wouldn't give me another team. I complained to Ed Haag, the foreman at the yard, and told him two or three times about that team. I told him in the morning again and I told him in the evening I couldn't handle them because I could not make more than one or two loads a day, because I couldn't handle them. I made this complaint the first time that evening when I came in on the first day that I had them out.

When I complained to Mr. Haag he said: "Go ahead and drive it. It's a gentle team; there isn't anything the matter with them." I went out. It was near the end of the pay roll and I was trying to make up the pay roll. The first complaint was made on the evening of the first day. The next time I complained was the next day at 12 o'clock. I told him if I couldn't get my team I would have to quit. He said by him being short to go ahead and drive them; he would try to get my team back as soon as he could. That evening when I came in I asked the stable boss, John Farrier, I asked him: "What did he say about that team?" He said he had gone and I would have to take the team out the next morning. The next morning I took the team out. I did not see Haag after that.

On the 18th, prior to the time of the accident, I was going to Compton and Chouteau, hauling a load of brick. While I was going over the Compton viaduct or bridge. the mules were shy and what you call a team spreads, when you go down a hill they open like that (illustrating). I couldn't handle them; they were too big and hard. When I was about 10 feet away from the curb there was a depression on the right side of the bridge. There was some trains and a lot of noise, and the mule on the right side had been shy all that day and ever since I had him. When I got near the hill, going down hill, it was hard to hold back and they would spread and slip and slide on the blocks. This mule on the right side got afraid of the whistle and he jumped like that (illustrating) —I mean the train whistles around there, trains underneath the viaduct—this mule jumped on the sidewalk and the wagon ran in the depression and he caused the other mule to spread as much as he did. He pulled the wagon over to the sidewalk and the front wheel went into the depression; the front wheel on the right side went into the depression. He did this suddenly. I was going south.

When it went into that depression I was sitting in the middle of the board. I fell off the wagon and my leg caught between the wheel and the iron curb. I had for a seat on this wagon an ordinary board. When I started out that morning I had a spring seat, my property. I paid $2.50 for it, and when I came back from my second load I had to get a drink of water, and when I came back my seat was missing and I picked up an ordinary board I saw, going out of the yard. I got my leg caught between the curb and the front wheel on the right side. After that this mule on the left side was held back and the other one was trying to run. He was walking fast. I was dragged about 10 feet.

On cross-examination plaintiff testified:

I started to drive this last team on October 11th in the morning and drove it all day the 11th and 12th and the 13th up to the time of the accident at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. I had driven across the bridge and over the crown and had commenced to go down the southern incline, and going down that incline the viaduct is paved with wooden blocks and it was a little hard to hold the team back going down hill. They were inclined to spread, by that I mean separate, and as I was going down the front right-hand wheel, as I went south, dropped into a depression on the side of the paving. There is a footway or place for foot passengers across that viaduct, and there is just a lining of iron along the corner. That depression is square, about that big and that wide (illustrating). It is a sewer. It is about 2 feet, the same length all the way around, 2 feet square and running up to this curb, and it is about 6 inches deep. Then there is an iron grating and my wheel dropped into that hole and that bounced me off.

The foot fell first and the wheel caught it between the curb and the wheel. Before the team came to a stop they moved about 10 feet. Then somebody stopped them. I don't know who. I was sitting on a loose board and the board was laid right on top of the bricks, so that I didn't have anything to hold onto. I didn't call anybody's attention to that before I left the yard that morning. That was the first time I had been over the Compton avenue bridge with a team. I had walked over there.

Plaintiff called a police officer, who did not witness the accident but who arrived at the scene shortly afterward. He testified that he found the team standing about 200 feet north of Chouteau avenue close to the curb; that the team was perfectly still when he arrived there, and that they were standing attached to the brick wagon and no one was holding them; and that he could see where the wagon had been dragged along the curb about 10 feet.

We do not believe that the foregoing evidence even tends to prove that the mules had vicious, dangerous, and incorrigible habits and tendencies as charged in the petition. It did tend to prove that the mules (especially the right mule) were shy at times and that they were too big and hard of mouth for plaintiff, a boy of 16, to manage and handle. Such a team in the hands of a grown man of strength and experience would doubtless have been safe, and to furnish that character of team to such a man could not be said to be negligence on the part of the master.

[1] The duty of the master is well settled, and that is to use ordinary care to furnish the plaintiff a reasonably safe and suitable team for the purpose for which they were to be used. And in measuring the duty the age and experience of plaintiff must be considered, for it may be negligence to furnish a 16 year old boy with a team to work when to furnish the same team to a grown man would not constitute negligence. McCready v. Stepp, 104 Mo. App. 340, 78 S. W. 671; Stutzke v. Ice & Fuel Co., 156 Mo. App. 1, 136 S. W. 243.

[2] While the evidence failed to establish the dangerous habits of the mules as alleged, it was sufficient, in our judgment, to authorize the court in sending the case to the jury on the theory that defendant had violated its duty to furnish a reasonably safe team under the circumstances of the case, when it furnished plaintiff, a 16 year old boy, with this big team of mules that were shy and so hard of mouth that plaintiff could not handle and control them. Knowledge of the inability of plaintiff to handle the team was sufficiently brought home to defendant by the complaints made by plaintiff to the foreman and stable boss. We accordingly hold that there was a case made for the jury, but not the case as submitted by the instructions.

Plaintiff's main instruction reads thus:

"The court instructs the jury that if you find and believe from the evidence that on or about October 13, 1916, and prior thereto, plaintiff was employed by the defendant; that his duties required him to drive a team of mules belonging to the defendant; that on or about October 13, 1916, his duties required him to deliver a load of bricks and that in order to deliver same it became necessary for him to drive said team of mules across the Compton avenue bridge, in the city of St. Louis, Mo.; that the defendant furnished plaintiff with a wagon and team of mules, said mules having vicious, dangerous, and incorrigible habits and tendencies, which said habits and tendencies were known to the defendant, or might by the exercise of ordinary care on its part have been known to it; that while plaintiff was driving said team of mules across the Compton avenue bridge that said team of mules became vicious and incorrigible and that plaintiff because of his youth and inexperience in driving said team of mules could not handle them; that said team of mules took fright, became vicious and incorrigible, and ran away, throwing plaintiff from the wagon to the street, causing plaintiff to suffer certain injuries; and that the vicious, incorrigible, and unmanageable actions of said mules or either of them directly caused the plaintiff's fall from the wagon in question—if you find these facts, then your verdict must be for the plaintiff."

[3, 4] This instruction, under the facts of the case, is wrong: (1) Because it may reasonably be said to assume that the mules were vicious and dangerous and incorrigible, and (2) because it predicates a liability on something which there is no evidence to support, namely, that the mules had vicious, dangerous, and incorrigible habits; that they at the time of the accident became vicious and incorrigible and ran away, throwing plaintiff from the wagon, and that the vicious, incorrigible, and unmanageable actions of said mules, or either of them, directly caused plaintiff to fall from the wagon.

In the case of Small v. Ice & Fuel Co., 179 Mo. App. 456, loc. cit. 465, 162 S. W. 709, 712, this court says:

"And it is error to submit, as a predicate of liability, something which there is no evidence to support, or which in no way gave rise to or contributed to produce the injury or loss for which a recovery is sought. See Sallee v. McMurry, 113 Mo. App. 253, 88 S. W. 157; Houck v. Railway Co., 116 Mo. App. 559, 92 S. W. 738; Huston v. Railroad, 129 Mo. App. 576, 107 S. W. 1045; Shannon v. Abell, 155 S. W. 62; Kendrick v. Harris, 156 S. W. 490.

"And to submit matters which, under the evidence, could in no way have contributed to produce plaintiff's injury, is undoubtedly reversible error. In Huston v. Railroad, supra, loc. cit. 586, it is said: 'We find that prejudicial error was committed by the learned trial judge in submitting to the jury the issue of whether the injury was caused in whole or in part by the failure of defendant to maintain and use a toggle on the machine. The absence of this appliance did not and could not in any way have contributed to the injury. * * * In submitting this issue to the jury the court, in effect, declared that there were facts adduced by evidence from which the jury reasonably might infer that the absence of the toggle had a direct effect in the production of the injury. A declaration of this character which is unsupported by substantial evidence must be presumed to have had some effect on the minds of the jury and, consequently, to have been prejudicial to the defendant."

[5] While it may be said this instruction merely went further than required and called for a finding of more facts than necessary on which to base a liability, we hold the instruction prejudicial to the defendant, for to submit to the jury the question whether the mules were dangerous, vicious, incorrigible, etc., necessarily led the jury to believe that the court considered that there was evidence to establish such fact. The court by its instruction, in effect, declared that there was evidence adduced from which the jury might find that the mules had the habits and characteristics alleged against them in the petition.

It follows from the foregoing that it is unnecessary for us to say whether the fact that the instruction assumes as true facts which were in issue in the case constituted reversible error.

For the error specified, the Commissioner recommends that the judgment be reversed and the cause remanded.

PER OURIAM. The foregoing opinion of BIGGS, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

The judgment of the circuit court is accordingly reversed and the cause remanded.

E. M. Harber and Francis M. Hayward, both of Kansas City, for appellant.

Ed. E. Aleshire and Sharp & Sharp, all of Kansas City, for respondent.

ELLISON, P. J. Plaintiff received personal injury by falling on one of defendant's granitoid sidewalks. She recovered judgment in the trial court.

[1] Plaintiff gave notice to the city within 90 days of the injury as required by the Laws 1913, p. 545, but its sufficiency as to location is objected to by defendant. The notice fixes the place in these words:

"I sustained injuries by falling to the sidewalk while walking over and along the public sidewalk on the north side of Forty-First street between Garfield and Brooklyn streets, Kansas City, Mo.; said falling being caused by an accumulation of water, sewerage, mud, and other refuse on said sidewalk at said place."

It is claimed that to fix the place as between two streets, a block apart, is too indefinite for compliance with the statute, and Krucker v. City of St. Joseph, 195 Mo. App. 101, 190 S. W. 644, is cited as authority. The cases are not alike. That case was where the whole face of that section of the city was covered with snow and ice, and nothing appeared in the notice to particularize the place between the two streets named where the person was hurt so that the city might identify it. We said in that case that—

"Naming the place as between two streets over 400 feet apart would not be fatal looseness of description, if plaintiff had stated something more which would have served as a guide to the city when it came to examine."

In this case we have what the other lacked. For here there was mud and slime at only one place and covering about 10 feet of the sidewalk, so that the city could find and examine the very spot with great ease. McCabe v. City of Cambridge, 134 Mass. 484.

[2] Another objection made to the notice in this court is that it is signed by "Mrs. J. H. Manning," while the plaintiff is "Alice H. Manning," without evidence that the two names are one person. It is probable she signed by the initial of her husband's first name. But it is enough to say that when defendant specified its objections to the trial court it did not include that now made.

[3] Defendant claims that mud on a sidewalk is of "too trifling a nature" to be termed an obstruction for which a city may be held liable. The evidence tended to show the mud to be from one-half an inch to two inches deep, of slick or slippery kind, and we think the city liable to allow that condition to exist on its sidewalks. We have held a city's liability to extend to mud on sidewalks; Milledge v. Kansas City, 100 Mo. App. 490, 74 S. W. 892; Strange v. City of St. Joseph, 112 Mo. App. 629, 87 S. W. 2.

Defendant cites O'Reilly v. City of Syracuse, 49 App. Div. 538, 63 N. Y. Supp. 520. The case is not in point. It did not involve a sidewalk. The plaintiff in that case fell on a muddy street crossing, and the court held that a city could not be held for failing to keep its streets free from mud, or because they became slippery. The syllabus reads that:

"A city is not liable to a pedestrian who slips and falls on a street simply because $1\frac{1}{4}$ to 2 inches of mud is permitted to accumulate and remain on the pavement, spread evenly over its entire surface."

The judgment must be affirmed.
All concur.

STAFFORD et al. v. JOHNSON.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 18, 1920.)

1. Judgment \S 720—Judgment conclusive on every point actually and necessarily decided.

A judgment is conclusive in a subsequent action upon every matter actually and necessarily decided in the former suit, though not directly the point in issue.

2. Courts \S 90(6) — Practice laid down by decisions will be followed under doctrine of stare decisis.

Rule as to whether question of title is involved in certain action so as to give Court of Appeals jurisdiction laid down in certain cases and followed by a number of other cases will be followed by the Court of Appeals under the doctrine of stare decisis, though the rule appears illogical to the court.

3. Appeal and error \S 38—Allegation of title in plaintiff not sufficient to give appellate court jurisdiction.

Judgment for $150 in action for possession of passway and for damages for interference therewith is not appealable to Court of Appeals, the question of title to land not being involved, even though defendant denied plaintiff's allegation of title in himself.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Johnson County.

Action by Mason Johnson against F. M. Stafford and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

W. H. Vaughan & Sons, of Paintsville, for appellants.

Wells & Wells, of Paintsville, for appellee.

THOMAS, J. The appellee and plaintiff below, Mason Johnson, filed this suit in the Johnson circuit court against appellants and defendants, F. M. Stafford and W. T. Stafford, alleging that he was the owner and entitled to the possession of an easement over and across the lands of the defendants, which easement he particularly described, and that the defendants were obstructing the passway and withholding its possession and use from him, which they had done for a period of three years, and that he was thereby damaged in the sum of $100 per year, and he sought judgment against defendants for the possession of the passway and for $300 damages.

The answer was a general denial, containing no affirmative averment of title to the passway, in defendants or any one else. At the trial there was a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $150, for which amount judgment was rendered, but there was no adjudication of the title to the passway. Seeking a reversal of that judgment, defendants have appealed, relying upon a number of grounds for a reversal, none of which are we able to consider, since under the rule announced in a number of cases from this court we are without jurisdiction to consider the case upon its merits.

[1] Section 950 of the Kentucky Statutes denies the right of appeal to this court under any conditions when the value in controversy is less than $200, unless the title to real estate or to an easement therein or the enforcement of a statutory lien thereon is involved. The general rule as to what issues are involved in the litigation is that "a judgment is conclusive upon every matter actually and necessarily decided in the former suit, though not then directly the point in issue." Freeman on Judgments, § 258. In section 257 of the same work it is said:

"It is not necessary to the conclusiveness of the former judgment that the issue should have been taken upon the precise point which it is proposed to controvert in the collateral action. It is sufficient if that point was essential to the former judgment. 'Every point which has been either expressly or by necessary implication in issue, which must necessarily have been decided in order to support the judgment or decree, is included.'"

It would seem to logically follow that the denial by the defendants of plaintiff's ownership of the passway in question would put that fact in issue and therefore involve the question of plaintiff's title to it. No other conclusion to our minds would possess the elements of soundness, but this court, in the case of Ponder v. Lard, 102 Ky. 605, 44 S. W. 138, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1649, held that in an action of trespass to realty, where the plaintiff alleged title in himself, which was only denied by defendant, the question of title to the land trespassed upon was not involved. The judgment in that case was for only $25 damages for the trespass complained of, and the appeal was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. That case has been followed by those of I. C. R. R. Co. v. Major, 121 S. W. 646, Cook v. Rockhouse Realty Co., 159 Ky. 710, 169 S. W. 480, and Lexington & Eastern Railway Co. v. Grigsby, 176 Ky. 727, 197 S. W. 408.

The Major and Grigsby Cases involved the right of plaintiff to a passway and damages for its obstruction or destruction by the defendant. In neither of them was the title to the passway contested through a claim of ownership by defendant, though the answer in each case denied plaintiff's title. In asserting the insufficiency of the answer in the Major Case to create an issue as to the title so as to involve the right to the easement as contemplated by section 950 of the Statutes, the opinion says:

"Appellant merely denied the title of appellee, and that it damaged the passway. * * * The answer nowhere claims the land as that of defendant; and, while it denies the right of recovery, the answer does not bring into question the title, so that a judgment herein would bar an action in ejectment."

In the Grigsby Case this court construed the answer of the defendant to be only a denial of the appellee's title to the easement, and, the judgment being for only $150 damages, the appeal was dismissed. In the course of the opinion the court said:

"The pleadings nowhere asked the court to adjudge the rights of the parties to the pass-way, and the judgment made no attempt to do so. It is the character of the judgment that controls the right of appeal. Haynes v. Adsit, 167 Ky. 443."

[2, 3] These cases, if followed, are conclusive of the question. Whatever may be said of their soundness as an original proposition, the question of practice which they announce has become too firmly fixed in this jurisdiction to attempt to overthrow it now. The doctrine of stare decisis compels us to adhere thereto, since we conclude it is better for the rule to remain as it is than to attempt to unsettle it at this late day.

We do not regard the opinion in the case of Central Kentucky Natural Gas Co. v. Stevens, 134 Ky. 306, 120 S. W. 282, as being in conflict with the cases cited. The matter involved there was the title to the royalty due from the operator of a gas well drilled in land about which there was a dispute as to its ownership. The plaintiff sued the operator of the well, who answered that another claimed the title to the land and made the answer a cross-petition against him, but the court overruled the motion for that purpose and plaintiff recovered judgment for the amount of royalty claimed by him. It was held that the court should have allowed the cross-petition to be filed and the title to the royalty determined, and the trial court erred in declining to do so. It was furthermore held in that opinion that the title to the royalty not only involved the value of that portion of it due at the time of the filing of the suit, but that which might become due from future operations. From these facts it will clearly appear that that opinion is not in conflict with the other cases.

The only matter involved, then, on this appeal being the judgment for $150, and it being insufficient to give this court jurisdiction, the appeal is dismissed.

CRAVENS v. LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 18, 1920.)

1. Constitutional law §70(3)—Legislature sole judge of policy.

Statutes of limitations are founded in public policy, and the Legislature which enacts them is the sole judge of that public policy, unless, perhaps, the limitation is so short as to constitute a practical denial of justice.

2. Limitation of actions §31—Action by husband to recover for loss of services of wife injured while passenger barred in one year.

An action by a husband to recover for the loss of the services and society of his wife, injured while a passenger, is barred after the expiration of one year, under Ky. St. §§ 2515, 2516; it being immaterial that the injuries grow out of a violation of a contract of carriage.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nelson County.

Action by T. W. Cravens against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest N. Fulton and Osso W. Stanley, both of Bardstown, for appellant.

Benj. D. Warfield, of Louisville, and Jno. S. Kelley and Jno. A. Fulton, both of Bardstown, for appellee.

THOMAS, J. The sole question involved on this appeal is whether a husband's right of action to recover damages for the loss of services of his wife and his loss of consortium is barred by the one-year statute of limitation prescribed in section 2516 of the Kentucky Statutes, or whether the five-year limitation prescribed by section 2515 applies. The injury to the wife resulting in the loss of her services and the loss of her consortium to the husband, to recover for which this suit was brought, was sustained by her, as alleged, on December 20, 1917, and was the result of the negligence of the defendant and appellee, Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, while the wife was a passenger on one of its trains. She sustained the loss of a leg and was otherwise injured, and her husband sought by his petition to recover the sum of $15,000 as damages for the loss of her services and of her society resulting from such injuries.

Among the paragraphs contained in the answer was one pleading the one-year statute of limitations, the suit having been filed more than one year after the infliction of the injuries to the wife. A demurrer filed to that plea was overruled, and plaintiff declining to reply thereto, his petition was dismissed, and he appeals. Another paragraph of the answer relied on a settlement made with the plaintiff husband and his wife, whereby they were paid the sum of $8,750 in full satisfaction of their respective damages growing out of the injuries complained of. A reply was filed to that paragraph, but there was no adjudication of the issues raised thereon, and we will make no further reference to it.

Section 2516 of the Statutes says:

"An action for an injury to the person of the plaintiff, or of his wife, child, ward, apprentice, or servant, or for injuries to person, cattle, or stock, by railroads, or by any company or corporation; an action for a malicious prosecution, conspiracy, arrest, seduction, criminal conversation, or breach of promise of marriage; an action for libel or slander; an action for the escape of a prisoner arrested or imprisoned on civil process, shall be commenced within one year next after the cause of action accrued, and not thereafter."

It is the contention of counsel for plaintiff that while the cause of action for the wife growing out of the personal injuries she sustained would be barred by that section after the expiration of one year, it does not necessarily follow, as argued, that the cause of action in favor of the husband to recover for the loss of her services and of her society would be so barred; it being an independent and separate cause of action, and that it is more properly "an action for the injury to the rights of plaintiff, not arising on contract," which, by the provisions of section 2515 of the Statutes, is not barred until the expiration of five years after the cause of action accrued. In support of this contention the cases of Menefee v. Alexander, 107 Ky. 279, 53 S. W. 653, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 980, and Irwin v. Smith, 150 Ky. 147, 150 S. W. 22, with some others announcing an analogous principle, are relied on.

The Menefee Case was a malpractice suit, and the only question decided was that the negligence sued for grew out of the violation of an implied contract whereby the physician defendant agreed with plaintiff to exercise the requisite skill in performing his professional services, and being a violation of a contract, "express or implied," the limitation came within the express terms of section 2515 of the Statutes.

[1, 2] The contention is made that the injuries to the wife in this case grew out of a violation of the contract of carriage, and that the case comes within the doctrine of the Menefee Case. Every one will admit that statutes of limitations are founded in public policy, and that the Legislature in enacting them is the sole judge of that public policy, unless the limitation prescribed is so short as to constitute a practical denial of justice. The quoted words of section 2515 relied on by plaintiff's counsel as bringing this case within the five-year period of limitation are immediately followed by the expression "and not hereinafter enumerated." Section 2516 is "hereinafter enumerated" in the chapter and in the same article of the entire statute of limitations. So that if it contains any provision in conflict with the quotation from section 2515, relied on by plaintiff, such provision must prevail, which brings us to a consideration of the language of section 2516. Reading it with such eliminations as do not apply to the concrete case, it says:

"An action for an injury to the person of plaintiff, or [to the person] of his wife * * * or for injuries to person * * * by railroads * * * shall be commenced within one year next after the cause of action accrued, and not thereafter."

This language clearly indicates that the personal injuries to plaintiff or to his wife contemplated by the statute include injuries inflicted by railroads, thus eliminating counsel's contention that this case should be governed by the doctrine of the Menefee Case, since the Legislature in the section under discussion placed personal injuries inflicted by railroads, so far as limiting the time within which suits might be brought therefor, in the same category as personal injuries exclusively tortious. Aside, perhaps, from expenses of physicians, medicines, and nursing, the elements of damage which a husband sustains because of personal injuries to his wife are loss of services and loss of consortium, and unless the one-year statute fixed by section 2516 would include the cause of action for these latter elements of damage to the husband, there would be two periods of limitations applying to different elements of his damages; one to his expenses for physicians, medicine, etc., and the other to damages for the loss of services and the society of his wife. For if the five-year statute applies to the latter element of damage, the only remaining elements which section 2516 could include would be the first ones enumerated; otherwise there would be no damages to which the terms of the statute could apply, and the language "or of his wife," meaning injury to the person of the wife, would be meaningless.

This interpretation is not to be discarded because, as argued, there might be loss of the wife's services or loss of her society sustained by the husband when no personal injuries were inflicted upon her; as, for instance, if she should be kidnapped, or her affections alienated from her husband. But what would be the limitations applicable to the husband's cause of action in such cases is a matter with which we are not now concerned, since the assumed facts present only a hypothetical case. Our concern is to determine the concrete case which the facts present, and which are dealt with in section 2516, the language of which, to our minds, is too plain for discussion.

We are fortified in these conclusions by the case of Hancock v. Wilhoite, 1 Duv. 314, which was an action by the father to recover for the loss of services of his daughter because of her seduction, and the one-year limitation was held to apply; but it was also held that the cause of action did not accrue to the father until the birth of the child, when the loss of services commenced.

It being perfectly clear to our minds that the court properly overruled the demurrer to the paragraph of the answer pleading the one-year statute of limitations, it results that the judgment must be, and it is, affirmed.

COX v. ALLEN.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 18, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐1—Right of appeal one of grace only.

The right of appeal is one of grace only, and, for one to avail himself of it, he must at least substantially comply with the law granting it.

2. Appeal and error ⇐390—Invalid bond not amendable under statute.

If an appeal bond required by Civ. Code Prac. § 461, is so insufficient as to render it wholly invalid, it is more than a defective bond such as may be amended under section 682.

3. Judges ⇐15(1)—County judge can appoint judge pro tem., but cannot appoint deputy or substitute judge.

The only purpose of Ky. St. § 1059, was to authorize a county judge to appoint and designate a judge pro tem. to preside over the county court when the regular judge was absent from the county, or from any cause was unable to attend and perform the duties of the office, or to preside at any particular trial or prosecution, and a county judge cannot appoint a regular deputy or substitute county judge with power and authority to act in all matters the same as the regular county judge, in the absence of such disabilities.

4. Appeal and error ⇐386(1)—Illegally appointed deputy county judge could not accept appeal bond.

One illegally attempted to be appointed a regular deputy or substitute county judge under Ky. St. § 1059, by a county judge who was neither absent from the county nor from any cause unable to attend to the duties of his office or to discharge the particular duty, could not approve or accept an appeal bond required by Civ. Code Prac. § 461, and a bond accepted or approved by him would be ineffective for any purpose.

5. Appeal and error ⇐390—Bond taken before unauthorized officer not correctable under statute.

An appeal bond required by Civ. Code Prac. § 461, taken before one attempted to be appointed by a county judge, under Ky. St. § 1059, as a substitute or regular deputy, was so invalid that it could not be corrected under Civ. Code Prac. § 682.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Floyd County.

Action by T. J. Allen against A. J. Cox. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. M. James, of Prestonsburg, for appellant.

W. P. Mayo and B. F. Combs, both of Prestonsburg, for appellee.

THOMAS, J. On March 10, 1919, the appellee, T. J. Allen, instituted before Ed. Hill, the county judge of Floyd county, forcible detainer proceedings against the appellant, T. J. Cox. A trial in that court on April 7 following resulted in a verdict in favor of Allen. On the same day Cox filed a traverse before the county judge, but he executed no bond at that time, as required by section 461 of the Civil Code; but on April 9 he appeared at the courthouse in Prestonsburg and executed a paper before one W. W. Williams, whom he found in the county judge's office, and who proposed to be acting as county judge pro tem. That paper is in the usual form of a traverse bond as prescribed by the section of the Code supra, except that in lieu of the name of the surety therein the word "cash" is written, and Cox deposited $200 with Williams at that time.

When the case was called for trial in the circuit court, the attorney for appellee moved to dismiss the appeal, upon the ground that no bond had been executed before the judge or justice who tried the case. Appellant entered a motion to permit him to execute the bond in the circuit court as provided by section 682 of the Code in case of defective bonds; but that motion was overruled, and the court sustained the one made to dismiss the appeal, and entered a judgment to that effect, to reverse which this appeal is prosecuted.

[1] In the recent case of Milliken v. Hatter, 177 Ky. 31, 197 S. W. 511, we had occasion to consider at some length the right of appeal and the necessary steps to be taken in order to preserve that right. It was there shown that the right to an appeal is one of grace only, and for one to avail himself of it he must at least substantially comply with the law granting it. It was therein held that, where a part of the provisions providing for an appeal is the execution of a bond before the proper officer, it must be done within the time required by the statute, and before the designated officer, and that the provisions relating to the execution of the bond were mandatory, and unless substantially complied with the appeal would be lost. A number of authorities are referred to in that opinion.

The case of Burchett v. Blackburn, 4 Bush, 553, was one of the same character as this one. A proper bond was executed, but no traverse was filed, and a motion to dismiss the appeal in the circuit court was sustained, the court holding, in substance, that if a proper traverse had been filed with an insufficient or defective bond, the latter might be corrected in the circuit court.

In the case of Alderson v. Trent, 79 Ky. 259, the traverse was duly filed and the bond taken before the proper officer, but it was limited in amount to the sum of $100. The circuit court sustained a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the limitation of the amount in the bond rendered it void, but this court held that such fact only rendered the bond defective, and therefore it could be corrected under the provisions of section 682 of the Civil Code.

In the case of Hargis v. Pearce, 7 Bush, 234, the appellant and his sureties signed a blank paper giving the clerk authority to write above their signatures an appeal bond appropriate to the case. The clerk neglected to do this, and the appeal was dismissed, the court saying: .

"The difference between an imperfect or defective bond and no bond at all is fatal to the appellant, and left the circuit court no jurisdiction."

The case of Slaughter v. Crouch, 64 S. W. 968, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 1214, was one of forcible detainer. The name of the traversor was signed to the bond by his attorney, within the proper time, and the name of E. M. Salin was subscribed thereto as surety. It was made to appear on a motion to dismiss the appeal that Salin signed the bond conditionally with the knowledge of the county judge who tried the case, and that others afterward signed the bond, but not within three days from the rendition of the judgment, although they agreed to do so within that time. This court, in reversing the case and directing a dismissal of the appeal, said:

"The facts in this case show that no valid bond was ever in fact executed. The only surety who signed the bond within the three days was Salin, and his signature was conditional upon the execution to him of a mortgage by Crouch, which was never executed, and he was therefore never bound thereon. The names of the other sureties were added after the expiration of the time in which they could, under the Code, have been signed and without any application having been made to the circuit judge to permit such additional signatures. We are therefore of the opinion that no valid or enforceable bond was ever executed by the defendant, and that the court erred in not sustaining the motion to dismiss the appeal."

The case of Kotheimer v. L. & I. R. R. Co., 89 S. W. 104, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 298, was a condemnation proceeding. The statute creating the remedy required an appeal bond to be executed by the appellant within 30 days after the rendition of the judgment if an appeal was taken from it. No bond was executed within that time, and the circuit court dismissed the appeal, which judgment was affirmed by this court, the opinion saying:

"As the bond was not executed within 30 days in this case, the appeal under the statute was not taken. It is not one of these cases where a defective proceeding may be amended under the Code. If a defective bond had been executed, then the Code provision would apply, but when no bond was given there is nothing to amend. The fact that the statement of the parties and the transcript of the orders was filed in the circuit court does not help the matter."

The case of Berry v. Trice, 179 Ky. 594, 201 S. W. 37, was a forcible detainer proceeding. The traversor failed to file the traverse within the three days required by the section of the Code, supra, although proper bond was executed. This court sustained the circuit court in dismissing the appeal because the requirements of the statute authorizing it had not been complied with. The right to amend or correct defective steps looking to the completion of an appeal is a statutory one, and it cannot be exercised unless authorized by the statute; hence the appellate court is without authority to allow an imperfect appeal to be cured under the power of amendment when the omission consists in an entire failure to take a necessary step, or when the action taken was wholly void. 8 Corpus Juris, 1191, and cases supra.

[2] The text in the volume of Corpus Juris referred to on page 1116 states that the acceptance of a deposit of money or other property in lieu of an appeal bond is not allowable unless authorized by the statute granting the right of appeal. It says in part:

"But, where such a deposit is not provided for, it has been held that a deposit is not a sufficient compliance with the statute which requires a bond or undertaking as a condition precedent to the right of appeal."

Many cases from a number of the states are referred to in the note supporting the text. Clearly, then, if the bond in this case was for any reason so insufficient as to render it wholly invalid, it was more than a defective bond such as may be amended under the provisions of section 682 of the Code.

[3, 4] In determining the question it becomes necessary to briefly notice section 1059 of the Kentucky Statutes, under which the authority of Williams, who approved the paper claimed to be a bond is supposed to have been conferred. That section, in so far as applicable to the question, reads:

"Whenever the county judge shall be absent or unable from any cause to attend or hold the county court or preside at any trial or prosecution, he shall appoint and designate by order entered on the order book of the county court, a county judge pro tem. Said county judge pro tem. shall possess all the qualifications required by law of the regular judge, and the regular county judge shall be liable upon his bond for the actions of said appointee: Provided," etc.

The proviso in the section relates to the swearing off the bench of the regular judge, the election of one by the members of the bar to preside at the particular trial, and the right of the parties to agree upon a judge to try their case.

Construing that portion of the section which we have quoted as conferring the authority upon him, the regular county judge of Floyd county, on February 12, 1919, entered an order upon his records in these words: "Upon motion of Ed. Hill, county judge of Floyd county, it is ordered by the court that W. W. Williams be and he is hereby appointed county judge pro tem. of Floyd county, who, being present, accepts said office and thereupon took the constitutional oath and the statutory oath, as required by law." It will thus be seen that the county judge, under the supposed authority of the section, appointed a regular deputy or substitute county judge, with power and authority to act in all matters the same as the regular county judge. Manifestly no such authority was ever intended to be conferred by the Legislature in enacting the statute. Its only purpose was to authorize the county judge to appoint and designate a judge pro tem. to preside over the county court when the regular judge was absent from the county, or from any cause was unable to attend and perform the duties of the office or to preside at any particular trial or prosecution. Whether a general appointment as was made in this case would be sufficient to authorize the appointee to discharge those duties, even under the conditions named, or whether the appointment should be made as the occasions arise, are questions not presented, and which we will not now determine. The purpose of the Legislature was to provide a method by which the public business to be discharged by the county judge might not be postponed or obstructed because of necessary absence from the county of the regular judge, or his prevention from the performance of his duties on account of sickness or other valid causes. To construe the section as the county judge did in this case would result in having two or more county judges in the same county at the same time, but only one of whom was chosen by the people as provided by law. They might perchance be making contradictory orders concerning the same matter at the same time, and thus not only obstruct the orderly administration of the office, but create endless confusion. We therefore conclude that W. W. Williams, the supposed county judge pro tem., had no more authority to approve or accept the supposed bond in this case (waiving the defect of accepting cash instead of personal security) than would any loafer who might have been in the office of the county judge at the time; for it is shown that the county judge was neither absent from the county nor for any cause unable to attend to the duties of his office, or to discharge the particular duty of taking and accepting the bond in this case. he being well and at his residence but a short distance from the courthouse.

[5] Since the cases, supra, and particularly that of Milliken v. Hatter, hold that a bond taken before an officer not authorized to take it is void, we conclude that the bond in this case was ineffective for any purpose, and was not one that could be corrected or amended under the provisions of section 662 of the Code.

The judgment being in accord with these views, it is affirmed.

MOORE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 15, 1920.)

1. Burglary \S 41(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction of breaking dwelling house and stealing therefrom.

In a prosecution for breaking a dwelling house and stealing a watch and money therefrom, circumstantial evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction.

2. Criminal law \S 369(15), 372(10)—Other offenses held admissible to prove identity of accused and systematic plan.

In a prosecution for breaking a dwelling house and stealing a watch and a sum of money, evidence of other offenses of the same kind committed in the neighborhood held competent to connect defendant with the crime charged, and to show a systematic plan of criminal action, all fairly attributable to the same person.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kenton County.

Henry Moore was convicted of feloniously breaking a dwelling house and stealing therefrom, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John L. Cushing, of Covington, for appellant.

Chas. I. Dawson, Atty. Gen., Thos. B. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., and W. P. Hughes, of Frankfort, for the Commonwealth.

HURT, J. The appellant, Henry Moore, was indicted, tried, convicted, and sentenced to confinement, in the penitentiary, for a term of two years, for the crime of feloniously breaking the dwelling house of one Foster, and feloniously taking away and stealing therefrom a watch and 50 cents in money. He appeals and asks that the judgment be reversed upon the following grounds: (1) "The verdict is against the evidence and is not sustained by a sufficiency of evidence." (2) The court erred in admitting incompetent evidence against him.

[1] (a) The evidence upon which the conviction was had consisted altogether of the proof of circumstances, but, when it is all considered together, the verdict is not against the weight of the evidence at all, and in our opinion is sufficient to sustain the verdict. The chief circumstances which went to make up the evidence of his guilt are that on the morning of the 1st day of February, at about 4 o'clock a. m., some one entered the dwelling house of Foster, by forcing open a window with a chisel or "jimmy," and stole and carried away a watch, of the value of $35, and 50 cents in money, the property of Foster. Early in the morning a footprint was discovered, in the mud at Foster's yard, as if a person had jumped and alighted upon the foot. The heel of the shoe, as appeared from the track, was of a very peculiar and uncommon shape and character, and such as had not been seen or used about Covington, where the crime was committed. Between 4 o'clock and 5 o'clock a. m., upon the same morning and in the same immediate neighborhood, in West Covington, a man corresponding in height with the accused and wearing a soft, slouch hat, well pulled down over his eyes, entered the house of Mrs. Miller, and began to ransack the building, but upon discovery fled out of the house. Near the same time some one pried open a window to the house of Ross Sullivan, with the use of a "jimmy" or similar article, but took nothing, though the burglarious intention was evident from the fact of evidence of searching for valuables. About the same hour a window of the dwelling of Hutchens was forced open in the way above described, and there was evidence of an attempt or an entry into the house through the window. These dwellings were all near to each other. When the party fled from the house of Mrs. Miller, she immediately notified the police by telephone, and a policeman responded, and when near the house of Hutchens a man corresponding in height and size to the accused, with a soft, slouch hat pulled low over his face, sprang over the wall from Hutchens' yard, and ran. The policeman pursued and discharged a revolver at him, but he escaped. The policeman found an overcoat upon the wall, where the man sprang over it, and in the pocket of the overcoat was found a letter addressed to a woman, and requesting that she communicate with the writer by letter, and giving his address as 806 Barr street, Cincinnati, and subscribed with the name of the accused as the writer. The police officers of Cincinnati were notified, and, going to 806 Barr street, the accused was found in bed and asleep at 10 o'clock a. m. He claimed to have been engaged in a card party at the house until 8 o'clock a. m., when, after having said his prayers, he had retired. He was brought to Covington and requested to write his address and a portion of the note found in the overcoat pocket at Hutchens' yard. These specimens of his handwriting were used as evidence upon the trial, and a striking similarity, in the shape of the letters and style of writing, appears between the writing done by the accused and the letter which was in the pocket of the overcoat found upon Hutchens' wall. A very strong odor of perfume was upon the overcoat, and an odor of the same perfume was conspicuous upon the clothing of the accused, when arrested. He had upon his feet a pair of shoes which bore the strange and unusual character of heel, which would make the footprint discovered at Foster's yard, and the accused deposed that he purchased the shoes in Alabama, where it was recommended to him that the character of heels upon them would prevent him from "running them over." It was only a distance requiring 10 to 15 minutes in which to cover it on foot, from the end of the bridge over the Ohio river, at West Covington, to 806 Barr street, in Cincinnati. There was an absence of any reasonable explanation to remove the convicting force of the above-detailed circumstances. The evidence was sufficient to require the submission of the cause to the jury and to sustain the verdict.

(b) The evidence, which is complained of as being prejudicial is the proof of the breaking of the dwelling houses of Mrs. Miller, Sullivan, and Hutchens, and the rule of criminal procedure is invoked which prohibits the proof being made against one on trial for a crime of the guilt of other crimes. This is a general rule, which applies to the admission of evidence in a criminal trial, and its violation is always prejudicial, when the propriety of its admission does not fall within one of the exceptions to the rule; but, when the state of case allows one of the exceptions to the rule, the exception has the same force and is as valid as the rule itself, and in fact the exceptions constitute a general rule of evidence. The rule embodying the exceptions is thus stated in Clary v. Commonwealth, 163 Ky. 48, 173 S. W. 171:

"When one is being tried for a crime, the relevancy of the proof of other crimes of which he has been guilty is only in case where a crime has been proven, and proof of some other crime is necessary to identify the accused as the person who committed the crime proven, as above stated; or where it is necessary to show guilty knowledge in the accused, it is relevant to prove that at another time and place, not too remote, the accused committed or attempted to commit a similar crime to the one of which he is accused; or where it is necessary to show a particular criminal intent in the person on trial, or to show malice in him, or the motive for the commission of the crime, or to show that the crime for which he is being tried is a part of a plan or system of criminal actions, it is relevant to prove against the accused, under proper instructions of the court to the jury, other crimes of which the accused has been guilty."

In Musick v. Commonwealth, 186 Ky. 45, 216 S. W. 116, it was held that it was also relevant to admit evidence of a crime, other than the one for which the accused was on trial, when the crime charged is so interwoven with other offenses, that they cannot be separated.

[2] In the instant case the proof of the crime of breaking into and stealing from the dwelling of Foster was proven, but it was necessary to a conviction to prove that the accused was the individual who did it. The breaking into the house of Hutchens was done in a similar way and for a similar purpose to the breaking into the house of Foster. The crimes were all committed, in point of time, within the space of an hour and in the immediate neighborhood of each other, showing a systematic plan of criminal actions, and all fairly attributable to the same person. The evidence was relevant and competent, as conducing to prove the identity of the perpetrator of the crime at Foster's, with that at Hutchens', whom the evidence conduced to prove was the accused. The principle above stated has been upheld by this court, in addition to the two cases mentioned, in Thomas v. Commonwealth, 1 Ky. Law Rep. 122, Tye v. Commonwealth, 3 Ky. Law Rep. 59, O'Brien v. Commonwealth, 115 Ky. 608, 74 S. W. 666, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 2511, Jenkins v. Commonwealth, 167 Ky. 544, 180 S. W. 961, 3 A. L. R. 1522, and Richardson v. Commonwealth, 166 Ky. 570, 179 S. W. 458. That none of the evidence admitted was prejudicial to appellant's substantial rights is readily apparent, when it is observed that the jury fixed his punishment at the minimum allowed by law.

The judgment is affirmed.

VALLANDINGHAM v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 18, 1920.)

Seduction \S 40, 42—Questions to prosecutrix as to birth of child and previous intercourse with other men prejudicial error.

In a prosecution for seduction under promise of marriage, prejudicial error was committed in asking prosecutrix as to length of time after first intercourse that baby was born, and whether she had sexual relations with any other man up to time of intercourse with defendant.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bath County.

B. Vallandingham was convicted of seduction under promise of marriage, and appeals. Reversed, with directions for a new trial.

G. C. Ewing, of Owingsville, and W. B. White, of Mt. Sterling, for appellant.

Chas. I. Dawson, Atty. Gen., C. W. Goodpaster, of Owingsville, and W. O. Hamilton, of Mt. Sterling, for the Commonwealth.

CARROLL, O. J. The appellant, Vallandingham, was found guilty of seducing Grace Purvis under a promise of marriage, and from the judgment of the verdict he appeals.

The only witnesses who testified as to any material fact in the case were Grace Purvis, the prosecuting witness, who was about 20 years of age, and the accused, a young man of 22. She testified that Vallandingham accomplished her seduction after he had promised to marry her; while he denied that he had promised to marry or had sexual intercourse with the accused.

On the trial the prosecuting witness was asked and answered over the objection of counsel for defendant these questions:

"Q. Did you ever have any sexual relations with him? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long after the first time that you had sexual relations with him was it before your baby was born? A. It was seven or eight months, or something that way. Q. Up to the time that you had sexual relations with him had any other man had carnal knowledge of you? A. No, sir."

And it is now insisted that the court committed prejudicial error in permitting these questions to be asked and answers made.

In the case of Jordan v. Commonwealth, 180 Ky. 379, 202 S. W. 896, 1 A. L. R. 617, we had the competency of evidence of this nature before us, and held that it was incompetent and prejudicial. To the same effect is Cline v. Commonwealth, 186 Ky. 429, 216 S. W. 594; Hoskins v. Commonwealth, 188 Ky. 80, 221 S. W. 230. The evidence here introduced is substantially the same as that held inadmissible and prejudicial in the Jordan Case.

It is also complained that the attorney for the commonwealth in his closing argument was guilty of misconduct in referring to this incompetent evidence. The court, however, admonished the jury not to regard it, and, as this error will not again occur, nothing more need be said about it.

For the error mentioned, the judgment is reversed, with directions for a new trial not inconsistent with this opinion.

BOOTH v. AKIN.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 15, 1920.)

1. Boundaries \S 37(3)—Evidence held to sustain decree quieting title in a suit involving a boundary line.

In a suit to quiet title to a strip of land involving the location of a boundary line, evidence held to support a decree quieting plaintiff's title to such strip as claimed by him.

2. Boundaries \S 6—Method of ascertaining intersection of line by reversing course stated.

Where land was conveyed by metes and bounds, beginning at a certain corner, "thence with the south side of said M. street, 25 feet, to a stake or stone, thence south across a lot of ground of B., 127 feet, to the north side of an alley, thence east with the north side of said alley 25 feet to the M. E. Church house lot, thence north with the west line of the M. E. Church lot to M. street," to determine where the west line of the lot conveyed should intersect the alley south of the lot, the point of intersection was properly ascertained by measuring by the calls of the deed along the north line of the alley a distance of 25 feet from the west line of the M. E. Church lot.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Caldwell County.

Suit by J. A. Akin against Kate G. Booth. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John G. Miller, of Princeton, for appellant.
J. E. Baker, of Princeton, for appellee.

SETTLE, J. In this action, brought in equity, is involved the title and right to the possession of a small strip of ground in the city of Princeton particularly described in the petition, of which the appellee, J. A. Akin, claims to be the owner and in possession, and to which ownership and the right of possession is likewise claimed by the appellant, Mrs. Kate G. Booth. The petition, as amended, in substance alleges appellee's title to and possession of the ground in controversy; appellant's wrongful claim of title to same and to the possession thereof; her attempt to inclose it by a fence for the purpose of adding it to an adjoining lot of which she is the owner; and that by this alleged trespass to the property, and her wrongful claiming of title thereto she had unlawfully interfered with his possession and enjoyment thereof, and cast a cloud upon his title to same. By the prayer of the petition an injunction was asked to restrain appellant from completing the fence inclosing the ground in controversy, otherwise trespassing thereon, or setting up claim thereto, and, further, that appellee's title to the property be quieted.

The appellant's answer admits the appellee's ownership under a deed of conveyance from her of a 25-foot lot immediately adjoining the strip of ground in controversy, but denies his title to the strip of ground, any right in him to the possession thereof, or to the injunctive or other relief prayed in the petition, and alleges such title and right of possession in herself. After completing the issues by the filing of further pleadings by way of response, and the entering of orders controverting some of them of record, the cause was submitted under an agreement of the parties, also entered of record, by which the evidence introduced by them, respectively, was received by the circuit court through the oral testimony of the several witnesses, instead of in the form of depositions, as required by the rule of practice obtaining with respect to actions in equity. The evidence thus heard in the case is contained in a bill of exceptions, approved and signed by the circuit court and made a part of the record. By the decree rendered that court adjudged appellee the owner of the strip of ground described in the petition, permanently enjoined appellant from erecting a fence or other structure thereon, or in any way interfering with the appellee's use or enjoyment thereof, and gave appellee judgment against appellant for his costs expended in the action. The latter complains of the judgment, and by this appeal seeks its reversal.

While the judgment of the circuit court does not in terms expressly declare appellee's title to the ground in controversy quieted, such is clearly its meaning and legal effect. Indeed, the entire relief sought by the petition is such as appertains alone to an action quia timet. The map here furnished, substantially reproduced from one contained in the bill of evidence as a part of the testimony of a competent surveyor, by whom it was made, will give a fairly accurate description of the lot of which the strip of ground in controversy is a part, and of the several lots and streets adjoining it; also the location and dimensions of the strip in controversy and the lines and objects by which, according to the respective contentions of the litigants, its ownership should be determined.

May 13, 1915, appellee at the agreed price of $1,500, cash in hand paid, purchased of appellant a lot 25 feet in width its entire depth of 127 feet. As shown by the map, this lot lies between a lot on the east of it owned by appellee, upon which he has resided many years, the lot of the Methodist Episcopal Church south of appellee's lot, and on the west its full depth by a lot yet owned by appellant. The lot also fronts on Main street and extends to an alley south of it, which runs east and west from Seminary street to Cave street. On the date of its purchase by appellee the lot was conveyed him by a deed from the appellant which was duly acknowledged and put to record. The lot is thus described in the deed:

"A certain lot, piece, or parcel of ground, situated, lying, and being in Prince's addition to the city of Princeton, Caldwell county, Ky., and described as follows: Beginning at the northwest corner of a lot of ground now owned by Dr. J. A. Akin [appellee], on the south side of Main or College street, thence with the south side of said Main or College street 25 feet to a stake or stone, thence south across a lot of ground of Mrs. Katie G. Booth [appellant] 127 feet to the north side of an alley, thence east with the north side of said alley 25 feet to the M. E. Church house lot, thence north with the west line of the M. E. Church lot, and also with the west line of Dr. J. A. Akin's lot, to Main street, the beginning; this being 25 feet off of the eastern lot of the same piece or lot of ground as conveyed by Wiley Jones and wife to Mrs. Katie G. Booth by deed dated November 2, 1908, now of record in D. B. No. 29, pages 606, 607, Caldwell county court clerk's office."

It conclusively appears from the above deed made by appellant to appellee that the lot as described therein has a width of 25 feet from front to rear and was sold and conveyed from the eastern side of appellant's lot shown on the map as fronting on Main street, and which, as an original whole, was conveyed her November 2, 1908, by Wiley Jones and wife, and that its eastern boundary from the alley to Main street runs with the west line of the Methodist Episcopal Church lot and that of the lot upon which appellee resides. In the deed from Jones and wife to appellant, a copy of which appears in the record, the entire lot conveyed her is described as lot No. 45 in Prince's addition to the city of Princeton, that it fronts Main street 117 feet and runs back east of Cave street 127 feet to an alley, and is what remained of a lot after the conveyance of a part of it by deed from Jones and wife to M. J. Groom and wife, made August 21, 1907. It also appears from a deed found in the record from M. J. Groom and wife to appellee, by which the lot whereon the latter resides was conveyed him January 31, 1908, that it is therein described as the northern half of lot 39 in Prince's addition to the city of Princeton, fronting 110 feet on Main street, extending back west of Seminary street 67 feet to the M. E. Church lot. It further appears from a deed of date June 6, 1878, from M. A. Mays, president of the board of trustees of Princeton Seminary, conveying to Jas. F. Ingram and others, trustees of the M. E. Church South, Princeton, the lot occupied by its church building, that the lot is simply described as—

"situated in Prince's addition to said town and is the entire southern half of lot No. 39 in said addition, and the same upon which now stands the seminary building."

The boundary of the 25-foot lot conveyed appellee by the deed from appellant, as claimed by the former, is shown on the map as beginning on Main street at figure "1," the northwest corner of the lot on which appellee resides; thence west with the south side of Main street 25 feet to a stake or stone at figure "2" on the south line of Main street; thence south 127 feet to the north side or line of an alley at figure "3"; thence east with the north side or line of the alley 25 feet to the west line, or southwest corner, of the M. E. Church lot at figure "4" on the north line of the alley; thence north with the west line of the M. E. Church lot, and also with the west line of appellee's residence lot (the entire distance being 127 feet), to the beginning on Main street at figure "1."

The boundary of the lot as given above accords with that contained in the deed by which it was conveyed appellee by appellant. We do not find that appellant complains of any error in the boundary of the lot as set forth by the deed, but she insists that the west line thereof, extending from Main street south to the alley properly intersects it at the letter "A" on the map, and, if correctly run eastwardly a distance of 25 feet from where it reaches the north side of the alley at "A," will intersect the west line and corner of the M. E. Church lot at the letter "B," a point 2 or 2½ feet beyond and east of where appellee claims and the map shows the point of intersection to be. It will thus be seen that the ground in controversy is a narrow strip, only 2 or 2½ feet in width, at the rear or south end of the lot which as it extends northward, lessens so rapidly in width as to become practically infinitesimal in dimension and value long before the front of the lot is reached.

While the deed by which appellant conveyed appellee the 25-foot lot does not mention the fact, it appears from the evidence, and is admitted by appellant, that at the time of its execution one Frank Cash, a tenant of appellant, was in possession of the lot under a lease which did not expire until some time in April, 1918, and under the terms of his purchase of the property appellee did not get possession of it until the lease terminated. But before putting him in possession of the lot appellant, as seems to have been agreed by the parties when it was sold, in person measured, laid off, and designated its boundary assisted by appellee who acted in the matter at her request; she in doing the measuring holding one end of the tape line and he the other. In performing this work appellant determined all lines, fixed all corners, and directed the driving of such stakes as were used in designating them.

By this action of appellant the lines and corners of the lot in question admittedly were laid off and fixed as indicated by the figures "1," "2," "3," and "4," shown on the map, and as thus fixed appellant delivered to appellee the possession of the property, immediately removed therefrom, as provided by the contract of sale, a building which had been used by her former tenant, Cash, and proceeded to erect a fence separating the lot sold from the lot retained by her, which was built on the line running, as previously measured and fixed by her, from "2" to "3," as indicated on the map. Later, however, appellant seemed to conceive the idea that she had set her fence too far west, commenced the digging of new post holes, and to remove the fence farther east, so as to make it reach the alley at the letter "A," instead of the figure "3," thereby depriving appellee, as claimed, of 2 to 2½ feet of the 25-foot lot she had conveyed him. This conduct on the part of appellant caused appellee to institute the present action.

[1, 2] Without entering upon a discussion in detail of the evidence found in the record or undertaking an analysis of the testimony of any of the numerous witnesses, we deem it sufficient to say that we have reached the conclusion that the judgment of the chancellor is supported by the weight of the evidence. It is manifest that, in order to determine where the west line of the lot conveyed appellee by appellant should reach or intersect the alley south of the lot, the point of intersection must be ascertained by measuring by the calls of the deed along the north line of the alley a distance of 25 feet from the west line of the M. E. Church lot, the corner of which, according to the great weight of the evidence, is at the point on the alley represented by the figure "4" on the map, where there is a cedar post recognized, as shown by the evidence, for more than 25 years as the southwest corner of the church lot; in addition to the existence of this cedar post, the place where it stands was recognized as the corner of the church lot from 1878, the date of the deed conveying the lot to the trustees of the church, down to the erection of the cedar post and attached fence by the church.

It is true appellant and certain of her witnesses testified to the presence of another cedar post some farther north of the alley and 2 or 2½ feet east of a line running north from the cedar post at figure "4," which they believed to be the true corner of the church lot; but this testimony seems to have been successfully contradicted by that of appellee and two other witnesses, officers or members of the church, to the effect that the second cedar post was placed many years after the one on the alley for attaching to it a barrier to prevent the employees of a plant operated on the lot south of the alley from crossing it onto the church lot and using same immediately back of the church as a privy or ural, the odors of which annoyed those who met in the church for worship. Another potent fact establishing the point at figure "4" as the true location of the church lot corner, is that it gives the line of the church lot from there running east to Seminary street its correct length of 110 feet, corresponding with the length of the south line of appellee's residence lot, running the same course. Moreover, by establishing the southwest corner of the church lot at figure "4" makes it end a straight line from Main street to the alley, and likewise seems to make the line from Main street to the alley separating the 25-foot lot from that of appellant a straight line, and gives the 25-foot lot a uniform width of 25 feet from Main street to the alley. Finally, the further fact that the chancellor, in company with the parties to the action, went himself upon the premises, and viewed all ground, lines, and corners in dispute, for the purpose of satisfying himself of the situation, gives great force to the correctness of the judgment.

On the whole, we find no ground for disagreeing from his conclusions, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

R. E. O'FLYNN & SON v. EBELHAAR et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 15, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1096(3)—Opinion on former appeal is law of the case.

The opinion on former appeal is the law of the case, and matters which might have been brought to the attention of the court, but were not, are concluded by the opinion.

2. Appeal and error \S 1096(3)—Insufficiency of reply cannot be urged on defendants' second appeal.

Where defendants obtained a reversal on their first appeal on another ground than that the reply was insufficient and did not present a defense to their counterclaim, but might also have relied on the insufficiency of the reply, the former opinion was conclusive as to the sufficiency of the reply.

3. Appeal and error \S 1068(4)—Instruction as to interest held not prejudicial.

In seller's action for purchase price of goods, an instruction allowing the jury, in their discretion, to award plaintiffs interest from a certain date, held not prejudicial in stating too early a date, where the jury in fact allowed interest only from a later date, nor prejudicial in authorizing the allowance of interest in the jury's discretion; plaintiffs being entitled to interest as a matter of right.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Daviess County.

Action by Elizabeth Ebelhaar and another against R. E. O'Flynn & Son. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. P. Sandidge, of Owensboro, for appellants.

L. I. Igleheart, of Owensboro, for appellees.

CLAY, C. Elizabeth Ebelhaar and Tom Fenwick, her tenant, sold their crops of tobacco, consisting of about 9,000 pounds, to R. E. O'Flynn & Son, who refused to pay the contract price for the third delivery. Thereupon Elizabeth Ebelhaar and Fenwick brought this suit to recover the amount claimed to be due. O'Flynn & Son counterclaimed for damages in the sum of $520 because the plaintiffs failed to deliver tobacco of the quality contracted for. On the first trial the court instructed the jury to find for plaintiffs. On appeal this court held that defendants were entitled to go to the jury on their counterclaim and reversed the judgment for a new trial. O'Flynn & Son v. Ebelhaar, et al., 182 Ky. 152, 206 S. W. 284. The second trial also resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal.

We deem it unnecessary to detail the evidence. In our opinion there was such a conflict in the evidence as to make the issue raised by the counterclaim a question for the jury, and we are not prepared to say that its finding is flagrantly against the evidence.

[1, 2] Another contention is that defendants' motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict should have been sustained, because the reply did not contain a sufficient denial of the allegations of the answer and counterclaim. It is the settled rule in this state that the opinion on a former appeal is the law of the case, and matters which might have been brought to the attention of the court, but were not, are concluded by the opinion. Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Henry, 168 Ky. 453, 182 S. W. 651. While the defendants obtained a reversal of the first appeal on the ground that the evidence on the counterclaim was sufficient to take the case to the jury, they might also have relied on the fact that the reply was insufficient and did not present a defense to the counterclaim. That being true, the former opinion is conclusive as to the sufficiency of the reply, and that question is not open to further consideration. Drake v. Holbrook, 92 S. W. 297, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 1319; Lexington Ry. Co. v. Woodward, 118 S. W. 965.

[3] Instruction No. 3 is as follows:

"If the jury find in favor of the plaintiffs, they may, in their discretion, award plaintiffs interest from January 26, 1917, and so state in their verdict."

The first complaint of this instruction is that it authorized interest from January 26, 1917, instead of February 15, 1917, when plaintiffs delivered the tobacco. As a matter of fact, however, the jury allowed interest only from February 26th. Hence defendants were not prejudiced by the error relied on. Another contention is that the damages were liquidated, and the court erred in telling the jury that they might award interest in their discretion. Since plaintiffs were entitled to interest as a matter of right, we are unable to say how defendants were prejudiced by an instruction authorizing the jury to allow interest in their discretion.

Judgment affirmed.

MORGAN et al. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 11, 1920.)

1. Homicide \S 276—Existence of prior combat question for jury.

Whether on the evening of the killing there was a prior combat between some of defendants and deceased's party in which the members of the latter were the aggressors held, on conflicting testimony, a question for the jury.

2. Criminal law \S 1036(1), 1044—Evidence admitted without objection must be met by motion to exclude.

Defendants were not in a position to complain of the introduction of testimony of the details of an occurrence on the day before the homicide, not objected to when it was given, unless it be one who afterwards moved to exclude it from the jury's consideration.

3. Criminal law \S 369(3), 371(12)—Evidence of prior occurrence held admissible on question of motive and conspiracy.

The details of what occurred on the night before the homicide, when defendants called at the house where deceased's brother was stopping, held admissible, not merely to show motive, but to establish an alleged conspiracy to kill the brother, who was a member of the group fired on by defendants at the time of the killing.

4. Criminal law \S 422(6)—Utterances by conspirators tending to show conspiracy admissible against a conspirator not present.

Utterances of alleged conspirators before the accomplishment of the common purpose, tending to establish a conspiracy between them and another not present to commit a crime, are admissible against him.

5. Criminal law \S 834(3)—Instruction on self-defense is properly qualified to present commonwealth's theory supported by evidence.

Qualification of defendant's instruction on self-defense by a clause unless certain facts be found, so as to present the theory of the commonwealth, which its testimony tended to establish, is proper.

6. Criminal law §957(5)—New trial not authorized by affidavit of counsel as to a juror telling him of an occurrence during consideration of case.

Under Cr. Code Prac. § 272, forbidding examination of a juror to establish ground for a new trial, except to show that the verdict was arrived at by lot, affidavit of counsel that he was told by a juror that another juror during the consideration of the case made a statement contradictory of testimony for defendant does not authorize a new trial.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Laurel County.

Leonard Morgan and others were convicted of manslaughter, and appeal. Affirmed.

Hazelwood & Johnson, of London, for appellants.

Chas. I. Dawson, Atty. Gen., and Thomas B. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., and W. P. Hughes, of Frankfort, for the Commonwealth.

THOMAS, J. The appellants, Leonard Morgan, John Forman, Felix Forman, Steve Forman, and William Poe were convicted in the Laurel circuit court of the crime of voluntary manslaughter, on their trial under an indictment charging them with murdering James Baker. The verdict fixed the punishment of Leonard Morgan, John Forman, and William Poe at confinement in the penitentiary for 21 years; that of Felix Forman 5 years; and of Steve Forman 2 years. Their motions for a new trial having been overruled, they each appeal.

The killing occurred in Clay county on the night of February 12, 1919, near the hour of 9 o'clock. The first count in the indictment charged the defendants with jointly committing the murder, while the second count alleged a conspiracy entered into between the defendants whereby they agreed, conspired, and banded themselves together to commit the murder, which they afterward did in pursuance thereof. But three grounds are urged as alleged errors to secure a reversal of the judgment, they being: (1) The admission of incompetent testimony introduced by the commonwealth; (2) erroneous qualification of the instruction on self-defense; and (3) misconduct of the jury while in the room considering their verdict. The record in the case is a large one, and it would unnecessarily incur this opinion and serve no useful purpose to make a detailed statement of all of the facts. We will therefore give only a brief synopsis of the more prominent ones which we deem sufficient for the determination of the questions raised.

The two factions engaged in the fight in which the killing of James Baker occurred may be said to have been headed the one by the deceased, who was at the time a deputy sheriff, and the other by the defendant William Poe. The deceased and his crowd, consisting of seven or eight persons, including his brother, Hugh Baker, were stationed at a schoolhouse for the purpose of arresting some members of the Poe crowd, which included the defendants, under a warrant which Hugh Baker had procured from a justice of the peace about 4 o'clock that afternoon. The warrant had been issued at the instance of Hugh Baker because of depredations committed by Poe and his crowd the night before at the home of Vernon Hensley, where Hugh Baker was spending the night. It is the introduction of the details of what occurred at Hensley's house on the night before the killing that forms the principal basis of ground (1) urged for a reversal.

The defendants Leonard Morgan, Felix Forman, William Poe, Steve Forman, and Jim Hatchett Baker, Merida Smith, Tine William, and Bud Tegarden composed the Poe crowd, who went to the home of Vernon Hensley on the night of the 11th. The defendant John Forman was not present. All of them knew that Hugh Baker was spending the night there, and they claimed that they went there to see him in response to an invitation sent by him to William Poe for the purpose of talking about a lost moonshine still worm. All of the crowd armed themselves with shotguns, pistols, and rifles of various calibers and powers for the visit in response to this alleged invitation, and they explain their being thus armed by saying that they intended on this trip to catch some chickens which Leonard Morgan had sold to Jim Hatchett Baker, but since they neither carried nor could find a lantern they abandoned that idea after they left Hensley's house.

As to what occurred there, the witnesses for the commonwealth, some six or seven in number, practically agree, and, since Vernon Hensley is a disinterested witness, we have concluded to incorporate his statement as to what happened. He says that a while after supper some one hallooed at the gate; that he went to the door and asked what they wanted, when William Poe inquired if Hugh Baker was there, and, being informed that he was, the following occurred, according to the witness:

"He told me to tell Hugh to come out there; he wanted to see him; and I went back into the house and told Hugh that William Poe was out there; he wanted to see him; and he said to tell him to come in the house, and I stepped back and told William that Hugh said to come in—I invited him in, and he spoke to Hugh and he says, 'Hugh, old brother, come out here; I want to talk to you a minute.' Hugh got up and came out. Orville Hensley and Charley Collins come pretty close to him, and I was out in the yard. We all walked up to the front gate, and Hugh was a little in front. He walked up and put his hands upon the palings, like this (indicating to the jury). William reached out like he was shaking hands with him with his left hand; Poe did; and Hugh asked him what he had in his hand, and he says, 'I have got a 45.' He says, 'I understand you are going to report me for moonshining, and I have come up here to tell you one thing, there is no God damned man can do that and live.' He says, 'Who told you that?' and Hughie says, 'Jim Hatchett Baker told me;' and Hughie says, 'I never said it,' or something like that, and about that time Jim Hatchett Baker come around from behind the little millhouse on the left of the gate, that was on the right, and I was standing about the road. A part of this millhouse was boxed up and he come around with a pistol in his hand and he says, 'Hugh Baker, you are a God damned black-hearted son of a bitch of a liar;' and he threw his pistol on Hughie. I heard a little noise back there on the outside, and I thought I would go around the mill—lower side of the millhouse—something struck me that there might be somebody else there, and as I was crossing the fence at the far end of the millhouse from the yard Jim Hatchett Baker says, 'Vernon Hensley, by God, you get back into the house.' I says, 'I am at home;' and he says, 'You God damned son of a bitch, get back there or I will shoot your brains out if you don't.' I made another step and I heard something like guns clicking, and I looked up and seen Tine Williams, Steve Forman, Felix Forman, and Bud Tegarden had guns on me, and Merida Smith was standing there with a gun, and Leonard Morgan run back with a pistol in his hand kindly down by his side, and I says, 'What are you doing there?' None of them would speak, and I started to go back in the yard, and as I crossed the fence Leonard Morgan following me to the engine, and left him standing between myself and Hugh Baker, and after I walked back to where I was—Jim Baker was cursing and calling me all kinds of bad names and cursing me, and they was cursing Hugh and calling him all kinds of bad names, and Leonard Morgan come on down around directly and says, 'Boys, we had just as well go now;' and they started on up the road."

It is shown that several others, including Mrs. Hensley, were present and heard and testified to that conversation and the latter importuned William Poe and his crowd with tears not to shoot or kill any one, but to go away and let them alone. William Poe's version of what occurred on that occasion is that he called for Hugh Baker, who came out, and he, discovering that Poe had a pistol, asked the latter to lay it down, which he did, whereupon the parties shook hands. Poe then asked Baker, "Who told you that I had anything to do with your still worm in any way?" when the latter replied, "Jim Hatchett Baker;" and thereupon Jim Hatchett performed his part as testified to by Hensley. Witness then says that he and Hugh Baker felicitated each other over the amicable understanding reached and extended mutual invitations for visits between their respective families. The Poe crowd, on leaving the Hensley house, went to the residence of a brother of William Poe, and after a considerable time the members scattered to different places to spend the night. According to the testimony of Poe, Williams, and Smith, they and Tegarden were traveling along Ayler Lick branch the next evening on their return from inspecting a rented place which they were going to cultivate that year, when about 6:30 p. m. Hugh Baker and his brother Bob shot at them from a mountain side, wounding Tegarden, from which wound he died a few days thereafter; that immediately after this shooting William Poe went to the home of one of his brothers and from thence to the home of the defendant John Forman, and began gathering a crowd for the purpose of looking after and taking care of Tegarden, Smith, and Williams, all of whom he thought, as he testified, had been wounded. He collected his crowd and they were on their way to the scene of the alleged shooting when they arrived at the schoolhouse, where the fight occurred in which Jim Baker was killed. Poe seems to have had but little trouble in assembling his crowd on that occasion, and each of them, when found by him, was either armed or immediately armed himself. Hugh and Bob Baker deny that any shooting took place on Ayler Lick branch, or at any other place except during the fight at the schoolhouse; the two occasions being about 1 or 1½ hours apart, according to the testimony of the defendants.

[1] It is the theory of the commonwealth that the wounding of Tegarden occurred at the schoolhouse, and there are a number of circumstances indicating that such was the fact. Upon this issue there was, as is usual in such cases, a contrariety of testimony, as well as conflicting circumstances. No one of the Poe crowd was wounded in the schoolhouse fight, unless it was Tegarden, and it is indisputably established that blood was found in the path or road leading from the schoolhouse to William Poe's house, where Tegarden lived, and it is likewise testified to that soon after the schoolhouse shooting there were lamentations of both men and women in the direction of William Poe's house. On the other hand, defendants introduced testimony corroborating their story about the shooting on Ayler Lick branch. So whether there were two combats on that evening or only one at the schoolhouse was a question for the determination of the jury.

[2] The commonwealth's witnesses, consisting of those who had been summoned by the deceased to help him execute the warrant upon some of the defendants, testified that when the Poe crowd approached the schoolhouse the deceased stood on the steps and said, "Hold on, boys, don't do that; I want to talk to you;" when immediately he and all his posse were fired upon and he received the wounds from which he died. He made a dying statement to this effect, in which he was corroborated by the testimony of all of the others of his crowd who were present. The defendants say that as they got about in front of the schoolhouse they were fired upon without any words being uttered, which firing they returned. The whole front of the schoolhouse was filled with shot and bullets, and evidently a fierce battle was fought. It is the theory of defendants that there was never any warrant obtained by Hugh Baker; but that, on the contrary, he, his brothers, and others whom they had gathered together had banded themselves together for the purpose of assaulting, and perhaps killing, the members of the Poe crowd. There was no objection to the complained of testimony concerning the details of what occurred at the home of Vernon Hensley at the time it was given, but afterwards the defendant John Forman moved the court to exclude it from the consideration of the jury, presumably upon the ground that he was not present at the time. So that, whatever might be said as to the relevancy of that testimony, none of the defendants is in position to complain of its introduction, unless it be the defendant John Forman.

[8] The chief case relied on by defendants in support of their objection to this testimony is that of Martin v. Commonwealth, 93 Ky. 189, 19 S. W. 580, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 95. In that case the deceased had caused the defendant to be indicted for robbery. The court not only permitted the introduction of the indictment, upon which appeared the name of the deceased as a witness, but allowed the introduction of details of the alleged robbery. Such details manifestly had no connection at all with the crime for which defendant was being tried. When the robbery was over, if it occurred at all, defendant's full purpose in committing it was accomplished. The only relevancy of the indictment even was to show motive for killing the deceased, in order to dispose of him as a witness on the robbery indictment.

It is the general rule that neither testimony of the commission of another independent crime nor testimony of its details may be given in evidence upon the trial of another charge; but there are exceptions to this rule, as when it is necessary to establish by the independent crime the identity of the accused, or where it is necessary to show guilty knowledge on his part, or where it shows the particular criminal intent of the defendant or motive or malice for the commission of the crime for which he is being tried, or where the independent crime is so interwoven and connected with the one on trial as that they cannot be separated, or to prove a charged conspiracy. These general rules will be found stated in the case of Music v. Commonwealth, 186 Ky. 51, 216 S. W. 116; Romes v. Commonwealth, 164 Ky. 334, 175 S. W. 669; Graham v. Commonwealth, 174 Ky. 645, 192 S. W. 683; Jenkins v. Commonwealth, 167 Ky. 544, 180 S. W. 961, 3 A. L. R. 1522; Clary v. Commonwealth, 163 Ky. 48, 173 S. W. 171; Thomas v. Commonwealth, 185 Ky. 226, 214 S. W. 929; and Shotwell v. Commonwealth, 65 S. W. 820, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 1649.

The text in 10 R. O. L. 940, in stating one of the exceptions to the general rule, says:

"It [the rule] does not apply where the subject-matter under investigation is of such a nature that it may consist of several stages or continuous acts, all constituting one transgression."

Manifestly it would not be a violation of the rule where the particular acts constituting the alleged independent crime were relevant in establishing a conspiracy where such a charge is made in the indictment.

This court, in the case of Gambrell v. Commonwealth, 130 Ky. 513, 113 S. W. 478, said that—

"A conspiracy is almost necessarily established by the welding into one chain of a number of links, each in itself inconclusive and insufficient to prove the conspiracy, but, when connected and examined as a whole, sufficient to show it."

And furthermore said in substance that all acts and declarations of either of the conspirators before accomplishing the object of the conspiracy and after it was formed were in law, the acts of all of them.

If the purpose of the details of what occurred at the home of Hensley was to establish motive alone, there might be room for the contention that the court should have admonished the jury as to its purposes, but such was by no means the entire purpose of that testimony. It strongly tended toward the establishment of the alleged conspiracy to kill Hugh Baker because of evident enmity existing between him and members of the Poe crowd, which killing would perhaps have occurred that night had it not been for the interference of Mrs. Hensley. No one can read this record and conclude that the mission of Poe and his crowd that night was wholly an innocent one.

An objection to similar testimony was urged in the case of Shotwell v. Commonwealth, supra. But this court, in overruling it, said:

"The declarations and acts of either of the conspirators, in pursuance of the conspiracy, after it was formed and before the end, was in legal contemplation the act of all of them. Each was responsible for what the others did in the prosecution of the design for which they combined. It was competent to show the cause of the ill feeling, the threats, the hostile declarations, the purchase of the cartridges, the whispered conversation at the schoolhouse, the fact that they left it in a body when John Gambrell was seen approaching, and every circumstance and incident that tended to throw light upon their acts in furtherance of the common design. Powers v. Commonwealth, 61 S. W. 735, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 1807, 53 L. R. A. 245; Commonwealth v. Hargis, 99 S. W. 348, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 510."

Under the facts disclosed by this record, we are quite sure that the court did not err in admitting the complained of testimony, were all of the defendants in condition to insist upon it.

[4] From the authorities referred to it will also appear that the testimony was not prejudicial to the rights of the objecting defendant John Forman, although he was not present, since it went to establish a conspiracy through the utterances of coconspirators before the accomplishment of their common purpose. For similar reasons the testimony given as to threats against Hugh Baker made by William Poe a few days before the killing was also relevant.

[5] The foundation for ground (2) urged for a reversal is a qualification given to instruction No. 5 on behalf of each defendant, it being the self-defense instruction, and which qualification says:

"Unless you shall further believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the combat and fight was voluntarily engaged in by both defendant William Poe and those acting with him, if any, and by the deceased, James Baker, and those acting with him, if any, with intention on the part of each to kill the other or to do him great bodily harm, or that the defendant William Poe and those acting with him, if any there was, when they were in no danger, real or to him or them apparent, of death or great bodily harm at the hands of the deceased or those with him, or either of them, began the difficulty by shooting at the deceased or those with him, and thereby so made the danger to himself or those acting with him, if any, excusable on the part of the deceased and those with him, in their necessary or apparently necessary self-defense, then and in either of these events the defendant Poe should not be acquitted on the ground of self-defense or apparent necessity or the defense of another or apparent necessity therefor."

In support of this ground it is insisted (a) that there was no evidence that the fight at the schoolhouse was voluntarily engaged in by the two opposing forces, and (b) that the testimony conclusively showed that defendants did not begin that difficulty, but that, on the contrary, they were upon the merciful mission of clearing up the battlefield on Ayler Lick branch. If the premises assumed by defendants' counsel were true, the correctness of their criticism would necessarily follow. We have before said that they insist that the Bakers had no warrant for their arrest. Evidently there was bad blood existing between the two factions, growing out of their charges and countercharges with reference to illicit distilling, and the testimony is amply sufficient, leaving out entirely the consideration of any warrant for the arrest of the defendants, to authorize the conclusion that each party was on the lookout for the other and that they intended to engage in mutual combat upon meeting. Furthermore, the "merciful mission" theory is not only dispelled by the testimony of the commonwealth's witnesses, but by a number of convincing circumstances appearing in the record. At any rate, the qualification of the self-defense instruction complained of presented the theory of the commonwealth, and which theory its testimony tended to establish, and it was proper that the court should submit it to the jury.

In passing, we might say that it is seldom we find more appropriate instructions in a criminal case than those found in this record. We therefore dismiss this ground as being without merit.

[6] Ground (3) urged by counsel for a reversal is based upon an affidavit of one of them that a juror who sat in the case had stated to him after the jury were discharged that another juror, while considering the case, stated that one could not see the schoolhouse where the fight occurred from the residence of William Poe, thereby contradicting some of defendants' witnesses, who testified to having seen the fight from William Poe's house.

Long before the enactment of section 272 of the Criminal Code, this court, in the case of Johnson v. Davenport, 3 J. J. Marsh. 393, with reference to receiving testimony of jurors for the purpose of impeaching their verdict, said:

"The dangerous tendency of receiving testimony of the jurors, for such a purpose, is too obvious to require comment. It would open a door so wide, and present temptations so strong, for fraud, corruption and perjury, as greatly to impair the value of, if not eventually to destroy, this inestimable form of trial by jury."

Those statements were quoted with approval in the case of Commonwealth v. Skeggs, 3 Bush, 19. See, also, the case of Caldwell v. Spears, 186 Ky. 64, 216 S. W. 83.

The section of the Criminal Code referred to forbids the examination of a juror to establish ground for a new trial, except to show that the verdict was made by lot. Under these authorities, the affidavit of the juror containing the facts alleged to have been stated to counsel would not be sufficient to authorize a new trial, and a fortiori is it insufficient when appearing secondhand and in the form of hearsay testimony through the affidavit of counsel.

From a careful reading of the entire record, we are driven to the conclusion that the defendants had a fair and impartial trial, and that none of their substantial rights were prejudiced.

Wherefore the judgment is affirmed.

JACKSON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 18, 1920.)

Criminal law §369(11)—On trial for arson evidence relative to prior fire held inadmissible.

On prosecution for arson in burning the house of another, evidence of defendant's contradictory statements when questioned as to his whereabouts, when four days before such fire the adjoining house, owned by him and insured, was burned, held inadmissible, as within no exception to the rule against evidence of other crimes.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fayette County.

Garrett Jackson was convicted of arson, denied a new trial, and appeals. Reversed, with directions for new trial.

George Vaughn, of Lexington, for appellant.

Chas. I. Dawson, Atty. Gen., and Thos. B. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

THOMAS, J. The appellant, Garrett Jackson, was indicted, tried and convicted in the Fayette circuit court of the crime of arson and, his motion for a new trial having been overruled, he prosecutes this appeal. The principal error relied on for a reversal is the introduction by the commonwealth, over defendant's objections, of incompetent testimony. Other objections to the verdict consist in improper argument of the commonwealth's attorney, which, however, was chiefly based upon the criticized evidence, and there was also objection by defendant to questions asked some of the witnesses by the commonwealth's attorney concerning the burning of some of defendant's property in years prior to the burning for which he was indicted. But the objection to this testimony was sustained and the witnesses were not permitted to answer.

The house for the burning of which the defendant was indicted was No. 216 Owens street, Lexington, Ky., and was owned by Anna Belle Jackson, the divorced wife of the defendant; she having procured title to it some years before in a litigation for divorce and settlement of property rights between them. Defendant was left the owner of the house adjoining it, being No. 214 Owens street, and some time before the fire, for some reason not explained in the record, he conveyed that house to a woman by the name of Hattie Bean, but she never took possession nor exercised any control over it and defendant continued to reside in it, assessed it for taxation, and paid the taxes thereon. He also carried in his own name fire insurance on that house to the amount of $1,200, as we gather from the evidence. There was another policy on it for $1,000, but it appears that this policy was taken out by some attorneys to whom defendant had executed a mortgage to secure an attorney fee, and he claims that he had no knowledge of this latter policy. It seems that Anna Belle Jackson had something like $2,000 insurance on her house, although the property was listed at a valuation of less than $500. However, there is no testimony to show that her house was overinsured; on the contrary, it is shown, and not disputed, that the restoration of her house (which was not entirely destroyed by the fire) would cost about $2,300. The fire which destroyed the house at 216 Owens street, belonging to Anna Belle Jackson, and for the burning of which the defendant was indicted in this case, occurred about 10:30 a. m., October 29, 1919. In the early part of the night of October 25, 1919, a fire almost completely destroyed the house which defendant claimed, but which he had deeded to Hattie Bean, as we have seen, and the testimony complained of was that given by the deputy fire marshal concerning the first fire of October 25. The substance of that testimony was a conversation between the fire marshal and defendant, which occurred the next day, concerning the whereabouts of the latter at the time of the burning of his house on the evening of October 25. According to the witness, the defendant told an incoherent and contradictory story about taking some unknown colored man to a stock farm located some distance from Lexington. The witness stated that the defendant first said on that occasion that he went only two miles into the country, and later said it was five miles, and still later said that it was nine miles; that he did not know the owner of the stock farm nor the name of the man he carried there, and was confused about the pike upon which the stock farm was situated. Upon objection to this testimony the court said (presumably in the presence of the jury, there appearing in the record nothing to the contrary), "I will instruct the jury that they will consider it for no other purpose except the method or practice of the defendant," to which statement of the court the defendant excepted. We think this testimony was irrelevant for any purpose on the trial under the indictment for burning the house at 216 Owens street, and it was highly prejudicial to the defendant's rights.

The general rule which obtains everywhere is that evidence of crimes other than the one on trial is not admissible except for certain purposes, such as to establish identity, guilty knowledge, criminal intent, or motive for the commission of the crime for which the defendant is being tried, or where the facts in regard to the commission of the other offense and the one on trial are so interwoven, the one with the other, that they cannot be separated, or where the independent offense was perpetrated to conceal the crime for which defendant is being tried, or when a conspiracy is charged in the indictment under which defendant is being tried, and the facts concerning the commission of the independent crime are relevant to show the conspiracy. Wigmore on Evidence, § 300; Jones on Evidence, § 145; Martin v. Commonwealth, 93 Ky. 189, 19 S. W. 580, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 95; Raymond v. Commonwealth, 123 Ky. 368, 96 S. W. 515, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 785; Morse v. Commonwealth, 129 Ky. 294, 111 S. W. 714, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 831, 894; Romes v. Commonwealth, 164 Ky. 334, 175 S. W. 609; Graham v. Commonwealth, 174 Ky. 645, 192 S. W. 683; Clary v. Commonwealth, 163 Ky. 48, 173 S. W. 171; Music v. Commonwealth, 186 Ky. 51, 216 S. W. 116; Tull v. Commonwealth, 187 Ky. 413, 219 S. W. 409; and Morgan et al. v. Commonwealth, 188 Ky. 458, 222 S. W. 940.

The complained of testimony in the instant case was not admissible under any of the exceptions enumerated, or any others which we can recall. It did not tend to establish the identity of the person who burned the house at 216 Owens street or his guilty knowledge, intent, or motive, nor were the facts with reference to the burning of the first house so interwoven with those relating to the second fire as to be admissible under this exception to the general rule, nor could the commission of the crime of burning the first house, if it was incendiary, in any wise conceal the crime of burning the second house. Neither was it admissible to show any general reputation of defendant as an incendiary, if, indeed, such testimony would be admissible under any circumstances, nor would the crime of burning his own house establish a general course of conduct on the part of the defendant, if it were admissible to establish such course of conduct by proof of independent crimes. There was no conspiracy charge in the indictment against defendant; hence the testimony concerning the first fire was not admissible to establish a conspiracy.

The facts in the Raymond Case, supra, are very similar to those of the instant case. The defendant Raymond was indicted and tried for burning a barn belonging to S. L. Vanmeter, which burning occurred on August 6, 1905. A tenant house belonging to Vanmeter was burned on July 10, 1905, 26 days before the burning of the barn. The defendant had been ousted from the premises of Vanmeter by writ of forcible detainer, and he was so angered thereat that he threatened to "get even" with Vanmeter. On his trial under the indictment for burning the barn the court permitted testimony of the fact that the tenant house had been burned 26 days before the barn was burned but after defendant had made his threats. This court, in reversing the judgment of conviction because of the introduction of the fact of the burning of the tenant house, said:

"The issue being tried by the jury was whether or not appellant burned Vanmeter's barn. The fact that a month before, Ruark's house had also been burned had no legal connection with the guilt or innocence of the accused of the offense with which he stood charged. The first was entirely collateral to the latter, and the fact that there was evidence that the accused had threatened to 'get even' with both Ruark and Vanmeter did not so connect the two offenses as to make the production of the evidence of one a necessity in establishing the other. At best, the fact that Ruark's house was burned was only an incident which would tend to establish a suspicion in the minds of the jury that he was also guilty of the offense for which he was being tried. The necessity of confining the evidence adduced to that which tends to establish the issue being tried is too apparent to need elaborate elucidation. The defendant is called upon to defend himself against the charge set forth in the indictment. He cannot intuitively know how to produce evidence to defend himself against a charge which he cannot in advance ascertain will be made against him."

The fact that the two fires in this case were closer together in point of time than were the two in the Raymond Case would make but little, if any, difference as to the admissibility of testimony concerning the first fire. To our minds there were more logical grounds for the admission of the complained of testimony in the Raymond Case which the court rejected than for the admission of the same character of testimony in this case. In that case the defendant had threatened the owner of the destroyed property, while no such facts exist in this case. If defendant burned his house at 214 Owens street and his motive therefor was to collect the insurance, his purpose was accomplished when that fire occurred, and the admitted testimony could serve no purpose but to blacken the reputation of the defendant in the estimation of the jury without elucidating any fact in connection with the burning of the house for which he was being tried.

It was not competent for the commonwealth's attorney to interrogate defendant or other commonwealth's witnesses concerning other fires occurring long prior to the one involved, but, since the court sustained an objection to the questions, we are not prepared to say that the error of the attorney in pro-pounding them would be sufficient to authorize a reversal. Since the remarks of the commonwealth's attorney to which objection was made were based upon the testimony of the fire marshal, which we have discussed and held to be incompetent, it will not be necessary to consider or make other reference to them.

For the error indicated the judgment is reversed, with directions to grant a new trial and for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

EMPIRE COAL CO. et al. v. EMPIRE COAL MINING CO. et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 15, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1097(1)—Decision of Court of Appeals on former appeal conclusive.

Where present appellant was party to former appeal by present appellees, and a party to judgment of Court of Appeals affirming judgment of trial court, it is concluded by such judgment as to matters in issue between it and present appellees, former appellants, which were decided; existing final judgment on merits when matter is within jurisdiction being conclusive of rights of parties and privies in any other action, including matters which might have been litigated.

2. Appeal and error \S 1097(1)—Decision on former appeal conclusive, despite present appellant's prayer for appeal.

Where the present appellant specifically prayed an appeal against present appellee from so much of the judgment as fixed the amount of its recovery, while appellee prayed appeal against right of appellant to recover anything, as well as amount which trial court adjudged, an appeal first decided, decision of Court of Appeals on such first appeal by present appellees is conclusive against the present appellant, and entails dismissal of appellant's appeal.

3. Appeal and error \S 14(4), 595—Plaintiff and defendant may take and perfect appeals on same record.

Where both plaintiff and defendant pray and are granted appeal from the judgment of the circuit court to the Court of Appeals, they may each take and perfect their appeals at the same time and on the same record.

4. Appeal and error \S 338(3)—Cross-appeal must be taken before submission of original appeal.

Under Civ. Code Prac. \S 755, a cross-appeal may be taken by an appellee as a matter of right to have any errors of the trial court prejudicial to him reviewed and corrected, on hearing of the appeal against him, by judgment of the Court of Appeals, but such cross-appeal must be taken by appellee before submission of the original appeal in the Court of Appeals.

5. Appeal and error \S 338(3)—One of two independent appeals must be perfected before submission of other.

While, under Civ. Code Prac. \S 755, cross-appeal which appellee may take must be taken before trial of original appeal in Court of Appeals, a party who has been granted appeal from the circuit court's judgment, when his adversary also has been granted the same right and perfects appeal by filing the record in the Court of Appeals, also must perfect appeal before submission of the case for trial in the Court of Appeals.

6. Appeal and error \S 338(3)—Party aggrieved by judgment must take appeal or cross-appeal.

Plaintiff, complaining of the judgment, could have taken the appeal granted it by the circuit court, or could have prayed a cross-appeal with the same effect, as provided by Civ. Code Prac. \S 755, but could not, without taking appeal or cross-appeal, appear in the Court of Appeals and insist on affirmance of judgment for it, but, after affirmance, undertake an original appeal complaining of the amount of recovery.

Trimble & Bell, of Hopkinsville, for appellants.

John T. Edmunds, of Hopkinsville, Stites & Stites, of Louisville, Thomas N. Greer, of Shelbyville, Tenn., Laffoon & Waddill, of Madisonville, and Guy H. Briggs, of Frankfort, for appellees.

HURT, J. The Empire Coal & Coke Company on the 15th day of March, 1911, executed a lease upon its mines, etc., in Christian county to the appellant Empire Coal Company. The duration of the lease was 10 years from its date. During the year 1916, the Empire Coal & Coke Company sold its mines and mining property to C. N. Bryan, who in turn sold same to J. D. Hutton and G. Bibbs Jacobs, who thereupon organized two corporations called the Empire Coal & Land Company and the Empire Coal Mining Company. Hutton and Jacobs were the owners of all the stock in both of these corporations, except a few shares issued in the names of members of their families. The latter corporation being in possession of the property, under some kind of an arrangement with the Empire Coal & Land Company, and engaged in working the mines and selling coals therefrom, when on February 13, 1917, the Empire Coal Company instituted an action at law against the Empire Coal Mining Company, the Empire Coal & Land Company, J. D. Hutton, G. Bibbs Jacobs, and C. N. Bryan, alleging that the defendants were wrongfully in possession of the property and praying to recover same from them, and damages for its detention. Each of the defendants to this action filed a separate answer, in which were presented certain equitable defenses, which resulted in causing a transfer of the action from the law side of the docket to the equity side of it, and a final judgment in the case by the chancellor. Before the submission of the cause, the Empire Coal Company filed an amended petition, in which it averred as a fact its claim to the possession and use of the property under the lease to it from the Empire Coal & Coke Company, and that the defendants had acquired their rights to the property with full knowledge of the existence of the lease which it held, and prayed in the alternative that either it be granted the relief sought in its petition, or "that, if said relief cannot be granted in full, it be adjudged a lien on said property for whatever amount the court may adjudge to be due it, and all other relief which plaintiff may be shown to be entitled according to the rules of equity," etc. When the cause was submitted for trial and judgment, the court adjudged that the Empire Coal Company recover of C. N. Bryan the sum of $8,000 for the value of its rights under the lease, but of this sum it should recover from the Empire Coal Mining Company and the Empire Coal & Land Company the sum of $4,000, with a lien upon the property to secure the payment of the judgment and an order of sale of the property to satisfy the judgment, but with a judgment over in favor of the two latter companies against Bryan for the amount of the judgment, when it should have been paid by them. The Empire Coal Company was awarded a judgment for its costs against the Empire Coal Mining Company, the Empire Coal & Lumber Company, J. D. Hutton, G. Bibbs Jacobs, and C. N. Bryan. From so much of the judgment as adjudged a recovery of costs, and a lien upon the property for the satisfaction of the judgment of $4,000 and its interest, against the Empire Coal Mining Company and Empire Coal & Land Company, the latter two companies, Hutton, Jacobs, and Bryan prayed and were granted an appeal to this court, and from so much of the judgment as adjudged a recovery of $4,000 with its interest against the Empire Coal Mining Company and Empire Coal & Land Company, they prayed and were granted an appeal to this court. From so much of the judgment as adjudged a recovery in favor of the Empire Coal Company against the Empire Coal Mining Company and the Empire Coal & Land Company of only $4,000 and its interest, and failed to ad-

$12,500, the Empire Coal Company and was granted an appeal to this court. From so much of the judgment as adjudged a recovery of only $8,000, instead of $12,500, and failed to adjudge a recovery in its favor of the further sum of $2,200 against Bryan for the value of certain personal property, the Empire Coal Company prayed and was granted an appeal to this court.

The judgment was rendered on the 7th day of July, 1917, and on the 17th day of December thereafter the Empire Coal Mining Company, the Empire Coal & Land Company, Hutton, and Jacobs perfected their appeal to this court against the Empire Coal Company, and thereafter, on the 28th day of March, 1919, the action was tried upon that appeal in this court, and the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. Empire Coal Mining Co. et al. v. Empire Coal Co., 183 Ky. 699, 210 S. W. 474. After the judgment had been affirmed the Empire Coal Company collected the judgment which it had recovered against the Empire Coal Mining Company and the Empire Coal & Land Company. After the affirmation of the judgment the Empire Coal Company became a bankrupt, and before two years had expired, in fact lacking a day, after the rendition of the original judgment, the Empire Coal Company by its trustee in bankruptcy took this appeal upon the same record as the appeal of the Empire Coal Mining Company and others against it had been taken. The appellees here are the same as the appellants upon the former appeal, and the appellant here was the appellee upon the former appeal. The appellees, by answer in this court, set up several grounds upon which they insist that the present appeal ought to be denied. One of the grounds is that the question to be decided is res judicata, and that the appellant is estopped by the former judgment of this court, rendered upon the appeal of the present appellees, to again litigate the question which the appellants seek to have again considered upon the present appeal. It will be observed that the judgment of the circuit court determined that the appellant had a right of recovery against the appellees because of appellant's rights under the lease, and the amount which appellant was entitled to recover of appellees was adjudged by the circuit court to be the sum of $4,000, and for the satisfaction of such sum awarded appellant a lien upon the property, which lien was directed by the judgment to be enforced. The appellees, upon their appeal from that judgment, among other things, insisted that the judgment against them was erroneous, because the lease was, as they asserted, valueless. The appellant was the sole appellee, and appeared in this court and by briefs of its counsel insisted upon an affirmance of the judgment which was adjudged by this court to be done, and that judgment has long since become final.

[1] The appellant being a party to the former appeal, and a party to the judgment of this court which affirmed the judgment of the circuit court, it is difficult to suggest any reason why it should not be concluded by that judgment, as to matters and things in issue upon the former appeal between it and the appellees and which were decided by this court. It is needless to say that it is a doctrine of universal application to the judgments of all courts that an existing final judgment given upon the merits of the controversy where the matter is one within the jurisdiction of the court is conclusive of the rights of all the parties to that judgment and their privies in any other action upon the same matters in issue. Where a claim or demand has been thus adjudicated, it is a finality, and concludes the parties and their privies, not only as to all matters which were offered to sustain or defeat the claim in controversy, but as to all matters which are admissible for that purpose, and which includes everything which might have been properly litigated in the action, and when one sues another for a sum of money, the sum, which the court adjudges as the amount due, is a final determination upon that issue as long as the judgment remains unreversed. The reasons for the above principles rest upon the necessity and expediency of ending controversies and litigations, so that when a right has been once tried and determined, or opportunity has been once fairly given for the purpose, parties will not be permitted to vex others, as well as courts, with a second trial and adjudication of the same matter of controversy. There does not seem to be any greater reason for the application of these doctrines to trial courts than to those of review, and in the latter a party will not be permitted to split up his cause of action, and to have a trial by piecemeal, or to maintain a second action against the same party for the establishment of the same right in this court than in any other, where opportunity has been given him upon the first appeal to present his entire cause of complaint, and to have an adjudication upon it and an end of it. In Montgomery v. Garr, Scott & Co., 37 S. W. 580, 18 Ky. Law Rep. 607, a party who was an appellee to a former appeal, which was determined by a judgment of this court, and who thereafter took an appeal from the same judgment against the parties, who were appellants upon the former appeal, and about the same matter of controversy, this court held that the party being a party to the former appeal and judgment was concluded by it. This view seems to be the logic of the law and in accordance with the policy of the law of this state, as well as that in every other, and why it should not be so there does not seem to be any sound reason. A party who is before this court with every opportunity afforded him to make complaint of the judgment of the court from which an appeal has been taken, and by taking advantage of the opportunity and rights that he has to have any contention that he may desire to present to this court passed upon and determined, surely thereafter should not be permitted to come and require this court to again try the cause of controversy between him and his adversaries, as in that event there would be no end of litigation, and, when a judgment was rendered by this court, in place of its being a finality, it would be open to be set aside and disturbed at the caprice of any litigant.

[2] The appellant, however, now insists that it has a right to appeal from the judgment of the trial court, because it was granted an appeal by that court, and now desires to appeal from so much of the judgment as fixes the amount which it should recover of the appellees. As heretofore stated, the appellant did specifically pray an appeal against the appellees from so much of the judgment as fixes the amount of the recovery, while the appellees prayed an appeal against the right of appellant to recover anything, as well as the amount which the circuit court adjudged it to be entitled to recover of appellees. It thus now appears that appellant does not desire a readjudication by this court of the liability of the appellees to it, but desires to split the cause of controversy, and to leave the former judgment of this court undisturbed as to its right of recovery against the appellees, but to have the former judgment which was final, set aside to the extent that the amount of the recovery was fixed, and to have a readjudication of that question. It does not require any argument to demonstrate that such a proceeding as that, upon such terms and conditions, would not be permitted in a trial court, and why should it have standing in this court?

[3] It is true that where both the plaintiff and the defendant prays and is granted an appeal from a judgment of the circuit court to this court they may each take and perfect their appeals at the same time and upon the same record. Allen County v. U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 122 Ky. 832, 93 S. W. 44, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 356, Section 755, Civil Code, provides as follows:

"The appellee may obtain a cross-appeal, at any time before trial, by an entry on the records of the Court of Appeals."

[4] Thus a cross-appeal may be taken by an appellee as a matter of right to have any errors of the trial court, prejudicial to him, reviewed and corrected, upon the hearing of the appeal against him, by a judgment of this court. A cross-appeal, however, must be taken by the appellee before the submission of the original appeal for trial in this court, in order that it may be heard by the court at the same time the original appeal is considered and disposed of, and to prevent the necessity of having a trial of the same issue, between the same parties, a second time. Patrick v.

Fletcher, 149 Ky. 730, 149 S. W. 1008; Covington Transfer Co. v. Piel, 9 Ky. Law Rep. 665, 6 S. W. 122; Louisville Tobacco W. H. Co. v. Calvert, 180 Ky. 718, 203 S. W. 567.

[5] While by the provisions of section 755, supra, the cross-appeal which an appellee may take requires it to be taken before the trial of the original appeal, the same reasons for the enactment of such provision, and the same reasons for the judgments of the courts, cited, would require a party, who has prayed and been granted an appeal from a judgment, and his adversary also has been granted the same right, and perfects his appeal by filing the record in this court, to also perfect his appeal before the submission of the action for trial in this court. There could be no question but what present appellees are bound by the former judgment of this court upon the appeal which they took against the appellant as to the matter in issue upon that appeal. As heretofore stated, the matter in issue upon that appeal was the right of the appellant to recover a sum against them and to subject their property for its payment, as well as the amount to which the appellant was entitled to recover. If the present appeal should be entertained, it would be to hold that appellant is not bound by that judgment, although the appellees are, which would be contrary to the general rule that the estoppel by a judgment is mutually binding upon all the parties to it. The appellant was not deprived of an opportunity, by the provisions of the Civil Code or otherwise, of bringing before this court any cause of complaint that it had of the judgment of the trial court with regard to the matter in controversy between it and the appellees, upon the former appeal, before the submission and trial of the cause upon that appeal and adjudication by this court upon the merits of the appeal.

[6] The appellant had two ways open by which it could have had, before the question was adjudicated upon by this court, any complaint which it had of the judgment presented to this court for trial, along with the appeal of the appellees. It could have taken the appeal which was granted it by the lower court, or it could have prayed a cross-appeal with the same effect as provided by section 755, supra, Civil Code. Hence it appears that appellant, alleging a cause of action against the appellees, secures, by the judgment of the chancellor, a recovery against them, but not the amount to which he claims to be entitled. The appellees appealed from that judgment, and the appellant also prayed and was granted an appeal. It, however, did not take its appeal, nor did it take a cross-appeal, but, instead, appeared in this court, and insisted upon the affirmance of the judgment. After the judgment is affirmed, it now undertakes an original appeal from the judgment involving the same matter which was the subject of the decision of this court upon the former appeal. When the judgment of the chancellor was affirmed, it became the judgment of this court, from which no appeal can be taken to itself. If it had been reversed, then there would have been nothing to appeal from. It was the duty of appellant, when appellees took their appeal from the judgment to have before the submission and trial, either, to have effected its appeal from the judgment or to have taken a cross-appeal, and thus had all the questions in controversy, between the parties about the particular matter, disposed of by the one judgment of the court. This course should have been pursued, not because of any statutory provisions, but that this court should not be subject to the trial of the same matter of controversy between the same parties twice, and because when the decree of the chancellor was affirmed it became the judgment of this court, which is final, and not subject to appeal, and because of the common-law principle that when parties have an action pending before a tribunal having jurisdiction of the matter in controversy it is their duty to present to the court all their respective grounds to sustain its action, and to defeat it where the law authorizes them so to do, and when the court has determined the matter, it concludes both parties in another action or proceeding between them concerning the same issues. Caston v. Caston, 54 Miss. 513; Still & Still v. Anderson, 63 Miss. 545; Howell v. Jackson, 86 Ark. 530, 111 S. W. 999; Corning v. Troy Nail Factory, 15 How. 451, 14 L. Ed. 768; Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 355, 4 L. Ed. 97.

The appeal is therefore dismissed.

HOLLAND v. GOODE.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 15, 1920.)

Parent and child \Rightarrow 13(1)—Father not liable for negligence of son driving son-in-law's automobile.

A father was not liable for the negligence of his son driving his son-in-law's automobile on the business of a third person, though with the consent of the father, who was present in the car as the guest of his son and the third person.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Trigg County.

Action by J. B. Goode against S. M. Holland. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Appeal granted, and judgment reversed for new trial.

Smith & King, of Cadiz, for appellant.
Max Hanberry, of Cadiz, for appellee.

SAMPSON, J. Appellee Goode and wife were riding in a buggy drawn by a single horse on the pike leading from Cadiz to Hopkinsville, when they observed an automobile approaching at a rapid speed from the opposite direction. Goode reined his horse to the right of the road and stopped so as to give the car plenty of room to pass. Just as the car passed it struck Goode's vehicle, overturning it and precipitating both Goode and his wife to the ground. The car never stopped. Goode sustained severe injuries to his person for which he instituted this action against Holland to recover damages. A trial resulted in a verdict of $200 for Goode, and Holland has entered a motion in this court for appeal.

His chief complaint is that the trial court erred grievously against him in overruling his motion made both at the conclusion of the evidence of plaintiff in chief, and at the close of all the evidence for a directed verdict in his favor, on the grounds: (1) That no negligence was shown to have been chargeable to Holland; (2) the car which struck Goode's buggy was not the property of Holland nor in his possession or under his direction or control, even though his 19 year old son was driving it and Holland himself was riding in the car.

From the evidence we learn that the car belonged to one Grasty, who is the son-in-law of Holland. Grasty was in the army and had left the car in the custody of the son of appellant, and the son was using it frequently, but not with the consent or dictation of Holland. On the occasion in question, a neighbor named Wall engaged young Holland to drive him to Hopkinsville to do some shopping, and appellant Holland was the guest of his son and Wall on the trip. There is no evidence whatever that Holland owned or controlled the car at the time of the injury. The facts do not bring this case within the recently announced automobile "family doctrine," which makes the parent liable for injury done by a car on a highway when driven by the infant child of the owner on theory that the car is being used by the child with the direction of the parent or with his consent, and for the purpose for which the car was intended when purchased, and therefore the child is the agent of the parent in the operation of the car. 2 R. C. L. 1199; 20 R. C. L. 529; Birch v. Abercrombie, 74 Wash. 486, 133 Pac. 1020, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 59; Stowe v. Morris, 147 Ky. 386, 144 S. W. 52, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 224.

If Grasty had left the car in charge of Holland instead of the son, and Holland had directed his son to use the car on the occasion of the injury to Grasty, if he were injured, the father would have been liable even though the car was driven by the son. The son, according to the evidence, had the custody and control of the car independent of Holland, and, if he were guilty of negligence resulting in injury to Goode, the father was not liable even though the son could be made to respond in damages.

The uncontradicted evidence on the subject of ownership and control of the car made it the duty of the trial court to have sustained the motion of appellant Holland for a directed verdict in his favor. In overruling this motion the court committed reversible error.

Appeal granted, and judgment reversed for new trial not inconsistent with this opinion.

THOMAS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 15, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §593—Refusal of continuance for absence of an attorney not abuse of discretion.

In prosecution for taking and detaining a woman against her will with intent to have carnal knowledge of her, denounced by Ky. St. § 1158, denial of continuance or postponement of trial on account of absence of an attorney of defendant's held not an abuse of discretion; defendant's rights not having been prejudiced.

2. Criminal law §659—Remark of mother of prosecutrix not erroneous as suggesting that she change statement.

In prosecution for taking and detaining a woman against her will with intent to have carnal knowledge of her, denounced by Ky. St. § 1158, where the mother of prosecutrix, while prosecutrix was under cross-examination, remarked that prosecutrix did not understand what was meant by a question, there was no error on any theory that the remark influenced prosecutrix to change her statement.

3. Witnesses §287(1)—Question of prosecutor to prosecutrix not erroneous as causing change in testimony.

In a prosecution for taking and detaining a woman against her will with intent to have carnal knowledge of her, in violation of Ky. St. § 1158, question to prosecutrix by an attorney assisting in the prosecution as to whether she understood a question propounded by defendant's counsel, held not erroneous as having caused her to change her testimony as it was permissible for the witness to make herself understood.

4. Abduction §1—Act must be against will of woman.

The act of taking and detaining a woman against her will with intent to have carnal knowledge of her, denounced by Ky. St. § 1158, must be done against the will of the woman, and such crime may be committed against a lewd woman.

5. Abduction — Proof of previous intimacy between defendant and others and prosecutrix admissible, on claim of consent.

In prosecution for taking and detaining a woman against her will with intent to have carnal knowledge of her in violation of Ky. St. § 1158, it is competent to show previous intimacy between defendant and the woman, or acts on her part of a lewd character with other men, occurring shortly before commission of crime alleged, where issue is whether or not acts constituting crime were against her will.

6. Damages — 206(1) — Court may require plaintiff complaining of injury to undergo physical examination.

Under certain conditions of fact which may exist in actions for personal injuries, the courts on proper showing will require a plaintiff to undergo an examination by competent persons to determine the extent and nature of the injuries complained of.

7. Witnesses — 298½ — Prosecutrix properly not required to submit to examination.

In a prosecution for having taken and detained a woman against her will with intent to have carnal knowledge of her, in violation of Ky. St. § 1158, the trial court did not err in failing to require prosecutrix on defendant's motion to submit to physical examination, though defendant claimed she had been intimate with other men.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ballard County.

Earl Thomas was convicted of unlawfully taking and detaining a woman against her will with intent to have carnal knowledge of her, and appeals. Affirmed.

John M. Moore, of La Center, and Crossland & Crossland, of Paducah, for appellant.

Chas. I. Dawson, Atty. Gen., Thos. B. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., and W. P. Hughes, of Frankfort, for the Commonwealth.

HURT, J. The appellant, Earl Thomas, was tried and found guilty of the crime of unlawfully taking and detaining a woman against her will with the intent to have carnal knowledge of her himself, which is denounced in section 1158, Ky. Stats. The sentence imposed upon him was two years' confinement in the penitentiary. There is no contention that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict of the jury, or that the pleadings are not sufficient to support the judgment. A reversal of the judgment is sought because of alleged errors of the court in denying a continuance or postponement of the trial, errors made during the trial, and in overruling the motion for a new trial.

[1] (a) It is claimed that the court abused its discretion to the prejudice of the accused in denying him a continuance or the postponement of the trial until another and later day in the term. The ground upon which the continuance or postponement was sought was the absence of one of the attorneys for the accused upon the day the action was set for and called for trial, and, if a postponement had been granted until a later day in the term, it would have enabled the attorney to have been present and participate in the trial and assisted in the conduct of the defense of the accused. The facts upon which the continuance or postponement was asked were as follows: The accused employed an attorney for his defense, who was made acquainted with all the facts of the case, and several days before the beginning of the term at which the trial took place, accompanied by his attorney, the accused sought to employ a partnership, consisting of two attorneys, and who resided in an adjoining county, to render him further assistance. The attorney because of whose absence the continuance or postponement was asked, when he was informed of the day upon which the action was set for trial, informed the accused and his attorney accompanying him that he could not be present in the Ballard circuit court upon that day, because of a previous employment in an action which would be upon trial in a court in another county upon that day, and that he could not undertake the employment unless a postponement of the trial could be had until a later day. It was the opinion of the attorney accompanying the accused that the postponement could be secured, and upon that condition the other attorneys accepted the employment. No arrangements were sought or made for a postponement of the trial until the action was called for trial, and the attorney for the commonwealth had answered that he was ready to proceed with the trial, when the absence of the attorney was set out in the affidavit, and the cause of his absence was stated to be that he was then engaged in a trial in the McCracken circuit court, but, if the trial of this cause was postponed for another day, that he could be present and would be. The attorney whom the accused first employed was present, and also one of the attorneys of the partnership whom he had employed as above stated. No reason of any kind is suggested in the affidavit as to why the two attorneys who were present could not fully and adequately conduct the defense of the accused, nor any peculiar fact, circumstance, or reason why the presence of the absent attorney was necessary in order to secure for the accused a fair and impartial trial and the full protection of the laws and the benefit of any fact that would tend to support the defense. It thus appears that there was no element of surprise in the failure of the attorney to be present when the case was called for trial. The accused was not expecting the presence of the attorney at that time, nor was the attorney intending to be present at that time, nor was the accused or his counsel surprised by the calling of the action for trial.

It has been held that the absence of one or more of the attorneys for a defendant is not a ground for a continuance of the cause, and for the same reason not a valid cause for a postponement, unless it is made to appear that the defendant cannot have a fair trial without the presence of such attorney. Tolliver v. Commonwealth, 165 Ky. 312, 176 S. W. 1190; Brown v. Commonwealth, 7 Ky. Law Rep. 451; Stephens v. Commonwealth, 6 S. W. 456, 9 Ky. Law Rep. 742; Cook v. Commonwealth, 114 Ky. 586, 71 S. W. 522, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1409; Mullins v. Commonwealth, 172 Ky. 92, 188 S. W. 1079; Rose v. Com., 181 Ky. 337, 205 S. W. 326; Howerton v. Com., 129 Ky. 482, 112 S. W. 606, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 1008. The cases of Bates v. Com., 16 S. W. 523, 13 Ky. Law Rep. 135, Leslie v. Com., 42 S. W. 1095, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1203, Cornellous v. Com., 64 S. W. 412, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 771, Wilson v. Com., 134 Ky. 670, 121 S. W. 614, and McDaniel v. Com., 181 Ky. 766, 205 S. W. 918, do not support a contrary doctrine. In those cases, wherein it was held that the failure to continue or postpone the trial of the accused on account of the absence of the counsel was prejudicial to the accused, the absence of the counsel resulted in a surprise upon the accused, or in a state of case wherein he was unable for want of time or other reason to secure other counsel, or on account of the nature of the facts, the unavoidable absence of a particular person as counsel, the accused was prevented from having a fair and full presentation of his defense. The facts in the instant case were few and easily understood. The two attorneys who represented the defendant upon the trial seem to have been perfectly conversant with all of them, and from an examination of the record it does not appear that anything could have properly been done in the defense of the accused which was not done. The court must have known from experience that, if the absent attorney on the day the action was called for trial was then engaged in the trial of one accused of murder in the court of another county, it was wholly problematical when the vicissitudes of that case which he was engaged in trying would permit him to be absent from that court so as to give attention to the defendant's defense in this action. The reason suggested as to why the denial of a postponement of the trial was prejudicial, to the effect that the absent attorney, if present, would probably have advised the accused to have refrained from offering in evidence in his defense the proof of certain things which the accused stated were facts, and the admission of which, it is argued, had the effect of creating a prejudice against him in the minds of the jurymen, does not seem to be meritorious, as that would be to strangely conclude that the rights of the accused were prejudiced by permitting him to put into the evidence the proof of things which he contends were the true facts of the case. The granting of continuances and postponements of trials are matters within the sound discretion of the trial court, and must necessarily be, as the postponement of a trial affects the arrangement and conduct of a court, and, if the court does not abuse its discretion, a ruling of it upon such subjects will not be disturbed. The record does not demonstrate that the rights of the accused were in any wise prejudiced by the refusal to grant a continuance or postponement of the trial.

[2] (b) The appellant insists that the court erred to his prejudice in permitting the mother of the young woman whom the defendant is alleged to have unlawfully detained to remark to the attorney for defendant, while the young woman was undergoing cross-examination as a witness, that the witness did not understand what he meant by a question which he propounded to her, and that the remark suggested to the witness to change her statement, and that she did so, upon a question material to the defense. The court, of course, could not prevent the remark by the mother of the witness, and the record does not show that it was even heard by the judge. No objection was made to the remark, nor was the court's attention called to it, nor was there any request to the court to take any action in reference to it. A reading of all the testimony of the witness leads to the conclusion that the remark of the mother to the attorney had no influence upon the testimony of the witness, and was as harmless to the accused as his attorneys seemed to treat it at the time.

[3] It is also complained that an attorney who was assisting in the prosecution by a question which he propounded to the prosecutrix caused her to make a change in her testimony. This was a question addressed to her to know if she understood a question asked her by the attorney for the accused, and stating the question. No change, however, was made in her testimony because of the latter question, because the attorney for defendant had not permitted her to answer the question asked by him, except in part, having propounded another when she had only partially answered the question, and stopped her from making a complete answer. No impropriety could arise from permitting the witness to make herself understood, in reference to the question asked her by the attorney for defendant, and to prevent the leaving of the examination in such a condition that the jury might misunderstand the testimony. The question asked by the attorney for the commonwealth which is complained of did not indicate the answer desired.

[4, 5] (c) In defense of the charge against him the defendant deposed that on three different occasions previous to the one upon which it is claimed that he committed the crime for which he was convicted the prosecutrix had voluntarily submitted to having sexual intercourse with him, and that she had informed him that as the results of the intercourse she had become enceinte, and at her solicitation he had secured and administered to her a drug for the purpose of producing an abortion. The acts constituting the crime denounced by section 1158, supra, must, of course, be done against the will of the woman, and such a crime may be committed against a lewd woman, as well as a chaste one, but it is competent upon the trial of one accused of the crime to show previous sexual intimacy between himself and the woman, or acts on the part of the prosecutrix of a lewd and lascivious character with other men, occurring shortly before the commission of the crime alleged, where the issue is whether or not the acts constituting the crime were done against the will of the woman, and were or were not done by the accused with her consent, in corroboration of the claim that the acts were done with her consent. Brown v. Com., 102 Ky. 227, 43 S. W. 214, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1174; Stewart v. Com., 141 Ky. 522, 133 S. W. 202; Gravitt v. Com., 184 Ky. 436, 212 S. W. 430.

Before the trial was entered upon, the appellant moved the court to cause a physical examination of the young woman to be made by a competent physician to determine whether she had ever been guilty of a fornication, and during her cross-examination as a witness, in reply to questions propounded by the attorneys for the appellant, she testified that she had never had sexual intercourse with the accused nor any other person, and in answer to a further inquiry by the same attorneys she declared her willingness to submit to a physical examination to determine the truth of her statements. At this point the appellant renewed his motion. Both motions were, however, overruled, and of this the appellant complains. At the time the motions were made there had been no charge by affidavit, evidence, or otherwise to indicate to the court that any accusation of unchastity could be brought against her, or that the demonstration of whether or not she had been theretofore chaste or unchaste would shed any light upon the issues of the trial. Under such a state of case, it is apparent that a court would be without authority to assume and exercise a power to unnecessarily invade the privacy and offend the instincts of modesty of a young woman who is a mere witness in an action, and to humiliate her by directing a physical examination of her person, against her consent, upon the mere request of one whom she accuses of having made an unjustifiable assault upon her. It is apparent that, if she is willing to submit to such an examination, the authority of the court is not necessary to effect it. Afterward, when the accused testified, he gave evidence of the improper intimacy of the prosecutrix with him, as before stated, and this was the first time anything was brought to the attention of the court upon which it could in any event have acted in directing a physical examination of the prosecutrix. The motion was not thereafter renewed. The foregoing is sufficient to show that the contention of appellant that it was the duty of the court to order such an examination made with the consent of the young woman or to require her to submit to such an examination, if against her consent, for his benefit, is not meritorious. A number of authorities are, however, cited by appellant in support of his contention that it was the duty of the court to order and require such an examination in cases of this character, but none of the authorities cited have any relation to such a state of case.

[6, 7] It is true that it is a well-established principle which applies to civil actions for damages for personal injuries that under certain states of case which may exist in such action the courts will, upon a proper showing, require a plaintiff to undergo an examination by competent persons to determine the extent and nature of the injuries complained of, as held in Browder v. Commonwealth, 136 Ky. 45, 123 S. W. 328, Belt Electric Line Co. v. Allen, 102 Ky. 551, 44 S. W. 89, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1656, 80 Am. St. Rep. 374, and L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Simpson, 111 Ky. 754, 64 S. W. 733, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 1044. The authority of these cases is conceded, and it is said that in actions for divorce upon the ground of permanent impotency and such malformation as prevents sexual intercourse, on account of the necessity of the case, the courts have exercised the right of acquiring a party to the suit to submit to a physical examination. All such cases, however, are civil actions, wherein parties are invoking the aid of the courts to sustain them in their civil rights. In an action similar to the instant one the alleged wronged female is a mere witness. She is seeking no relief, and the commonwealth is conducting a prosecution for the good of social order and society. Our attention has not been called to any case wherein the court has exercised the authority to require or even have conducted, through its agencies, a physical examination and inspection of the persons of the women in cases of criminal prosecution for unlawful detention of them against their wills with the intention to have carnal knowledge of them, and kindred crimes. It has never been resorted to in practice in this jurisdiction, which is a convincing authority that the right does not exist. In the states of Texas and Arkansas to falsely charge a female with having been guilty of fornication is by statute a penal offense and for which one may be punished by fine and imprisonment, but the courts of those states have refused, upon motion of a defendant, to require a prosecutrix to submit to an inspection and examination of her person to determine whether she had been guilty of fornication, unless she consents to the inspection. Bowers v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. R. 185, 75 S. W. 299; Whitehead v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 89, 45 S. W. 10; McArthur v. State, 59 Ark. 436, 27 S. W. 628. In McGuff v. State, 88 Ala. 147, 7 South. 35, 16 Am. St. Rep. 25, the court expressed doubt that such a right existed, and refused to order a reversal of a conviction where the trial court had denied the request of one tried upon a charge of attempted rape to require a physical examination of the prosecutrix, holding that in any event it was a matter within the discretion of the trial court, and not reviewable. The exercise of such a right would lead to the greatest abuses, and would probably amount to a safe guaranty of an escape from punishment in many instances, in that modest women would oftentimes doubtless prefer to bear with the wrong visited upon them than to expose themselves to the humiliation of a physical examination. The evidence obtainable by a physical examination and inspection of the person of the prosecutrix would not prove an undue intimacy with the defendant, though it might prove such with another, and, in any event such evidence could only be corroborative of that of the defendant when his defense is that the acts constituting the detention were done with the consent of the prosecutrix, but, where a denial of the acts constituting the detention is made, and no question arises as to the consent of the prosecutrix to such acts, it is impossible to see how evidence obtained by a physical examination of the prosecutrix could shed any light upon the truth of the issues. Hence the court did not err in declining to order or require the physical examination of the witness.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

WYNN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 18, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §854(9)—Jurors may be taken to places of amusement, and one may temporarily withdraw.

A jury in a criminal case, in charge of the sheriff, may properly be taken to places of amusement, to restaurants, and the like, and the temporary withdrawal of a juror from the immediate presence of his fellow jurors or the sheriff will not constitute such separation as will affect the verdict, where he remains in plain view of the sheriff and the remaining jurors.

2. Criminal law §698(1)—Objection waived by not calling to attention of court.

Where on cross-examination of a witness for the prosecution an objection was interposed to a question and the court made no ruling thereon, the notation being "Passed for the present," the defendant waived any objection he might have had where the matter was not brought again to the attention of the court.

3. Witnesses §274(1)—Question as to general reputation too broad.

A question on cross-examination, "Do you know the general reputation of Mr. F., the man who was killed?" was too broad, and the court did not err in sustaining objection thereto.

4. Witnesses §337(2)—Reputation of accused for morality, truth, and veracity may be inquired into where he testifies.

Generally speaking, where an accused testifies in his own behalf, his reputation for morality, truth, and veracity may be brought in question.

5. Criminal law §1170½(5)—Sustaining objection to questions on cross-examination of character witness harmless.

Accused in a homicide case cannot complain of a ruling sustaining an objection to a question on cross-examination as to the reputation of decedent, where from succeeding questions and answers it is manifest accused received the full benefit of any knowledge or information the witness had as to the decedent's reputation.

6. Criminal law §1170½(3) — No error where court sustains objections to incompetent questions.

Accused was not entitled to a reversal by reason of the prosecuting attorney having asked incompetent questions, where the court promptly sustained objections thereto and the questions were not answered; accused not requesting the court to do more.

7. Witnesses §242—Question as to statements of third persons to refresh recollection of character witness improper.

In a homicide case, the court erred in overruling an objection to the question asked a witness for the prosecution: "Take Mr. W. (the defendant). You testify that his character was bad. To refresh your recollection, I will ask you if you have ever heard it said that Mr. W. was charged with robbery and sent to the penitentiary?"

8. Criminal law §1186(4)—No reversal except for prejudicial error.

Under Cr. Code Prac. § 840, a conviction will not be reversed for error, where upon consideration of the whole case the court is satisfied that the substantial rights of the defendant were not prejudiced thereby.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Henderson County.

Jim Wynn was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Cass L. Walker, of Providence, and W. P. McClain and F. J. Pentecost, both of Henderson, for appellant.

N. Powell Taylor, and Marvin D. Eblen, both of Henderson, and Chas. I. Dawson, Atty. Gen., and T. B. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

QUIN, J. Appellant was indicted for the crime of murder of W. H. Fox, committed June 13, 1918, upon trial was found guilty of voluntary manslaughter, was sentenced to a term of 21 years in the penitentiary, and to reverse that judgment has prosecuted this appeal. The evidence in the case being sufficient to sustain the verdict, it will be unnecessary to enter into a discussion of the events leading up to the crime for which appellant was indicted. We will address ourselves to the points raised by counsel in the brief, but in the inverse order of their presentment.

1. Alleged misconduct of the jury on the night of the first day of the trial. With the usual admonition the sheriff was placed in charge of the jury. He took the 12 men to witness a special attraction at the skating rink in Henderson. A space 60x180 feet had been set aside for the skaters; around the four sides, behind a railing, several rows of benches had been placed for spectators. The musicians were stationed near the center of the rink. The sheriff and members of the jury sat on benches. Harry High, one of the jurors, was a pianist and cornetist; upon request made to him and to the sheriff he was permitted to assist the musicians; he was seated within thirty feet of the place where the sheriff was sitting.

[1] In support of the motion for a new trial, and as grounds for reversal, it is said that at times during the performance people congregated around High and the piano, and in such numbers as to obstruct the view of the sheriff, thus affording designing persons opportunity to communicate with High, but the affidavits filed in support of the motion do not show that any communications affecting or pertaining to the trial were made. On the contrary, the affidavits of the sheriff, High, the remaining 11 jurors, and other persons state that during the whole evening High was in plain view of the sheriff, and that the opportunity to communicate with either High or the other jurors was at no time given, and High himself says that he did not speak to any one about the case, nor was it discussed in his presence at any time that evening. It is well recognized that a jury in a criminal case, in charge of the sheriff, may properly be taken to places of amusement, to restaurants, and the like, and that the temporary withdrawal of a juror from the immediate presence of his fellow jurors or the sheriff will not constitute such separation as will affect the verdict where, as in the present instance, the juror of whom complaint is made was during the whole evening within plain view of the sheriff and the remaining jurors, and at a distance of not exceeding 30 or 40 feet.

We have had occasion to write upon this subject in numerous cases. The opinion nearest in point to the facts of this appeal is probably that of Johnson v. Commonwealth, 179 Ky. 40, 200 S. W. 35. In this case it was charged that the sheriff permitted one of the jurors to converse with a person other than a member of the jury, and two or more of the jury were permitted to enter a drug store and thereby separate themselves from the remaining members. It was not charged that anything improper was said or done by any of the jurors or persons, but there, as here, it was contended that the acts were in violation of the Criminal Code and the decisions of this court holding that although the case was not discussed between the jurors and other persons, and no juror did anything culpable, yet their conduct was improper because an opportunity was presented for the jury to discuss the case with strangers or others if they had been so minded. Affidavits of the sheriff and others were filed showing that the jurors whose conduct was complained of were in the presence of and within view of the sheriff and the other jurors; that the conversation referred to related to a matter having no connection with the case referred to; and the sheriff said the two jurors who went to the drug store were in plain view all the time. The court held it satisfactorily appeared the jurors were kept together, nothing happened that could have prejudiced the appellant, and no opportunity was given for any wrong.

In French v. Commonwealth, 100 Ky. 63, 37 S. W. 269, 18 Ky. Law Rep. 574, relied upon by appellant, the facts were similar to Campbell v. Commonwealth, 162 Ky. 106, 172 S. W. 110, distinguished in the Johnson Case, supra. In the French Case a juror was permitted to go to his place of business some blocks away, and therefore was separated from the remaining jurors and the sheriff—facts entirely dissimilar to those found in the present record.

In the recent case of Shackelford, etc., v. Commonwealth, 185 Ky. 51, 214 S. W. 788, we had occasion to deal with this same question, and in the opinion will be found many cases from this court on the subject. We there held that the facts were not sufficient to justify or warrant a reversal. The mere opportunity to converse with a juror, nothing else appearing, is not sufficient to secure a new trial. It is better, however, to avoid the appearance of wrongdoing. This can best be done in those cases where the jury must be kept together by not allowing any separation of the jurors for any purpose during the trial when possible to do so.

2. The admission and rejection of evidence.

[2] (a) In the cross-examination by appellant's counsel of the witness Reynolds the following question was asked:

"I will ask you this: If after Devers was arrested Mr. W. J. Nisbet came up there and made an affidavit, Mr. Forsythe I believe it was made an affidavit, and claimed that whisky, and you delivered that whisky to him?"

An objection was interposed to this question, but there was no ruling of the court thereon; the notation being "Passed for the present." No further reference is made to the question or to the objection. There is nothing to show how the court ruled thereon. While the question was not answered, it does not appear it was ever brought again to the attention of the court. Thus appellant waived any objection he might otherwise have had in this regard.

(b) Objection is next made to certain other questions propounded the witness Reynolds. As to the first of these an objection by the commonwealth was sustained, but appellant made no avowal. As to the second there was an avowal following the ruling of the court sustaining an objection to the question. The question, however, pertained to a collateral matter and one not directly involved upon the trial, nor did the court's ruling constitute prejudicial or reversible error. The question had reference to the purchase of whisky from appellant.

(c) Two other questions addressed to the witness Reynolds were objected to. Those pertained to the trial of appellant on a charge of bootlegging. There had been previous testimony introduced on this question, which was one of the events that took place prior to the commission of the crime. It is urged the questions were unfair and tended to prejudice the minds of the jury. While their pertinency is not apparent, we do not think the questions or answers thereto were prejudicial.

[3-5] (d) After appellant had concluded his case the commonwealth introduced testimony to prove that appellant's reputation for truth and veracity, as well as his moral character, was bad. One of these witnesses, T. J. Montgomery, on cross-examination was asked this question: "Do you know the general reputation of Mr. Fox, the man who was killed?" An objection to this question was sustained. This is urged as error. The question was not in proper form, as will readily be seen. A man may acquire a reputation for many things. Generally speaking, where the accused testifies in his own behalf his reputation for morality, truth, and veracity may be brought in question; but here the inquiry was too broad. It should have been more limited or restricted. In McLain v. Commonwealth, 171 Ky. 373, 188 S. W. 377, it was held competent to prove by those intimate with decedent that he was a man of overbearing disposition, quarrelsome, inclined to bring on difficulties and trouble; the plea was self-defense, and it was doubtful, under the evidence, as to who was the aggressor. If this was the idea sought to be covered by the question, it was embraced in the next succeeding question propounded the same witness, which was answered without objection. Similar objection was made to a question of like nature addressed to Dr. Williams. The witness was asked if he thought he knew the general reputation, etc., of deceased. From the succeeding questions and answers given without objection, it is manifest accused received the full benefit of any knowledge or information witness had as to Fox's reputation. However, no avowal was made as to any of the questions to which an objection was sustained.

[6] (e) The conduct of the county attorney in asking three certain incompetent questions is complained of. In each instance the court promptly sustained the objection. The questions were not answered. They were improper and should have no place in the record; but in acting upon the objections the court did everything requested by appellant's counsel.

[7] (f) It is said the court erred in overruling the objection to the following question asked a witness for the prosecution:

"Take Mr. Wynn. You testify that his character was bad. To refresh your recollection, I will ask you if you have ever heard it said that Mr. Wynn was charged with robbery and sent to the penitentiary?"

This question was improper, and due regard to the rules of evidence and practice should have so told the representative of the commonwealth. The answer was: "I have heard it; yes, sir." There had been some previous evidence in this connection, but not of such a nature as to make the question competent or proper.

[8] By provisions of section 340 of the Criminal Code a judgment of conviction shall be reversed for any error of law appearing in the record, when upon consideration of the whole case the court is satisfied that the substantial rights of the defendant have been prejudiced thereby. The record before us discloses certain errors, such, for instance, as the question next above referred to; but upon an examination of the entire record we are satisfied the court committed no error prejudicial to the substantial rights of accused.

Having reached this conclusion, it follows that the judgment appealed from must be and is affirmed.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE et al. v. J. ZINMEISTER & SONS.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 18, 1920.)

Taxation ¶237—Firm preparing green coffee a "manufacturer" within tax exemption statute.

A firm importing green coffee and putting it through the numerous processes necessary to make it fit for consumption is a "manufacturer" within Ky. St. Supp. 1918, § 4019a10, exempting from taxation, except by the state, machinery and products in course of manufacture of firms actually engaged in manufacturing, and their raw material actually on hand.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Manufacturer.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

Suit by J. Zinmeister & Sons against the City of Louisville and others. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. T. Baskett and Joe S. Lawton, both of Louisville, for appellants.

E. C. Underwood, of Louisville, for appellees.

SAMPSON, J. One of the lines of business of J. Zinmeister & Sons, of Louisville, consists in the importation of green coffee which it prepares by putting it through several different processes, for use by the consumer. This company insists that it is a manufacturer of coffee products, and consequently is entitled to exemption from taxation for city purposes under section 4019a10, Kentucky Statutes, on all machinery and products in course of manufacture and "raw material actually on hand" at its plant for the purpose of manufacture.

The city of Louisville and its assessor, Baldauf, and tax receiver, Watts, assert the coffee machinery as well as the raw material or green coffee imported by appellee, to be prepared for consumption, are subject to the city tax, and were threatening to coerce Zinmeister & Sons to pay the taxes when that firm, in January last, instituted this action against the city of Louisville, its assessor and tax receiver, to obtain an injunction restraining the city, and its said officials from listing its said coffee machinery and raw material for taxation purposes in the city and from collecting or attempting to collect or levy any tax bill on said coffee machinery or raw material.

The petition avers that Zinmeister & Sons were on the 1st of September 1918, engaged in the actual manufacture of coffee products at its plant in Louisville, Ky.; that the plaintiff imports large quantities of green coffee which in its natural state is absolutely unfit for use for any purpose whatsoever; that said coffee so imported is manufactured by it into an article of commerce and an article of food or drink by and through certain processes employed by appellee which it recites as follows:

"The plaintiff first runs the green coffee through a separating machine which classifies or separates the coffee beans according to size, the larger beans being marketed at a higher level than the smaller beans.

"That, after the separation process above referred to is completed, it is necessary to thoroughly cleanse all coffee, thereby removing trash, pebbles, bag strings, and other foreign substances which through the carelessness of the planters are scooped up along with the coffee from the ground when being sacked; that to accomplish this cleansing process the plaintiff runs the coffee through a machine known as a milling machine.

"That after said coffee has been separated or classified as aforesaid, and after same has been cleansed by running through the milling machine, the plaintiff then carries said coffee, by means of automatic conveyers, to the roasting machines; that these machines are large, expensive, and scientifically constructed machines for roasting coffee, which consist in part of revolving perforated cylinders containing contrivances which automatically turn and shift about the coffee therein contained, thereby enabling said coffee to be completely and uniformly roasted; that said cylinder must be operated by highly experienced employees in order to secure the even roasting of said coffee and in order that said coffee may be roasted to the proper extent, neither more nor less.

"That, after said coffee is roasted, same leaves the cylinders at a tremendously high temperature, and it is necessary that the temperature of said coffee be immediately reduced in order to prevent said coffee from burning or from continuing to roast after the proper degree of roasting has been attained; that to accomplish this purpose the plaintiff places said coffee in specially constructed contrivances for reducing the temperature of said coffee by means of passing currents of cold air through said coffee.

"That after said coffee has passed through the cleansing process it is necessary to and the plaintiff does put said coffee through a further cleansing process, for which purpose the plaintiff uses specially constructed machinery which eliminates from the coffee all foreign substances whatever.

"That after the said process last mentioned is completed the plaintiff runs said coffee through a finished machine which polishes the coffee beans and thereby greatly improves its appearance and marketability.

"That after the polishing of the coffee bean as aforesaid the plaintiff places said coffee in certain scientifically constructed machines known as 'steel-cutting mills'; that by means of said mills the coffee bean is not ground or crushed, as was formerly the case in the handling of coffee, but, on the contrary, the said coffee beans are actually cut into small particles of uniform size; that in the old-fashioned grinding of coffee there was a considerable waste, in that it was difficult to obtain a uniform size of the ground coffee; that to be properly handled in the boiler the coffee should be neither too fine nor too coarse.

"That in the said process of steel-cutting said coffee, by a specially constructed apparatus used in connection with said steel-cutting machine, the inside chaff or 'feather' of the coffee bean, together with any particles of dust or other deleterious substance that may be concealed in the crevice of said coffee beans, are entirely removed from said coffee beans; that the said chaff or feather is a deleterious substance, and its removal improves both the quality and appearance of the finished product.

"That, after leaving said steel-cutting mills, said coffee is packed by the plaintiff in specially prepared containers, the purpose of which is to prevent said coffee losing its strength and aroma; that a large part of the packing of said coffee is done by machinery."

Section 4019a10, Kentucky Statutes, provides in part as follows:

"All property subject to taxation for state purposes * * * shall be subject also to taxation in the county, city, school or other taxing district in which same has a taxable situs, except the following classes of property which shall be subject to taxation for state purposes only: * * *

"(2) Machinery and products in course of manufacture of persons, firms or corporations actually engaged in manufacturing and their raw material actually on hand at their plants for the purpose of manufacture."

If Zinmeister & Sons are engaged in the manufacture of coffee products within the meaning of the statute just quoted, then it is exempt from the tax which is sought to be enjoined, but, if the process through which it puts the green coffee which it imports from South America does not amount to or come within the term "manufacture," then it is liable to the tax, and the injunction must be dissolved.

The petition was amended, and to it as amended defendant, city of Louisville and others, filed demurrer, which the court, after careful consideration, overruled, and delivered an opinion sustaining the petition. The defendants then declined to plead further, and elected to stand upon their demurrer, whereupon the court entered a judgment granting the injunction against the city of Louisville and its said officials, restraining them and each of them from making out or certifying the tax bill and from collecting any taxes for city purposes for the year 1919 on any green coffee then in stock and all coffee machinery used by the plaintiff in the manufacture of its coffee products. From this judgment the city and its said officials appeal.

It is the contention of the city that Zin-meister & Sons are not engaged in the manufacture of coffee, and it asserts that coffee grows and is not manufactured, that you cannot make or manufacture coffee, but can only grow it, and therefore the appellee company is not engaged in the manufacture of coffee or coffee products, but only in putting the original product through certain processes for its refinement and improvement.

On the other hand, Zinmeister & Sons contend that it is manufacturing coffee in the sense that the term "manufacture" is employed in the tax exemption statutes, in that it takes a raw material, which is then absolutely unfit for use, and converts it into a finished article of commerce. It does this work at its factory in Louisville, employing a large force of helpers and using extensive and scientific machinery. The processes which appellee uses cannot be performed at all by a small grocery or householder. These processes can be accomplished only by "specially constructed scientific machinery and by skilled manipulation."

In the recent case of Lorillard Co. v. Ross, Sheriff, 183 Ky. 217, 209 S. W. 39, we held that the word "manufacture," in the sense in which it is employed in the statute quoted above, does not import the means or methods employed, or the nature or number of processes resorted to, or the size of the factory or the number of hands it employs, or the volume of machinery in use, but the result accomplished, whether the article is manufactured or not. That was a tobacco case, and the Lorillard Company purchased large quantities of raw tobacco and gathered it in its warehouse or place of business in the city of Louisville for the purpose of regrading, stemming, and redrying it. This plant is equipped with engines and other machinery and appliances used to stem and redry the tobacco. It was the contention of the Lorillard Company that it was manufacturing tobacco, but the facts of that case clearly showed that the Lorillard Company only gathered raw tobacco at its warehouse in Louisville for the purpose of regrading, stemming, and redrying it before forwarding it to other factories where the tobacco was worked into a finished product ready for market and consumption by the public. We held that the tobacco and machinery in the warehouse were not at the plant for the purpose of manufacture in the sense in which the term "manufacture" is used in the statutes under discussion, and that the Lorillard Company was liable for the tax. That was on the idea that only a part of the work necessary to turn out a finished product ready for market and consumption was taken by the Lorillard Company at its place in Louisville, its main manufacturing establishment being located somewhere in the East, to which this tobacco was carried after the few preliminary steps were taken at the Louisville house. The Eastern manufacturing establishment of the Lorillard Company made the tobacco into plugs, twists, cigars, etc., but no such product was turned out by the Louisville house. We therefore held that, as the Louisville plant did not produce a finished product ready for consumption or for sale to the public in general, it was not a manufacturing plant within the terms of the statute exempting such plant from city taxation. The Lorillard Company Case followed the principles announced in the American Tobacco Co. v. City of Bowling Green, 181 Ky. 416, 205 S. W. 570.

The case at bar is very similar to the tobacco cases, except that Zinmeister & Sons imported the raw material and perfected it for sale in the open market and consumption by the public. It takes the raw coffee in its natural state, wholly unfit for consumption by the human family, and so cleanses, purifies, dries, roasts, and reduces it as to make it an article of food and drink, suited to the marts of trade.

If a concern which buys tobacco, cleanses, regrades, and otherwise prepares it so as to make it an article of commerce, is a manufacturer, we can see no reason why a concern which imports green coffee and puts it through the several processes necessary to make it fit for human consumption is not also a manufacturer and the output the result of "manufacture" within the meaning of the statutes exempting manufacturers from taxation for city purposes.

We have held that a sawmill which converts logs into lumber is a manufacturing establishment (Bogart v. Tyler, Adm'r, 119 Ky. 637, 55 S. W. 709, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 1452), and that a flouring mill is a manufacturing establishment (Hall & Son v. Guthrie, 103 S. W. 721, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 801).

Whether a refining process applied to a given article is "manufacture" within the meaning of the Statutes (section 4019a10) depends upon the particular facts of the case. Courts have experienced much difficulty in determining what is a manufacturing establishment and what is included in the term "manufacture." There is no hard and fast rule by which to determine whether a given establishment is a "manufacture," but all the facts and circumstances must be taken into consideration in determining whether the establishment is or is not to be so reckoned. Whether it is such an establishment does not depend upon the size of the plant, the number of men employed, the nature of the business, or the article to be manufactured, but upon all these together and upon the result accomplished.

If raw material is converted at a factory or plant into a finished product, complete and ready for the final use for which it is intended, or so completed as that in the ordinary course of business of the concern it is ready to be put upon the open market for sale to any person wishing to buy it, the plant which turns it out is a manufacturing establishment within the meaning of the Statutes, and we think the trial court correctly held the petition of appellee good and awarded the injunction prayed. Wherefore, the judgment is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

2. Corporations ⇐99(2)—Insurance ⇐33—Stock subscriber's note secured by first mortgage is "property actually received."

Note of a subscriber to corporate stock in an insurance company, secured by valid first mortgage on real estate to which the subscriber has title, accepted by the corporation in payment for the stock, is "property actually received," within the meaning of Const. art. 12, § 6, so that Acts 1909, c. 108, authorizing the incorporation of insurance companies whose capital consists of first mortgages on unincumbered realty in Texas, is valid.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Action by A. Moseley and another against the General Bonding & Casualty Insurance Company and others. To review the judgment for plaintiffs, defendants brought error in the Court of Civil Appeals, which affirmed (174 S. W. 1031), and defendants bring error. Judgment of the district court and Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and cause remanded to the district court.

Locke & Locke, of Dallas, for plaintiffs in error.

M. M. Harkins, of Quanah (Jno. W. Veale, of Amarillo, of counsel), for defendants in error.

PHILLIPS, C. J. The suit was one for the cancellation of a note and deed of trust upon land to secure its payment, given by the plaintiffs for shares of stock in the defendant corporation, upon the ground of fraud in the procurement of the plaintiffs' subscription agreement, and because, as is claimed, the note and mortgage were not "property" within the meaning of Section 6 of Article 12 of the Constitution, and hence could not be accepted in payment for the stock.

It is undisputed that the mortgage was a first mortgage upon the land; that the title of the plaintiffs to the land was valid; and that the value of the land was double the amount of the note, a policy of fire insurance for $3,000.00 covering the buildings on the property having been delivered to the corporation with loss payable to it.

The corporation was organized under Section 62 of the Act of 1909. By the provisions of that act its capital could consist of first mortgages upon unincumbered real estate in this state, the title to which was valid and whose market value was double the amount loaned thereon exclusive of buildings, unless the buildings were insured in some responsible company and the policy or policies were transferred to the corporation. Article 4711, Revised Statutes.

The question in the case is whether the subscribers' note and first mortgage upon the land constituted "property actually received" by the corporation, within the meaning of Section 6 of Article 12 of the Constitution.

[1, 2] We held in Washer v. Smyer, 109 Tex. —, 211 S. W. 985, 4 A. L. R. 1320, that the naked note of a subscriber to the capital stock of a corporation given in payment of his subscription was not property within the intentment of the Constitution, since it was simply his promise to pay the amount of his subscription in another form. But under the established rule of decision in this court, that contract rights transferred to a corporation in payment for stock are, to the extent of their value, "property actually received" by the corporation, (Cole v. Adams, 92 Tex. 171, 46 S. W. 790)—a decision whose soundness cannot be controverted—a subscriber's note secured by a valid first mortgage upon real estate, accepted by the corporation in payment for stock, cannot be held as other than property in the full sense of the Constitution. The corporation thereby obtains something more than the mere promise of the subscriber to pay. It obtains the right to have the land appropriated to the payment of the note. This is a valuable right, a property right, as fully so as any contract right, and, in general, as valuable as any such right. The corporation receives it and owns it. It constitutes a distinct asset in its hands; recognized, generally, as one of the most stable, desirable and easily convertible forms of property, as instanced by the Legislature's Act authorizing the capital of such corporations as this one to consist of such mortgages.

The right acquired under such mortgages is clearly property, and the law was therefore one within the power of the Legislature to enact.

The judgments of the District Court and Court of Civil Appeals are reversed and the cause remanded to the District Court for trial upon the issues of fraud.

HAWKINS, J. In this case I will file later, a statement of my views.

MASSIE v. HUTCHISON et al. (No. 2595),
(Supreme Court of Texas. May 19, 1920.)

Trial \Rightarrow 255(4)—Instruction to limit witness' testimony unnecessary in absence of request.

A party who objected to the admission of testimony, admissible for certain purposes, but did not ask the trial court to place any limitation thereon by special charge or otherwise, is not entitled to have the judgment of the trial court reversed for failure to limit the testimony.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by Rachael L. Hutchison and others against W. M. Massie. There was a judgment in favor of defendant which was reversed by the Court of Civil Appeals (159 S. W. 315), and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Stephens & Miller, of Ft. Worth, for plaintiff in error.

Randolph & Randolph, of Plainview, and T. P. Adams, of Wichita Falls, for defendants in error.

GREENWOOD, J. The defendants in error sued the plaintiff in error in the district court of Floyd county to recover the title to, and possession of, a section of land in that county. The district court rendered judgment for plaintiff in error.

It was shown by uncontradicted evidence that at one time the land belonged to Dr. Jones and his wife, and that defendants in error were their heirs and were entitled as such heirs to recover, unless Dr. Jones and wife conveyed the land in 1878 to one C. W. Haxton, under whom plaintiff in error Massie claimed.

The evidence offered by plaintiff in error Massie to prove the existence, contents, and destruction of a deed to the land from Dr. Jones and wife to C. W. Haxton, was entirely circumstantial.

Certain collateral facts having a tendency to support the conclusion that the deed was executed were testified to by the witnesses Marion T. Chase and Angie Idol. Defendants in error objected to the admission of this testimony, but did not ask the trial court to place any limitation thereon, by special charge or otherwise. The Court of Civil Appeals of the Seventh District held that the testimony should not have been excluded, on defendants in error's objection, but reversed the judgment of the district court because of the failure of the presiding judge to give a limiting charge, without request therefor. 159 S. W. 319.

The writ of error was granted to settle the conflict between the decision ordering a reversal of the trial court's judgment for the judge's omission to give an unrequested, limiting charge, and numerous decisions of this court and of other Courts of Civil Appeals.

Shumard v. Johnson, 66 Tex. 72, 17 S. W. 398, is decisive against the action of the Court of Civil Appeals in ordering the reversal of the trial court's judgment. There it is said:

"The contract between Johnson and Durie was objected to in the court below on several grounds, but, in this court, the only complaint is that in admitting the document the court below did not inform the jury of the restricted purposes for which it was allowed. There was no request for such statement of particular uses at the time the paper was put in evidence, or in the final submission of the case to the jury. There was no error in the mere omission of the court to qualify the admission of the contract, of its own motion, without suggestion or request of defendant. * * * The appellant cannot complain here that the court below was not more vigilant for him than he was for himself."

Some of the cases, wherein this court and the Courts of Civil Appeals have announced the same rule as did Shumard v. Johnson, are Walker v. Brown, 66 Tex. 556, 1 S. W. 797; Ry. Co. v. Johnson, 72 Tex. 100, 10 S. W. 325; Ry. Co. v. George, 85 Tex. 158, 19 S. W. 1036; Roos v. Lewyn, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 593, 23 S. W. 450, 24 S. W. 540; Ins. Co. v. Baker, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 515, 31 S. W. 1073; Hartt v. Cattle Co. (Civ. App.) 210 S. W. 615.

Because of the error of the Court of Civil Appeals in holding that defendants in error were entitled to have the judgment of the trial court reversed for failure to limit the witnesses' testimony, in the absence of a request that any such limitation be put on the testimony by defendants in error, it is ordered that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals be reversed; but, inasmuch as that court has not disposed of defendants in error's assignment of error challenging the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the judgment for plaintiff in error, it is ordered that this cause be remanded to the Court of Civil Appeals for the determination of that assignment.

ST. LOUIS & S. F. R. CO. v. WHITE.
(No. 2659.)

(Supreme Court of Texas. June 2, 1920.)

Carriers ⇨229(2)—Measure of damages for delay in delivery of stock stated.

Where a negligent delay in delivering stock resulted in the loss of the market on the day of arrival, as there was no time left to shape them for market on that day, the proper measure of damages is the difference between market value, had they arrived without delay or injury, and market value on the first market after their arrival for which they could be prepared by exercise of reasonable diligence.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fifth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by J. B. White against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company. Verdict and judgment for defendant in the district court. From an affirmance by the Court of Civil Appeals (160 S. W. 1128), defendant brings error. Judgments affirmed.

A. H. Dashiell, of Terrell, and Andrews, Streetman, Burns & Logue, of Houston, for plaintiff in error.

Wynne & Wynne, of Kaufman, for defendant in error.

GREENWOOD, J. In this case, defendant in error recovered of plaintiff in error damages sustained by cattle belonging to defendant in error from rough handling and delays occasioned by the negligence of plaintiff in error in transporting the cattle to market at Chicago. Had ordinary care been exercised, plaintiff in error would have delivered the cattle in time for them to have been sold on Monday's market. The cattle were delivered at 2:30 p. m. on Monday. The market closed 30 minutes later. There was testimony that this was too late to place the cattle on the market before Tuesday, because it required an hour or an hour and a half to shape up the cattle for the market. The decline in the market price of the cattle from Monday to Tuesday was 15 cents per 100 pounds. Defendant in error was allowed compensation for this decline in the verdict on which judgment was rendered by the trial court. The charge stated the measure of damages to be the difference between the market value, at Chicago, of the cattle, had they arrived without delay or injury, and their market value, at Chicago, upon the first market after their arrival for which they could be prepared by the shipper by the use of reasonable diligence.

Plaintiff in error urged in the Court of Civil Appeals, and urges here, that the delivery of the cattle, before the close of the market on Monday, precluded any recovery by defendant in error on account of the decline in the market after Monday, regardless of the time required to put the cattle in shape for sale on the market. In support of this position the decision of the Texarkana Court of Civil Appeals is cited in C. & G. Ry. Co. v. Young & Ball, 107 S. W. 127. In that case, it was held that the proper measure of damages for delay in a cattle shipment was the difference in market value of the cattle, at destination, at the time of their delivery to the consignee, and their market value, at destination, at the time and in the condition in which they should have arrived, and it was further held that the shipper could not recover for any loss occurring after the delivery of the cattle to the consignee because the cattle could not be rested and fed and watered, after delivery, before the close of the day's market.

The Dallas Court of Civil Appeals, in refusing to follow the decision in C. & G. Ry. Co. v. Young & Ball, supra, cited with approval the opposite conclusion of the Austin Court of Civil Appeals, in an opinion of Chief Justice Key in Ft. W. & R. G. Ry. Co. v. Albin, 142 S. W. 933.

The writ of error was granted because of the conflict between the decision in this case, reported in 160 S. W. 1128, which follows the Albin Case, and the decision in C. & G. Ry. Co. v. Young.

There is no difference in actual loss to a shipper from a negligent failure to deliver cattle until the close of a day's market and from such failure to deliver until too near the market's close to effect sales. The shipper cannot reasonably be required to do more in getting cattle on the market than to exercise ordinary care. Complete compensation for the actual consequence of the carrier's wrong would be denied, were the shipper not allowed to recover for a decline in market prices which occurred before he could sell on the first market open to him, before he was at all in default, and it cannot be said to be a negligent act in law to prepare cattle for market in the customary way. In G. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. McCarty, 82 Tex. 612, 18 S. W. 716, it seems to have been assumed that the time, after arrival, at which cattle could have been made ready for the market, would be the time to ascertain their value, for the purpose of measuring damages for delay in their shipment. See, also, St. L. I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Henry, 81 S. W. 334; Ayres v. O. & N. W. Ry. Co., 75 Wis. 215, 43 N. W. 1122.

In our opinion, the question was rightly determined by the Court of Civil Appeals, and the judgments of the district court and of the Court of Civil Appeals are affirmed.

COX v. ST. LOUIS & S. F. R. CO.
(No. 2624.)

(Supreme Court of Texas. June 2, 1920.)

1. Commerce \S 27(5) — Trucker unloading freight shipped to another state employed in "interstate commerce."

A trucker injured in unloading freight shipped from another state is employed by a carrier in "interstate commerce," and liability therefor is governed by the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. $\S\S$ 8657-8665.)

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Interstate Commerce.]

2. Master and servant \S 180(1)—Fellow-servant rule under federal act defined.

The federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. $\S\S$ 8657-8665) fixes liability on the carrier for injuries from negligence of any employé of the carrier whether negligent employé is a vice principal or a fellow servant of the injured employé.

3. Master and servant \S 288(13) — Assumption of risk after assurance of safety of manner of unloading truck held for jury.

Assumption of risk by a trucker injured in unloading a truck in a required manner, after he had been assured of its safety by his foreman assisting in the work, held for the jury.

4. Master and servant \S 220(8)—Assumption of risk after assurance of safety defined.

Where, after calling attention to possible danger, a servant, relying on his foreman's assurance of safety, proceeds to do work in a required manner, he cannot be charged with assumption of risk unless the danger is so obvious that an ordinarily prudent person would appreciate it, despite the assurance.

5. Master and servant \S 217(29) — Railroad trucker held not to have assumed risk of foreman's negligence.

Where a railroad trucker assisted by his foreman in unloading bundles from a truck in a manner required by the foreman was injured by the foreman swinging his end of a bundle before the trucker was ready, and before it reasonably appeared so, there was no assumption of risk as to the foreman's negligence in swinging his end, as the nature of the act precluded knowledge or discovery thereof in time to have averted injury.

6. Appeal and error \S 1083(1)—Judgment of trial court affirmed notwithstanding findings of Court of Civil Appeals.

Where the Court of Civil Appeals does not find against any fact essential to plaintiff's recovery and the Supreme Court does not approve its conclusions of law on which it based its judgment reversing a judgment for plaintiff, its judgment will be reversed and the judgment of the trial court affirmed.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fifth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by S. E. Cox against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff was reversed by the Court of Civil Appeals (150 S. W. 1042), and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, and judgment of the district court affirmed.

Randell & Randell and B. L. Jones, all of Sherman, for plaintiff in error.

Head, Smith, Maxey & Head, of Sherman, and Andrews, Ball & Streetman, of Houston, for defendant in error.

GREENWOOD, J. This was a suit by plaintiff in error, Cox, to recover damages of defendant in error, St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company, for personal injuries.

Cox was employed by the railroad company as a trucker at Hugo, Okl. He was directed by his foreman, named Reams, to unload four bundles of paper, each weighing 110 pounds, by throwing them, with Reams' help, from the truck to the top of a pile some four feet in height, while resting the handles of the truck on the warehouse floor and while holding down the handles with one foot. Reams was authorized by the railroad company to determine the manner in which the paper should be unloaded and to direct Cox in unloading same. The paper was part of a shipment from Paris, Tex., to Hugo, Okl. Cox had started to raise the truck handles so as to dump the paper from the truck to the floor, with a view of raising it from the floor to the top of the pile, when he was stopped by the above directions from Reams. Cox said when he received his directions: "Mr. Reams, the truck will dump." Reams replied:

"They won't do anything of the kind. Back up and let them down and put your foot on the truck handle, and we will unload from the truck."

While Reams and Cox were unloading the bundles in accordance with Reams' instructions and while throwing off the second bundle, the truck handles suddenly struck Cox in the chest, causing his injuries. The handles flew up when Cox's foot released same, which was occasioned by the act of Reams in swinging his end of the bundle of paper before Cox was ready to swing his end and before it reasonably appeared to Cox that he was ready to make the swing. The acts of Reams, in the manner in which he directed the bundles to be unloaded and in too hastily swinging his end of the second bundle, were negligent; and his negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries to Cox. All of the above facts were pleaded and have support in the evidence. The charge of the trial court authorized a verdict for Cox on findings of negligence of Reams, with respect to either the manner in which he directed Cox to do the work or the manner in which he (Reams) did his part of the unloading. The trial court entered a judgment for Cox on a general verdict.

The Dallas Court of Civil Appeals reversed the trial court's judgment and rendered judgment for the railroad company on two conclusions of law, viz.: First, that Reams was a fellow servant of Cox; and, second, that Cox assumed the risk of injury from Reams' acts of negligence. 150 S. W. 1042.

[1] Cox suffered his injuries while he was engaged in unloading freight shipped from Texas to Oklahoma. He was therefore injured while employed by the carrier in interstate commerce, and liability for his injuries is governed by the federal Employers' Liability Act. Southern Pacific Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 251 U. S. 259, 40 Sup. Ct. 130, 64 L. Ed. —.

[2] The plain words of the federal act, no less than the decisions construing it, fix liability on the carrier for injuries resulting from the negligence of any employé of the carrier, regardless of whether the negligent employé is a vice principal of the carrier or a fellow servant of the injured employé. So, the conclusion of the Court of Civil Appeals cannot be upheld denying a recovery to Cox on the ground that Reams was his fellow servant. Boldt v. Pennsylvania R. R. Co., 245 U. S. 445, 38 Sup. Ct. 139, 62 L. Ed. 885; Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U. S. 1, 32 Sup. Ct. 169, 56 L. Ed. 327, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 44.

[3-5] The case not coming within the class as to which the defense of assumption of risk was eliminated by the act of Congress, we must apply the common-law rules in reaching a conclusion as to how far that defense was available to the railroad company.

In behalf of the railroad company, it is urged that the negligence causing the injuries consisted in the manner in which the work was required to be done; that such manner was known to Cox; and that the dangers incident thereto were both obvious and appreciated by Cox, who was an experienced trucker. Though we eliminate from consideration the act of Reams in swinging too hurriedly his end of the bundle of paper, we cannot hold that it was conclusively shown that Cox assumed the risk of injury from the manner in which the paper was unloaded. It is true that Cox was an experienced trucker. It is true that Cox knew the manner in which he was ordered to do the work. And it is true that Cox was apprehensive of danger at the time he received Reams' order. But, after Cox had voiced his apprehension of danger, he was assured by one having the authority from the railroad company to determine and direct how the work should be done that his fears were unfounded; and he testified that, after receiving this assurance, he believed that the work could be done as directed, with safety, by the exercise of ordinary care.

An apprehension of danger, which has been removed through unfounded assurances of safety, can have no more effect in determining whether a risk has been assumed; than if it had never existed. It must, of necessity, be a subsisting apprehension if it is to furnish an essential element to sustain the defense of assumed risk. Hence the soundness cannot be questioned of the rule that where the servant proceeds to do the master's work in a required manner, involving negligence for which the master is responsible, after calling attention to possible danger therein, in reliance on an assurance of safety by the master through one selected by him to direct the work, and the servant is injured by reason of the manner in which the work is done, the master cannot charge the servant with the assumption of the risk of his injury, unless the danger of doing the work in the manner required is so obvious that an ordinarily prudent person must appreciate it, despite the assurance of safety. Industrial Lbr. Co. v. Bivens, 47 Tex. Civ. App. 896, 105 S. W. 837; Orange Lbr. Co. v. Ellis, 105 Tex. 371, 150 S. W. 582; Gila Valley Ry. Co. v. Hall, 232 U. S. 102, 34 Sup. Ct. 229, 58 L. Ed. 521; Coal & Coke Ry. v. Deal, 281 Fed. 610, 145 C. O. A. 490; Lord v. Wakefield, 185 Mass. 218, 70 N. E. 123; Lack Singletree Co. v. Cherry, 168 Ky. 799, 179 S. W. 1072; Richey's Federal Employers' Liability Act, § 73, p. 185; Street's Ed. Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 215, p. 614.

Here it was the duty of Cox to obey Reams' directions. There is no evidence that Cox ever attempted the work of unloading with the aid of a coemployé from a truck, with his foot on the handles, as Reams required the work to be done. His conduct was consistent with his reliance on Reams' assurances against danger. Clearly it was for the jury to determine whether, in the face of Reams' assurances, Cox appreciated the risk of his injury or believed, as he testified, that the work could be safely performed; and, even more clearly was the question one on which conflicting inferences might be drawn, and hence essentially one for the jury, as to whether the risk of injury was under all the attendant circumstances so obvious that a person of ordinary prudence would have appreciated it, notwithstanding Reams' assurances.

As said by Justice Holmes in McKee v. Tourtellotte, 167 Mass. 69, 44 N. E. 1071 (48 L. R. A. 543):

"When we say that a man appreciates a danger, we mean that he forms a judgment as to the future, and that his judgment is right. But if against this judgment is set the judgment of a superior, one too who, from the nature of the callings of the two men and of the superior's duty, seems likely to make the more accurate forecast, and if to this is added a command to go on with his work and to run the risk, it becomes a complex question of the particular circumstances whether the inferior is not justified as a prudent man in surrendering his own opinion and obeying the command."

Under the charge of the trial court, a verdict was authorized for Cox on the finding that his injury was the proximate result of negligence on the part of Reams in the way in which he did his part of the work of unloading the paper; and the Court of Civil Appeals finds that Reams did swing his end of the bundle of paper before Cox was ready to swing and before it reasonably appeared to Reams that Cox was ready, and that such conduct was negligence on Reams' part, causing the injury.

As stated above, Cox did not, as matter of law, assume the danger arising from the endeavor to unload from the truck. There is an utter lack of evidence to support the conclusion that Cox assumed the risk attributable not to that endeavor but to Reams' want of care in pursuing it. The law authorized Cox to assume that Reams would exercise ordinary care in doing his part of the work. The result of Reams' departure from the use of such care was instantaneous injury to Cox. The nature of Reams' act precluded knowledge of it by Cox or its discovery by him in time to have averted the injury. Under these conditions, there could be no assumption of the risk which arose from Reams' negligence in handling his end of the bundle of paper. O. & O. Ry. Co. v. Proffitt, 241 U. S. 468, 36 Sup. Ct. 620, 60 L. Ed. 1102; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. De Atley, 241 U. S. 314, 36 Sup. Ct. 310, 60 L. Ed. 1016; T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Behymer, 189 U. S. 468, 23 Sup. Ct. 622, 47 L. Ed. 905; C., R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Ward, 252 U. S. 18, 40 Sup. Ct. 275, 64 L. Ed. —; Pope v. K. C., M. & O. Ry. Co. of Tex., 207 S. W. 514.

In T. & N. O. Ry. Co. v. Kelly, 98 Tex. 137, 80 S. W. 79, the court approved a declaration of Justice Gaines in Railway v. Somers, 78 Tex. 442, 14 S. W. 780, which is as applicable to acts of negligence by employes, for which the employer is answerable, as to defects, and which is:

"Because a servant knows of one defect he does not take the risk of another of which he has no knowledge, and if both contribute to injure him, he is entitled to recover, provided but for the unknown defect the accident would not have happened."

[6] In this case, since the Court of Civil Appeals made no finding against the existence of any fact essential to plaintiff's recovery, and since we do not approve the conclusions of law, on which alone that court based its judgment, it becomes our duty, under the settled practice in this court, to reverse the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals and to affirm the judgment of the district court. Beck v. Texas Co., 105 Tex. 303, 148 S. W. 295; Tweed v. Tel. Co., 107 Tex. 247, 166 S. W. 696, 177 S. W. 957.

It is so ordered.

HEFNER V. FIDELITY & CASUALTY CO. OF NEW YORK. (No. 2630.)

(Supreme Court of Texas. June 9, 1920.)

1. Insurance ~~665~~(5)—Evidence showing disability resulting from accident was total, but not immediate.

In an action by an attorney on an accident insurance policy for the indemnity provided therein for immediate, continuous, and total disability, evidence held to show that the disability of the insured resulting from the accident, while total within the meaning of the policy, was not immediate.

2. Insurance ~~539~~(6)—Attributing insured's condition to disease, and not to accident, no excuse for delay in giving notice of loss.

The fact that physicians, who attended a person accidentally injured, attributed his condition to disease, and not to the accident, does not excuse a failure to give the company notice of the accident as soon as reasonably possible, as required by the policy.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by H. S. Pearson against the Prudential Life Insurance Company of Texas. To review decree for plaintiff, defendant brought error in the Court of Civil Appeals, which affirmed (188 S. W. 513), and defendant brings error. Judgment of the district court and Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and cause remanded to the district court on recommendation of the Commission of Appeals.

Jas. A. King, of Austin, Mathes & Williams, of Plainview, and Milton H. West, of Brownsville, for plaintiff in error.

L. R. Pearson, of Ranger, and C. D. Russell, of Plainview, for defendant in error.

McLENDON, J. This action was brought to rescind a subscription contract for 16 shares of the capital stock of the defendant, Prudential Life Insurance Company of Texas, and to cancel a $3,200 note and trust deed upon 640 acres of land; which note and trust deed were executed by plaintiff, H. S. Pearson, in payment for the stock. The trial court rendered judgment for plaintiff, granting the relief prayed for, upon a directed verdict; which judgment the Court of Civil Appeals affirmed. 188 S. W. 513. The errors assigned challenge the correctness of the trial court's action in directing a verdict for plaintiff.

Two grounds for relief were asserted by plaintiff: First, that he was induced by fraudulent representations to purchase the stock; and, second, that the note and trust deed did not constitute "property actually received," within the meaning of section 6 of article 12 of the Constitution of Texas.

[1] Defendant is within the class of corporations whose capital stock can consist of first mortgages upon real estate worth double the amount of the loan. It is not questioned that the trust deed complied in every respect with our statutes in this regard. With respect to plaintiff's second ground for relief the case is therefore ruled by the decision in General Bonding & Casualty Insurance Co. v. Moseley, 222 S. W. 961, decided by the Supreme Court on May 5, 1920.

[2] The evidence upon the issue of fraud was conflicting, and will not support the directed verdict.

We conclude that the judgments of the district court and Court of Civil Appeals should be reversed, and the cause remanded to the district court for further trial.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case, and the holding of the Commission on the question discussed.

ILLINOIS BANKERS' LIFE ASS'N v.
FLOYD. (No. 133-3027.)(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 9, 1920.)

1. Insurance \S 640(4) — Notice of death presumed, where failure to give notice not pleaded.

In an action on a life insurance policy, where insurer has not pleaded failure to give notice of death of insured, it will be presumed that such notice was given, in view of Rev. St. 1911, art. 5714.

2. Insurance \S 559(2)—Proof of death not required, where insurer denies liability.

Where insurer denied all liability beyond the amount paid it, proof of death was not required, and would have been a useless formality.

3. Tender \S 22—Plea of tender by insurer held not necessary in action on life policy.

In an action on a life policy, where it appeared that plaintiff had been tendered, through her attorney, more than three months before the suit was brought, the full amount the company had received, and liability for which it admitted, no plea of tender was necessary; the only purpose of pleadings being to notify the opposing party of what is expected to be proved.

4. Insurance \S 640(3)—That insured died by his own hand held sufficient allegation of suicide.

In an action on a life insurance policy, an allegation by defendant that insured "died by his own hand" held equivalent to alleging that he intentionally took his own life.

5. Insurance \S 446—Suicide forfeits policy, notwithstanding insured morally irresponsible.

An insurance policy containing a suicide clause is forfeited by the suicide of insured, notwithstanding that his mind was impaired to the extent that he was not morally responsible for his act.

6. Pleading \S 21—Inconsistent matters may be pleaded, if at the same time and in due order of pleading.

There is no qualification or abridgment of the rights to plead matters that are inconsistent, if they be pleaded at the same time and in due order of pleading.

7. Insurance \S 840(3)—Answer denying liability, except for stated amount, held good on demurrer.

In an action of a life insurance policy containing a suicide clause, where it appeared that insured had committed suicide 33 days after the issuance of the policy, an answer denying liability for the face of the policy and admitting liability for repayment of all insurer had received from insured, with tender of such amount, held good on general demurrer.

8. Insurance \S 515 — Amount payable under policy held validly reduced by provision "promising a benefit."

Under Rev. St. 1911, art. 4742, forbidding provision for any mode of settlement at maturity of an insurance policy of less value than the face of the policy, except that a company may issue a policy "promising a benefit less than the full benefit" in case of insured's suicide, a policy provision was sufficient, as "promising a benefit," to validly reduce the amount payable under the policy, where the policy provided for payment "of the contribution to the mortuary fund," in case of suicide.

9. Appeal and error \S 931(3) — To support judgment, facts presumed found.

It must be presumed that the trial court found all the facts necessary to support its judgment.

10. Insurance \S 672—Plaintiff held entitled to amount tendered by company.

Where, although plaintiff in action on insurance policy did not pray in the alternative or otherwise for recovery of the lesser amount for which the insurance company admitted liability, yet a ground of her motion for new trial was alleged error of the trial court in not rendering judgment for her for that amount, judgment should have been rendered for her for such amount.

11. Costs \S 42(8) — Costs to be adjudged against plaintiff refusing tender of amount admitted and found due.

Where plaintiff, suing on an insurance policy, made no prayer for recovery of the lesser amount for which defendant admitted liability, and when it was tendered by the company it was refused by her, costs should be adjudged against her.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Action by Lula Viola Floyd against the Illinois Bankers' Life Association. A judgment for defendant was reversed by the Court of Civil Appeals (192 S. W. 607), and defendant brings error. Reversed and rendered.

Pat M. Neff and J. N. Gallagher, both of Waco, for plaintiff in error.

Paul Steed, of Stephenville, and Bean & Kleet, of Lubbock, for defendant in error.

KITTRELL, J. Plaintiff in error issued a policy of insurance on the life of the husband of defendant in error October 8, 1914, and the premium, $42, was paid. The policy was for $3,000. The insured died by his own hand November 10, 1914. The jury so found, and further found that he took his own life intentionally—a fact concerning which there was practically no dispute.

The plaintiff alleged the contract, and the death of the insured, and demand for payment, and refusal, and prayed judgment for $3,000, but did not plead in the alternative for recovery of the mortuary contribution. The defendant pleaded as a defense to the action a provision of the policy reading as follows:

"If within two years from the issuing of any certificate or policy the member or insured, whether sane or insane, shall die by his own hand, the liability of the association shall be limited to the amount of the mortuary contribution of such member or policy holder."

There was no exception addressed to the pleading by plaintiff. In reply she pleaded in substance that when the insured took his own life he was—because of a number of reasons assigned—not responsible for the act. The defendant addressed no exception to that plea, and in pursuance of it the court submitted of his own motion a special issue (No. 3) conforming to that plea, and the jury to such issue responded in the affirmative, viz. that the insured was mentally irresponsible.

The defendant did not plead that the insured took his own life intentionally, and to the failure or omission to so plead plaintiff excepted, which exception was overruled, and plaintiff excepted. Defendant did not plead failure to give notice of the death of the insured as required by the policy, nor did it plead what the amount of the mortuary fund was, nor plead that there was a mortuary fund, nor did it plead tender of any amount.

It was, however, proved by plaintiff by the evidence of one of her attorneys that on or about July 10, 1915, the sum of $42, the full amount of the premium, was tendered him for plaintiff, and was by him refused. It was proved, also, in the same way, that accompanying the tender was a letter denying liability for the $3,000 on account of the suicide.

Those facts are set forth at this point, both because due order of statement requires that it be done, and because, in the concluding part of the original opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals (192 S. W. 607), is the following language:

"There is some evidence tending to show that a tender was at one time made to appellant's attorneys, but the sum tendered does not appear from the statement of facts."

The judge who wrote the opinion must have overlooked a page in the statement of facts. It is shown therein by the evidence of one of plaintiff's attorneys that on or about July 10, 1915, three months before suit was filed the cashier of a bank, whose name is given, tendered to the attorney $42, the whole amount received by the company from the insured, and that the tender was by the attorney refused.

The trial court rendered judgment for plaintiff on the verdict of the jury, but on hearing motion for new trial set aside the verdict and judgment, and rendered judgment for defendant. The Court of Civil Appeals of the Seventh District reversed that judgment, and rendered judgment for plaintiff in the full amount of the policy.

Opinion.

The parties will, for the sake of convenience and brevity, be referred to as they were in the court below.

[1] Not having pleaded failure to give notice of the death of the insured, it was presumed such notice was given. Article 5714, R. S.

[2] Furthermore, the defendant having denied all liability beyond the amount paid the company, such proof was not required, and would have been a useless formality. East Texas Fire Ins. Co. v. Coffee, 61 Tex. 298; Knickerbocker v. Pendleton, 112 U. S. 696, 5 Sup. Ct. 314, 28 L. Ed. 866; National, etc., v. Thomas, 10 App. D. C. 277.

[3] The only purpose of pleading being to notify the opposing party of what is expected to be proved, and plaintiff having been tendered, through her attorney, more than three months before suit was brought, the full amount the company had received, and liability for which it admitted, no plea of tender was necessary. The pleading of defendant, to which, as has been stated, no exception was taken, was equivalent to saying that defendant was not, because the insured died by his own hand, liable for the $3,000 insurance, but was liable for the $42.

No objection appears to have been made to the form or manner or amount of the tender, and the inference is deducible from the record that the refusal was based on the belief of plaintiff's attorneys that their conception of the law as reflected in the supplemental petition, and by their insistence on judgment for plaintiff on the finding of the jury on issue No. 3, would necessitate recovery in plaintiff's favor for the face of the policy. Since the Court of Civil Appeals expressly states that "we do not base the disposition of the appeal on the question of insanity," it is not necessary to enter upon any extended discussion of the law or the pleading as relates to that question.

[4] It is sufficient to say that the pleading of the defendant was as broad as the terms of the policy, and that to allege that the defendant "died by his own hand" was equivalent to alleging that he intentionally took his own life. Bigelow v. Berkshire, etc., 93 U. S. 284, 23 L. Ed. 918.

[5] There are many cases in the reports of Texas, and in those of other states, similar to this, and it may serve a useful purpose to say that the contention of plaintiff that, if the mind of the insured was impaired to the extent that he was not morally responsible for the act of taking his own life, the policy was not forfeited, is not sound in law. The law was so declared in Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 15 Wall. 580, 21 L. Ed. 236, and that holding has been followed in this state (Life Ins. Co. v. Walden [Civ. App.] 26 S. W. 1012; Life Ins. Co. v. Hayward, 88 Tex. 322, 30 S. W. 1049, 31 S. W. 507); but it is now settled law in this state that, if the exception in the policy be that the company shall be exempt from liability "if the insured dies by his own hand, sane or insane," there can be no recovery. Mutual Reserve, etc., v. Payne (Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 1063; Parish v. Mutual Benefit, etc., 19 Tex. Civ. App. 457, 49 S. W. 153; Grand Fraternity v. Melton, 102 Tex. 399, 117 S. W. 788.

The opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals has been most carefully examined and analyzed, and that court appears to us to have based its conclusion in a large measure upon its construction of the meaning and effect of article 4742 of the Revised Statutes, and, following upon and collateral to that construction, upon the matter of pleading. That article of the statute, so far as it is quoted, construed, and applied, reads as follows:

"No policy of life insurance shall be issued or delivered in this state, or be issued by a life insurance company incorporated under the laws of this state, if it contains any of the following provisions: * * *

"3. A provision for any mode of settlement at maturity of less value than the amounts insured on the face of the policy, plus dividend additions, * * * less any indebtedness to the company on the policy, and less any premium that may, by the terms of the policy, be deducted: Provided, that any company may issue a policy promising a benefit less than the full benefit in case of the death of the insured by his own hand while sane or insane, or by the following stated hazardous occupations."

At the risk of extending this opinion to a greater length than is desirable, we will as a matter of justice to the Court of Civil Appeals, liberally, but carefully and accurately, paraphrase and summarize the grounds on which that court bases its holding. Before proceeding so to do, it will be helpful to state in simple, ordinary language what the contract was, so that that material fact may be kept in view. Stated in condensed form, it was that in consideration of $42 paid, and the payment of a like amount annually thereafter, the company would, in event of the death of the insured otherwise than by his own hand within two years from the date of the policy, pay plaintiff $3,000, but if the insured did die by his own hand, sane or insane, within two years from the date of the policy, the company would be responsible for, and would pay only, the amount of "the contribution of the insured to the mortuary fund."

The Court of Civil Appeals adjudged that the defendant was liable for the full sum of $3,000, and based such judgment upon, as we conclude from a most careful and painstaking analysis of the opinion, the following grounds:

(1) That under article 4742 suicide cannot be set off as a complete bar to the action.

(2) That article 4742 has been enacted since the Payne and Parish Cases supra, were decided, and that article clearly implies that a violation of the suicide clause in the policy shall not be an absolute defense.

(3) That article 4742 gives the company the privilege of fixing the amount at less than the full benefit named in the contract, and the amount named in this contract is "the amount of the mortuary contribution paid to the association by the insured."

(4) That while the defendant pleaded a release from liability under the suicide clause, there is as a matter of fact no such clause in the policy, and under the statute none can be inserted under which the company could be entirely relieved of responsibility.

Before setting forth further the holdings of the Court of Civil Appeals, it is proper to say here that, conceding for the sake of argument that those above set forth are sound, it does not follow that the conclusion reached by that court is correct, because it is based, as we conceive, on a misconstruction of defendant's pleading; therefore on a false premise.

Defendant did not plead the provision of the policy relating to suicide as a ground of entire release from liability. On the contrary, it was in legal effect an admission of liability to the extent of what the company had been paid. It is true the defendant followed that pleading with the further pleading that it was by the suicide of the insured released from any and all liability, on which latter pleading the Court of Civil Appeals lays much stress; but, if it be conceded that these pleas are apparently, or even indeed really, inconsistent, that fact could not give to the latter the effect to destroy or even impair the validity or force of the former.

[6] It is the long-settled law of pleading in this state that:

"There is no qualification or abridgment of the right to plead matters that are inconsistent, if they be pleaded at the same time and in due order of pleading." Fowler v. Davenport 21 Tex. 633; Duncan v. Magette, 25 Tex. 255; Smith v. Sublett, 28 Tex. 163.

The plaintiff insisted most strenuously in the Court of Civil Appeals, as she does in this court, that the stipulation in the policy limiting the liability of the company to the amount of the mortuary contribution does not constitute a "promise," within the meaning of the statute, when it says the company may issue a policy promising less than the full benefit named in the policy. The Court of Civil Appeals evidently disagreed with that contention, since it says:

"The stipulation would be a promise and more; it would be a binding obligation, if it appeared that the insured ever paid to the company any sum whatever as a mortuary contribution, or was bound by the terms of the contract to make such payment."

It then proceeds to say in substance, in this connection, that there is nothing in the pleadings or evidence to show that there had ever been a mortuary contribution, or that any provision had ever been made for one; therefore the promise is to pay something which did not exist, and therefore promised no benefit whatever.

The Court of Civil Appeals further held:

(5) That defendant having failed to plead under the suicide clause the amount of the mortuary contribution, and that it had taken advantage of the statutory privilege, and inserted a clause whereby it could pay a benefit less than the face of the policy, and there being no evidence whatever that there had been a mortuary contribution by the insured, or any other policy holder, the plaintiff should recover the whole amount of the policy.

The Court of Civil Appeals further held:

(6) That "while it is correct as a proposition of law that, if an insurance company proves the amount of its liability to be less than the face of the policy and tenders that amount to the plaintiff, the judgment should be limited to the sum so tendered, yet that proposition has no application here, because appellee did not tender any sum in its pleadings, but, on the contrary, pleaded that by reason of the suicide of the insured "the contract became absolutely null and void, and this defendant was thereby released from any and all liability thereunder."

What we have already said concerning the question of tender, and the rule of pleading recognized and applied in this state, makes unnecessary any discussion of this holding.

From the foregoing summary and analysis of the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals it will be seen that the conclusion it reached is based upon what it conceives to be the failure of defendant to properly plead its case.

[7] While it may be conceded that the pleading might have been clearer, more specific and definite, yet in view of the peculiar facts and the language of the contract, and of the further fact that no exception was directed against the manner or form of pleading the provision of the policy relating to the obligation to pay the amount of "the mortuary contribution," we are of the opinion that the pleading was good on general demurrer. It was in effect a denial of liability for the $3,000, and an admission of liability for repayment of all that it had received from the insured, which interpretation of the contract defendant had translated into action, by tendering back $42, all it had received.

[8] With the holding of the Court of Civil Appeals that defendant had promised no benefit we cannot agree. When it tendered the insured the policy containing the provision for payment "of the contribution to the mortuary fund" in case the insured died by his own hand, and the insured accepted the policy and paid the premium, a complete and binding contract was made.

We are not at liberty to ignore any fact which is clearly apparent in the record, and it is obvious that in the space of 33 days which elapsed between the issuance of the policy and the death no mortuary fund could have accrued—certainly none in excess of the whole amount paid by the insured. That the plaintiff was of the opinion that the pleading and evidence identified and fixed the amount recoverable as "the contribution to the mortuary fund" is made evident by the fact that, although she did not plead in the alternative for such recovery, yet the tenth and last ground of her motion for a new trial was that "the court erred in not rendering judgment for her for the amount of the mortuary contribution."

[9] It must be presumed that the trial court found all the facts necessary to support its judgment, and, this being true, it must have found the obvious fact that the whole amount received from the insured by the company had been tendered back, and the tender refused. Manifestly there could have been no recovery of the $3,000 insurance, because that by the terms of the contract had been forfeited; hence there was no ground on which judgment could, under the pleadings or evidence, have been properly rendered for plaintiff for that amount.

Any judgment for the plaintiff would have the effect to take from defendant and give to plaintiff that which by the terms of the contract the act of her husband had deprived her of the right to receive. The judgment of the district court, in so far as it denied plaintiff recovery on the policy, was correct, and the Court of Civil Appeals erred in adjudging to the contrary.

[10] Plaintiff did not pray, in the alternative or otherwise, for recovery of the $42, and when it was tendered her attorney on July 10, 1915, it was refused; but the last ground of her motion for a new trial was alleged error of the trial court in not rendering judgment for that amount in her favor, and in view of the terms of the contract, and the admission by defendant of liability to that extent, judgment should have been rendered in favor of plaintiff for $42 and interest.

[11] However, as plaintiff made no prayer for it, and when it was tendered it was refused, we are of the opinion that the costs should be adjudged against her.

We recommend that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals, reversing the judgment of the district court, denying plaintiff recovery for the face of the policy, be reversed, and that the judgment of the district court in that regard be affirmed.

We further recommend that judgment be here rendered for plaintiff—defendant in error here—for $42, with interest at 6 per cent from July 10, 1915, in all $54.50, and that the costs be adjudged against her.

PHILLIPS, C. J. Judgments of district court and Court of Civil Appeals are reversed. Judgment will be entered here for defendant in error for $42, with legal interest from July 10, 1915, and for costs in the district court and Court of Civil Appeals. The costs of this court will be adjudged against her.

CLEGG et al. v. TEMPLE LUMBER CO. et al. (No. 148-3095.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 26, 1920.)

Parties ~~et al.~~—Plaintiffs having separate demands cannot be joined.

Where all plaintiffs in suit to recover land asked for cancellation of a former judgment against them, and for repossession of their separate tracts, and one plaintiff also asked damages; there was a misjoinder of parties plaintiff.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Ninth Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by W. E. Clegg and others against the Temple Lumber Company and others. From judgment for the named defendant, plaintiffs appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which affirmed (195 S. W. 646), and plaintiffs bring error. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals affirmed on recommendation of the Commission of Appeals.

E. P. Padgett, of Hemphill, for plaintiffs in error.

W. F. Goodrich, of Hemphill, and Minor & Minor, of Beaumont, for defendant in error.

KITTRELL, J. From the decision of the Court of Civil Appeals (195 S. W. 646) to which we refer, writ of error was granted by the Committee of Judges. In the view of the Supreme Court the suit, however styled, was essentially one for the recovery of land, and the trial court's sustaining of exceptions upon the question of misjoinder of parties plaintiff was correct. Hunt v. Johnson, 106 Tex. 510, 171 S. W. 1125. Plaintiff's refusal to amend following that ruling of the trial court necessarily ended the case.

In this view we conclude that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be affirmed on the ground stated.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

TEXAS & N. O. RY. CO. v. WEEMS et al. (No. 110-2956.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 23, 1920.)

1. Carriers \S 45—Evidence held to authorize finding of contract to furnish cars.

In an action for breach of a carrier's contract to deliver cars to orchard for shipment of peaches, evidence held sufficient to authorize finding of making of contract substantially as alleged by plaintiffs.

2. Carriers \S 45—Evidence held insufficient to show damages from failure to furnish cars would have been diminished by delivery of fruit at station.

In action for breach of carrier's contract to deliver cars to orchard for shipment of peaches, evidence held insufficient to show that plaintiffs' damages certainly would have been diminished had they delivered fruit at station of defendant carrier or at that of another carrier.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Sixth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by J. B. Weems and others against the Texas & New Orleans Railway Company. A judgment for plaintiffs was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (184 S. W. 1103), and defendant brings error. Judgment of trial court and Court of Civil Appeals affirmed on recommendation of the Commission of Appeals.

See, also, 165 S. W. 1194.

Guinn, Imboden & Guinn, of Rusk, and Jno. T. Garrison, of Houston, for plaintiff in error.

Norman, Shook & Gibson, of Rusk, for defendants in error.

MONTGOMERY, P. J. This suit was instituted by J. B. Weems and Commodore Yarborough against the Texas & New Orleans Railway Company to recover damages for the breach of an express contract to furnish cars for shipment of certain peaches owned by the plaintiff and growing near the line of the defendant's railway company. For convenience the parties will be designated as they appear in the court below, as plaintiffs and defendant.

It was alleged by the plaintiffs that in the month of May, 1910, they entered into an agreement with the defendant railway company by which the defendant agreed to furnish the plaintiffs refrigerator cars for the shipment of their peach crop then growing, but not yet ready for market, and further agreed to deliver the cars as needed, upon a certain track in or near plaintiffs' orchards, and further contracted "that, upon the plaintiffs notifying the defendant on the night or afternoon before the number of cars required the next day, such number would be so furnished on such notification"; that plaintiffs obligated themselves to ship their peach crop on and over defendant's line of railway.

It was further alleged that defendant failed to furnish the cars for three consecutive days when properly notified and requested, as provided in the contract, and that plaintiffs were thereby damaged by the loss of large quantity of fruit then ready for shipment. The defendant denied making the contract sued on, and pleaded other matters which it is not necessary to state.

The case was tried before a jury on special issues, and upon the verdict judgment was rendered for plaintiffs. The defendant appealed. The Court of Civil Appeals affirmed the judgment of the trial court. 184 S. W. 1103.

In granting the writ of error in this case the Supreme Court indicated that it was of the opinion that the evidence failed to show the contract as pleaded by the plaintiffs. In the application for writ of error the claim is made that the evidence was insufficient to show the contract alleged in that it failed to show that there was an agreement on the part of the railway company to furnish cars when notified on the afternoon or night before of the cars needed for the next succeeding day.

[1] We have carefully read the statement of facts in connection with the petition for writ of error, and have concluded that there was evidence which, if believed, showed the making of the contract, and that the contract was substantially as alleged by the plaintiffs.

The evidence showed that the contract was made by letters written by plaintiff Weems, acting for himself and the plaintiff Yarborough, and one Mrs. Clark, the agent of the defendant railway company. Prior to the trial the original letters had been lost or destroyed. Purported copies of only three letters were offered in evidence. These letters failed to show the contract as alleged by the plaintiffs. There was, however, testimony tending to show that the copies offered in evidence were not true copies of the originals, and also that there were other letters relating to the same matter which were not produced on the trial. The plaintiff Weems testified that he had received a letter from the agent of the railway company agreeing to furnish the cars, as alleged in his petition, and that he accepted the offer and agreed to ship his entire crop over the line of the defendant railway company. He testified that the letter of the railway company to him and his letter to the railway company to the effect above set out were not in his possession and could not be produced; that the entire correspondence in his possession had been delivered to his attorney, and he was informed that the same had been destroyed by a fire which consumed the office of the attorney. The testimony of the attorney tended to corroborate Weems. We think it unnecessary to set out the testimony in detail. Suffice it to say that in our judgment there was ample testimony to authorize a finding that the contract was made substantially as alleged by the plaintiffs.

[2] With reference to the claim that plaintiffs are not entitled to recover the amount of the judgment as rendered because they failed after the breach of the contract by the railway company to deliver the fruit at the depot of the defendant railway company, or of the Cotton Belt Railway Company, which also had a depot near plaintiffs' orchards, and there tender the fruit for shipment, we think that the evidence failed to show that the plaintiffs' damages would thereby have certainly been diminished. There was evidence tending to show that there was a great congestion of traffic at that particular time, and that the railway companies were unable to furnish cars for all who requested them. It being a question of fact as to whether or not the plaintiffs, under the circumstances, could by delivering the fruit at the railway station have procured transportation therefor, and thus mitigated the damages, we feel bound by the conclusion of the trial court and Court of Civil Appeals. We have examined all the assignments of error, and the entire record, and find nothing that in our judgment requires a reversal of the case.

We recommend that the judgment of the trial court and the Court of Civil Appeals be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

COYLE et al. v. PALATINE INS. CO., Limited. (No. 161-3151.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 23, 1920.)

1. Insurance ~~4~~846(6)—Burden on insured to show loss not excepted from policy.

Under a policy insuring against damage by tornado, windstorm, or cyclone, expressly excepting from the risk any loss or damage through tidal wave, high water, or overflow, and damage caused by water or rain, whether or not driven by the wind, burden was on insured to show that loss was not among those excepted.

2. Insurance ~~4~~423—Loss by wind and water excluded by stipulation from policy covering only damage by wind.

A policy insuring against damage by tornado, windstorm, or cyclone, expressly excepting damage through any tidal wave, high water, or overflow, and damage caused by water or rain, whether driven by wind or not, covered only losses resulting from wind and no other cause, and parties having stipulated it was impossible to determine to what extent wind and water were factors in causing a loss, it was excluded from indemnity provided.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of First Supreme Judicial District.

Action by B. A. Coyle and others against the Palatine Insurance Company, Limited. To review judgment for plaintiffs, defendant brought error to the Court of Civil Appeals, which affirmed in part, and reversed and rendered in part (196 S. W. 560), and plaintiffs bring error. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals affirmed on separate opinion approving that of the Commission of Appeals.

Stewarts and Albert J. De Lange, all of Galveston, for plaintiffs in error.

Williams & Neethe, of Galveston, and Locke & Locke, of Dallas, for defendant in error.

SADLER, P. J. The opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals will be found in 196 S. W. 560, wherein is given a full statement of the issues and evidence requisite to an understanding and decision of the two fundamental propositions presented in the petition for writ of error. We do not think it necessary to restate the record, except in so far as it may be germane to a clearer understanding of the questions decided. The contract provides that the insurance company "does insure * * * against all direct loss or damage by tornado, windstorm, or cyclone, except as hereinafter provided, * * *" and provides:

"This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions and to the following stipulations and conditions printed on the back hereof, which are hereby specially referred to and made a part of this policy."

Among the stipulations germane printed on the back of the policy are these:

"This company shall not be liable for any loss or damage * * * occasioned directly or indirectly by or through any * * * tidal wave, * * * high water, overflow, or cloudburst;" and, second, "for any loss or damage caused by water or rain, whether driven by wind or not, unless the building insured * * * shall first sustain an actual damage to the roof or walls of same by the direct force of the wind, and shall then be liable only for such damage to the interior of the building * * * as may be caused by water or rain entering the building through openings in the roof or walls made by the direct action of the wind."

It was agreed that the loss and damage to the building, caused solely by the direct action of the wind, independently of water in any form whatever, was $500; further, that the loss or damage to the interior of the building, caused by water or rain entering the same through openings in the roof or walls, made by the direct action of the wind alone, independent of water in any form whatever, was $600. These items are not in controversy. It is conceded that the policy covers this damage. The item in dispute is the stipulation in the agreed statement:

"That the loss and damage to the said building, exterior and interior, resulting from the combined action of wind and water in whatever form, omitting damage to the interior included in the next preceding item of this award, was $3,352.43."

As to this last item of damage, it was agreed:

That the "committeemen appointed by the parties to this suit in pursuance of a written agreement referred to in the preceding paragraph have found that certain loss or damage resulted from the 'combined action of wind and water.' It is agreed that as to such loss or damage so found by the committeemen it is impossible to determine to what extent each was an element or factor with the other in causing such loss or damage."

The cause was tried upon stipulated agreement of facts about which no question is raised.

The trial court rendered judgment in favor of the insured for the full amount of the three items of damage above mentioned. The insurer brought the judgment for review to the Court of Civil Appeals by writ of error upon the proposition that the policy of insurance did not cover the item of damage caused by the "combined action of wind and water." The Court of Civil Appeals sustained the contention of the insurance company in this particular, and to that judgment writ of error has been granted upon two propositions made by plaintiffs in error: (a) That the Court of Civil Appeals erred in placing the burden of proof upon the insured to show that the damage in question was chargeable directly to the force of the wind; and (b) in holding that under the facts the wind was not the direct proximate and predominant cause of the damage.

By the notation before us the Supreme Court on January 11, 1918, granted the writ in the view that—

"The effect of the decision is to put upon the insured the burden of proving that the loss did not fall within the exception of the policy. The contrary in our opinion is the law."

However, it appears that thereafter the application was referred to the committee of judges, who on May 27, 1918, granted the writ with the notation that—

"The burden was on the insurance company to show that the damage fell within the exception of the policy. This it did not do. In our opinion the Court of Civil Appeals erred in not so holding."

Opinion.

We have given the question presented the most careful consideration. It appears that in Travelers' Accident Insurance Co. v. Sallie Lou Harris, on October 11, 1916, the Supreme Court granted an application for writ of error, with the notation that—

"We think the court erred in imposing upon the defendant the burden of proving that the accident was within the exceptions of the policy. 77 Tex. 225."

Thereafter this section of the Commission held that the burden of proof rested upon the insured in that case to show that her cause of action did not fall within the excepting clause, which holding was approved by the Supreme Court. 212 S. W. 933.

Paraphrasing the policy of insurance in the instant case:

It "does insure * * * against all direct loss or damage by tornado, windstorm or cyclone, except for any loss or damage caused by water or rain, whether driven by wind or not, unless the building insured * * * shall first sustain an actual damage to the roof or walls of same by the direct force of the wind, and shall then be liable only for such damage to the interior of the building * * * as may be caused by water or rain entering the building through openings in the roof or walls made by direct action of the wind, and except for any loss or damage * * * occasioned directly or indirectly by or through any * * * tidal wave, high water, overflow, or cloudburst."

In order to determine where the burden of proof rests under such policy, it is material to inquire whether under proper construction the policy insures generally against wind damage, and the excepting provisions take something out of the general contract of insurance by way of defeasance or excuse, or whether the contract covers only what is left after satisfying the conditions; that is, do the conditions and exceptions excuse or defeat the general promise, or do they limit the extent of the promise?

Without further discussion, in our opinion the contract under consideration falls clearly within the rule reannounced in Travelers' Accident Insurance Co. v. Harris, supra, and is controlled by the authority sustained by the cases cited in that opinion. In further support of this view, in addition to the authorities cited in the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals in this case, we call attention to Newark Trust Co. v. Agricultural Insurance Co., 237 Fed. 788, 150 O. C. A. 542, by the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States for the Third Circuit. In that case a contract of insurance practically identical with that under consideration, and containing the identical clauses evidencing the limitation of the promise as are those in the policy under consideration, is construed. The holding there is in accord with the settled authority of this state.

The defendant in error in a very interesting and instructive argument insists, that regardless of where the burden of proof is placed, the facts show that the damage in question must be charged to the direct action of the wind; that under the facts it is shown that the wind was the direct, proximate, and efficient cause of the damage; indeed, but for the wind, the water would not have produced the injury. It would probably be necessary to consider this question if we were not precluded by the stipulation of the parties contained in the agreed statement of facts. The fourteenth paragraph of the agreement precludes the decision of this question. It is there agreed that it is impossible to determine to what extent, in the damage caused by the combined action of wind and water, each was an element or factor with the other in causing such loss or damage. This stipulation applies directly to the item of damage in controversy. The parties at interest, having before them all of the facts which are made to appear in this record, agreed among themselves that it was impossible to determine which element, wind or water, was the direct, proximate, and efficient cause of the damage. We do not think, therefore, that it is necessary or proper to enter into a discussion of this question, since it has been removed from the consideration of the court by the stipulation in the agreement.

We therefore recommend that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended by the Commission of Appeals, but will state our views of the case.

[1] The risk insured against under the policy being "all direct loss or damage by tornado, windstorm or cyclone," and the policy expressly excepting from such risk "any loss or damage occasioned directly or indirectly by or through any * * * tidal wave * * * high water * * * overflow," and "any loss or damage caused by water or rain, whether driven by wind or not," etc., the burden of proof—had the question been material—would have been upon the plaintiffs to show that their loss was not one thus expressly excepted from the contract. Without such proof, had it been required, evidence of a loss within the terms of the contract would have been incomplete, and hence liability under the contract would not have been established. Such exceptions have not the character of conditions subsequent. They are written into the contract to prevent their subject-matter becoming confused with its general portion. Their effect is to declare that there shall be no liability under the contract which is not clear and independent of them. The burden of establishing such a liability is upon him who asserts it. The matter presented by such exceptions in a contract is therefore not defensive. In its essential nature it is affirmative. It is made so by the terms of the contract. Such is the settled rule in this court. Insurance Co. v. Co-operative Association, 77 Tex. 225, 13 S. W. 980; Insurance Co. v. Boren, 83 Tex. 97, 18 S. W. 484.

But in the present case this is an immaterial question. It is rendered so by the stipulation of the parties as to the facts.

[2] With respect to the damage here in dispute the parties have agreed that it resulted from "the combined action of wind and water," and that "it is impossible to determine to what extent each was an element or factor" in causing it. The effect of this is clearly to exclude the loss in controversy from the indemnity provided by the policy. That indemnity was only against direct loss or damage by the wind. This means, and can only mean, a loss resulting from the wind and no other cause, and fairly capable of establishment as having been so caused. It would make a different contract for the parties to say that it contemplates a loss, not directly due to the wind alone, but to the wind and an expressly excepted cause, combined, with the part for which the wind might be responsible impossible of determination and hence purely speculative. No liability could be adjudged under the policy which was not proven. The effect of the stipulation was to admit that the amount of the disputed loss attributable to the wind—the risk covered by the policy—could not be proven. If so, a loss within the contract was not established.

It may be admitted, as the plaintiffs in error urge, that the wind was the cause of the action of the water. But, as related to the loss in dispute, the contract expressly provided that the insurer was not to be responsible for any damage, whatever, due to the action of water caused by the wind. All part of the loss caused by water, though the water's action was due to the wind, is thus eliminated. Therefore, the rule invoked, that where there is no order of succession in time and there are two concurrent causes of a loss in which the damage done by each cannot be distinguished, the predominating cause will be deemed the proximate cause, can have no application. The water as a concurrent cause, or as any element in the cause, which produced the loss, is by the contract put out of the case. There is left, under the stipulation, only the wind as a part of the combined and responsible cause. The extent of its agency or the damage due to its agency, it is admitted, could not be shown. As to the part of the loss caused by the wind, there was, accordingly, no proof; and there being no proof there could be no judgment.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is affirmed.

DE SHAZO et al. v. EUBANK. (No. 141-3070.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
June 23, 1920.)

1. Public lands \Leftrightarrow 174—Certificate of occupancy issued by land commissioner cannot be collaterally attacked.

Where one owning lots in a county applied to purchase school lands as additional land, and after proof of occupancy the land commissioner issued a certificate, such certificate is not open to collateral attack on the ground that the lots were not private land, within the statute allowing the acquisition of additional land, for the commissioner is required to determine the sufficiency of the proof of occupancy, and as the statute relating to the acquisition of school land provides for payment over a long term of years, it is essential that on issuance of a certificate after proof of occupancy the title cannot be collaterally attacked.

2. Public lands \Leftrightarrow 173(5) — School lands held within statute forbidding surveyor to acquire "public land."

Within Pen. Code 1911, art. 164 making it a misdemeanor for a county surveyor to acquire "public land," school lands are "public land," though not part of the unappropriated domain; for, while the term "public land" varies in statutes, it should be given such construction as will effectuate the intent of the Legislature.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Public Land.]

3. Public lands \Leftrightarrow 173(3)—Purchaser of school lands complying with requirements has inchoate right.

A purchaser of school lands who has complied with the conditions as to occupancy and filed an affidavit thereof within proper time acquires an inchoate right to the land, which can be perfected by compliance with the further requirements of the statute, and this right is subject to sale or transfer.

4. Public lands \Leftrightarrow 173(11)—Compliance with requirements held not to divest state of title to school lands.

While a purchaser, on complying with the requirements of the statute as to occupancy of school lands and the filing of an affidavit thereof, acquires an inchoate right subject to sale or transfer, the state is not completely divested of title until all conditions of the purchase are fully complied with, and the right of the purchaser is subject to forfeiture for failure to make payment as required, etc.

5. Public lands \Leftrightarrow 173(5) — School lands are "public land" as to county surveyor, though certificate of occupancy has been granted.

Under Pen. Code 1911, art. 164, making it a misdemeanor for any county surveyor to be directly or indirectly concerned in the purchase of any "public land," the term is not limited to the unappropriated public domain, but includes school lands, and, as the issuance of a certificate of occupancy does not completely divest the state of its title, the county surveyor is incompetent to acquire the right or interest of an occupant who has not received a certificate but a patent.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Eighth Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by J. W. Eubank against Maria De Shazo and others, in which defendants filed a cross-action. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed on defendant's appeal by the Court of Civil Appeals (191 S. W. 369), and defendants bring error. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and judgment rendered that plaintiff take nothing.

W. F. Hendrix and M. W. Stanton, both of El Paso, for plaintiffs in error.

Nealon & Dorman, of El Paso, for defendant in error.

SONFIELD, P. J. The following is the statement of the case by the Court of Civil Appeals:

"Eubank filed this suit January 22, 1915, against Maria, Donald, and Kenneth De Shazo, to remove cloud from title to survey No. 218, S. F. No. 7088, H. M. Mundy, grantee, containing 160 acres, situate in El Paso county. Defendants pleaded not guilty, and filed a cross-action asserting title in themselves. Upon trial before a jury a peremptory instruction was given in plaintiff's favor, in accordance wherewith verdict was returned and judgment rendered.

"On May 5, 1908, the land in controversy was public free school land, and by application of that date, filed in the general land office May 18, 1908, E. L. De Shazo applied to purchase the same as additional to private land. Upon this application the land was awarded September 12, 1908. By quitclaim deed dated January 17, 1912, filed for record April 7, 1913, E. L. De Shazo, for a recited consideration of $250, conveyed all of his right, title, and interest in the land to Eubank. On June 20, 1912, De Shazo made his proof of occupancy and improvements, and filed same in the general land office on June 22, 1912, and on June 24, 1912, certificate of occupancy was issued and sent to De Shazo by the land commissioner. On December 18, 1913, De Shazo died intestate, leaving as his heirs the defendants herein, namely, his wife, Maria, and two children, Donald and Kenneth. On May 8, 1918, the land was patented by the state to E. L. De Shazo, his heirs and assigns. At the time he applied to purchase the land De Shazo owned and resided upon lots 1, 2, and 3 in block 21 in Grandview, an addition to and part of the city of El Paso. Grandview is a part of the Salazar grant, and is laid off into streets, lots and blocks. The addition is not within the corporate limits of the city of El Paso. The three lots had a 75-foot front. De Shazo continued to reside there until the date of his death. This was his home tract and the private land referred to in his application to the state to purchase the land in controversy. Upon the dates above mentioned and long prior thereto, Eubank was county surveyor of El Paso county."

On appeal, the Court of Civil Appeals affirmed the judgment of the district court. 191 S. W. 369.

It is contended by defendants: (1) That the lots in Grandview addition upon which De Shazo's home was situate, and where he resided during the required three years' occupancy, were not "private land," within the meaning of the law relating to the sale of school land, and that his ownership thereof and residence thereon did not authorize the purchase of school land as additional thereto; (2) at the date of the deed from De Shazo to plaintiff, though De Shazo had complied with the conditions of occupancy and improvement, he had not yet filed the proof thereof, and no certificate of occupancy or patent had issued; that the land was therefore "public land," title to which could not be acquired by plaintiff, then county surveyor, in view of article 164, Penal Code, making it a misdemeanor for any county surveyor to be directly or indirectly concerned in the purchase of any right or interest in any public lands in his own name, or in the name of any other person. The Committee of Judges to whom the application was referred, being inclined to the view that De Shazo was not authorized to purchase the school land in controversy, granted the writ.

[1] The Court of Civil Appeals declined to pass upon the status of the Grandview lots as a proper home tract authorizing the purchase of school land as additional thereto. That court held, in effect, that the commissioner, being vested with the power to make a sale and award of the land to a qualified purchaser, having determined that De Shazo was such a purchaser, as the owner of and settler upon the Grandview lots, and having actually made the sale and award, and De Shazo having complied with all the terms and conditions of his purchase, and the certificate of occupancy having issued, the sale and award cannot be regarded as a nullity and subject to collateral attack. In this conclusion we concur.

In the disposition of public school lands, it is the policy of the state to sell to actual settlers and to require actual occupancy of the land so sold. One owning other or private land is authorized to purchase school land within a certain radius as "additional land," and the occupancy of the home tract for the requisite period is regarded as an occupancy of such additional land—a constructive occupancy. To entitle one to purchase additional land, his "other" or "private land" must be of the kind and character contemplated by the statute. The actual settler upon the school land proper must make proof of occupancy thereof; where the occupancy is constructive, he must make proof of occupancy of the basic tract.

Upon the filing of proof of occupancy, a certificate thereof is issued by the land commissioner. The issuance of the certificate is not merely ministerial, the commissioner being vested with discretion in determining the facts. If satisfied that the proof of occupancy is false, or the occupancy insufficient, not in compliance with the statute, he can refuse the certificate.

"If the certificate be refused, then the title of the purchaser would be open to attack by any one who should settle upon and make application to purchase the land; but if issued it would be conclusive, except, possibly, against the state." Logan v. Curry, 95 Tex. 664, 69 S. W. 129; Mitchell v. Robison, 108 Tex. 641, 132 S. W. 465.

The matter of the sale of the land in controversy was within the jurisdiction of the land commissioner. The duty devolved upon him, before issuing the certificate of occupancy, to determine whether De Shazo owned, settled upon, and occupied for the required time other or private land of the character entitling him to purchase. This was involved in determining De Shazo's compliance with the conditions of settlement and occupancy. If the certificate of the land commissioner does not evidence an adjudication of these facts, but merely an occupancy of the basic tract, it is meaningless. The basic tract being private land owned by De Shazo, the state is concerned in its occupancy only as such occupancy affected his right to the additional land.

A purchaser of school land must, within two years after the completion of the three-year period of occupancy, make proof thereof. Patent cannot issue until the filing of such proof and the payment in full of the purchase money. When proof of occupancy has been filed, the purchaser can pay the balance of the purchase money and demand a patent, or he can pay the same in annual installments running for a period of at least 35 and up to 37 years. It is to the interest of the state, as well as of the purchasers of the school land, that the titles of such purchasers be established, at least to the extent of being invulnerable to collateral attack, at some time prior to the issuance of the patent. To permit such attacks through all the years, where the purchaser exercises his option of payment of the purchase money in annual installments, would be promotive of continuous litigation and strife. The evident intention of the Legislature in requiring proof of occupancy and the issuance of the certificate was, in the language of the court in Logan v. Curry, supra:

"To set at rest the question of actual settlement, and to establish the purchaser's right to the land, subject only to the condition that he pay the unpaid installments of purchase money and interest thereon, as required by the statute."

The purpose of the proof and certificate, when the school land itself is occupied, is to establish and evidence title to the land so occupied. Where the occupancy is of the basic tract, the purpose is to establish and evidence the purchaser's title to the additional land. In each case the certificate has the same conclusive effect.

[2-5] Was the land at the date of the purchase by plaintiff from De Shazo "public land" within the purview of article 164 of the Penal Code? The term "public land," as used in various statutes, is generally held to comprise all of the unappropriated public domain—such of the lands belonging to the state as are subject to sale or other disposal. Day Land & Cattle Co. v. State, 68 Tex. 526, 4 S. W. 865. The sense in which the term is used may vary somewhat in the different statutes, and it should be given such meaning as will effectuate the intention of the Legislature in its use. Thus, in Cotulla v. Laxson, 60 Tex. 443, it is held that the term "public land," as used in article 164 of the Penal Code, is not limited in its signification to unappropriated public domain, but also includes public school lands. With reference to this, the court says:

"These public school lands were set apart for a public purpose, devoted to the promotion of public education. The act of appropriation, or, rather, the dedication of these lands to that purpose, did not work a change in their ownership; true they were not thereafter unappropriated public domain, but as ever belonged to the public."

The purchaser of school land who has complied with the condition of settlement, and within the proper time filed his affidavit thereof, acquires an inchoate right to the land, which can be perfected by compliance with the further requirements of the statute. Canales v. Perez, 65 Tex. 291. The right so acquired is, by the express terms of the statute, subject to sale or transfer by the purchaser. Upon the completion of the required term of occupancy, the land becomes the private land of the purchaser to the extent that liens created thereon by him can be foreclosed and the land subjected to sale on execution. But the right or title of the purchaser is not then complete; it is subject to forfeiture for failure to make proof of occupancy within the specified time, or to pay the annual interest or installments of principal of the purchase money. The state is not completely divested of title until all the conditions of purchase are fully complied with. As said by the court in Williams v. Finley, 90 Tex. 468, 474, 90 S. W. 1087, 1090:

"The title remains in the state and the purchaser has only the right to acquire it by continued compliance with the conditions prescribed by the statute."

De Shazo, at the date of his conveyance to plaintiff, had not acquired the title of the state. He conveyed to plaintiff the right to acquire it by continued compliance with the statutory requirements. Whatever may have been the status of his title as to others, it is clear that, in so far as plaintiff was concerned, the land conveyed was public land, within the meaning of the article under consideration.

We are convinced that, in order to effectuate the intention of the Legislature in the use of the term "public land" in the connection in which it is used, the term should be construed to embrace public school lands in which the state has any character of title; such lands not losing the character of "public land" until there is a full and complete divestiture of the state's title.

The legislative intent in the enactment of article 164 of the Penal Code is not difficult of ascertainment. Such intention was declared in the early cases by our Supreme Court. A sound public policy requires that officers charged with duties pertaining to the public lands should not be permitted to avail themselves of information acquired through their official positions to speculate in such lands, to the detriment and disadvantage of other citizens and of the public at large. Such officers are in the nature of trustees, and, to insure against an abuse of the trust reposed in them, it is essential that they be forbidden to acquire, directly or indirectly, in their own name or in the name of another, any interest in such lands. Wills v. Abbey, 27 Tex. 202; Cotulla v. Laxson, supra; State v. Thompson, 64 Tex. 690.

As before stated, the purchase by De Shazo was subject to forfeiture. In the event of forfeiture, the land would revert and become again a part of the public domain, subject to sale and award to applicants. In such case the county surveyor would have certain duties to perform in reference thereto. It is evident that a purchase by such officer of the title of a purchaser subject to forfeiture might involve a conflict between his rights under the purchase and his duty to the state.

Inasmuch as plaintiff was incompetent, under the terms of the statute, to purchase from De Shazo, the patent issued by the state to De Shazo cannot inure to plaintiff. It follows that he has failed to show title to the land in controversy.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be reversed, and judgment here rendered that plaintiff take nothing by his suit against defendants.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

WALTON v. CORSICANA TRANSIT CO. et al. (No. 124-2999.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 23, 1920.)

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Sixth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by W. W. Walton against the Corsicana Transit Company, the Corsicana Gas & Electric Company, and the Southern Traction Company. On appeal by defendants from judgment for plaintiff, judgment against the Corsicana Gas & Electric Company was reversed and rendered, the appeal of the Transit Company was dismissed, and the judgment as to the Traction Company was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (189 S. W. 807), and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Luther A. Johnson and Richard Mays, both of Corsicana, for plaintiff in error.

McClellan & Prince and Woods & Kerr, all of Corsicana, for defendants in error.

McCLENDON, J. In the opinion of the Supreme Court the decision of the Court of Civil Appeals in this case was correct.

The opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals, reported in 189 S. W. 307, states the nature of the case and the conclusions reached by that court. We refer to that opinion.

We therefore conclude that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

Ex parte WADE et al. (No. 5883.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 16, 1920.)

Habeas corpus ~~85~~(1)—Evidence held insufficient to show relators guilty of capital crime.

Evidence in habeas corpus proceedings held insufficient to warrant the trial court's conclusion that the proof that relators, accused of homicide and seeking admission to bail, were guilty of a capital crime, justifying denial of bail, was evident.

Appeal from District Court, Waller County; J. D. Harvey, Judge.

Habeas corpus for admission to bail on behalf of Jim and Stewart Wade. From order refusing bail, relators appeal. Order reversed, and bail granted.

J. M. Mathis, of Houston, for appellants.

R. E. Hanney, of Hempstead, and Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MORROW, J. This is an appeal from an order of the district judge refusing bail. Relators are charged by complaint with the murder of Gerald Sellars. A voluminous statement of facts is before us, but the evidence will not be discussed in detail. In substance, it appears that some weeks prior to the homicide a quarrel took place between Nathan Sellars, the father of the deceased, and the relator Jim Wade. Subsequently Nathan Sellars fired at Jim Wade several shots, one of them taking effect in his back, and at the time of the homicide the record suggests the existence of ill feeling between Nathan Sellars and the relator Jim Wade. On the night preceding the difficulty in which the deceased lost his life, Jim Wade and Stewart Wade spent the night in a house belonging to Jim Wade, situated in a village in which Nathan Sellars with his family, including deceased, resided, the parties being neighbors. Early in the morning Nathan Sellars while, according to his testimony, looking for his calf, passed near the home of relators, and Jim Wade, observing him, and, as he claims, desiring to talk with Nathan Sellars with a view of reaching an understanding with him, went out of his house, informing his brother Stewart Wade of his purpose. When he reached a point about 100 yards distant from Nathan Sellars, shots were exchanged between them, each of them firing a number of times, the evidence being conflicting as to who was the aggressor, the state's testimony going to show that Jim Wade fired twice before Sellars began, the relators' testimony indicating that Sellars began to draw his gun on observing Jim Wade, and that they fired the first shot about the same time. Neither of them was injured, but during the duel the wife of Nathan Sellars called to her son, the deceased, and told him they were shooting his father. The deceased, arming himself, left the house, and was met by the relator Stewart Wade. As they met, according to the testimony of both the state and the relators, Stewart Wade said to deceased: "Let's not have anything to do with this. We are too good friends." There is a conflict as to the remainder of the conversation, but the evidence is undisputed that both began firing, deceased stepping behind a barn, from which he fired a number of shots, both of the relators, according to some of the testimony, engaging in the conflict with him, and he finally received two wounds, from one of which he later died.

The state, relying upon various circumstances, advances the theory that the record discloses against the relators conspiracy and premeditation. Stewart Wade contends that the evidence points to no wrongful participation in the conflict on his part, insisting that he but responded to the aggressive acts of the deceased. On the undisputed facts there are inferences that might be drawn by a jury favorable to the relators, and on the facts not undisputed there is a conflict of evidence such as on the whole record did not warrant the conclusion by the trial judge that the proof that relators were guilty of a capital crime was evident.

The order denying bail is therefore reversed, and bail granted to each of the relators in the sum of $10,000, upon the making of which under the terms of law with sufficient surety their discharge is ordered.

HELLMAN v. STATE. (No. 5853.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 9, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §1086(1)—Record not reviewable when matters preliminary to judgment of conviction are not shown in record.

Where record showed, "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty and assess his punishment. * * * G., Foreman"—followed by an order adjudging him guilty as found by the jury, etc., there was no such judgment shown to have been entered as is required by Code Cr. Proc. 1911, art. 853, where it failed to show that appellant entered any plea, or that a jury was impeached, or any of such preliminary matters required by such statute.

2. Criminal law §1086(13)—Appellate court acquires no jurisdiction in absence of showing of entry of proper judgment.

The appellate court acquires no jurisdiction of an appeal where the record does not show entry of a judgment in compliance with 1911, art. 853.

Appeal from Matagorda County Court; John F. Perry, Judge.

J. Hellman was convicted of a violation of the pistol law, and appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Matt Cramer, of Bay City, for appellant. Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This appeal is prosecuted from a conviction for violation of the pistol law.

[1, 2] A motion to dismiss the appeal is made on the ground that the record does not show a judgment. The only attempt at a judgment in the record is found in the following language:

"We, the jury, find the defendant J. Hellman guilty, and assess his punishment at $100.00 fine and costs. G. S. Gideon, Foreman."

Then follows the order of the court adjudging him guilty of carrying a pistol as found by the jury, etc. It will be noticed that it fails to show that appellant entered any plea, or that a jury was impeached, or any of those preliminary matters required by the statute which precedes the rendition of a verdict. C. C. P. art. 853. This judgment as presented is not in accord with the statute. Without a judgment the jurisdiction of this court does not attach. We are therefore of opinion that the motion of the Assistant Attorney General is well taken and is sustained.

The appeal is dismissed.

HENDRIX v. STATE. (No. 5856.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 9, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 25, 1920.)

1. Burglary §46(8)—Defendant's testimony held not to require instruction on reasonable explanation of possession of stolen property on first opportunity.

Where defendant, when arrested on charge of burglary, was silent as to his possession of the goods, his testimony that later, while in jail he was asked for money taken, and returned it, and offered to return the clothes, saying they were given to him by his companion, who was there in jail, it was not error to refuse an instruction on reasonable explanation of his possession at first opportunity.

2. Burglary §46(7) — Instructions held to sufficiently present defendant's theory of non-participation.

Instructions that, if defendant's companion burglarized a residence, and if there was a reasonable doubt whether defendant was not present and did not participate, he should be acquitted, though he afterwards came into possession of some of the stolen property, held to sufficiently present defendant's theory that he did not participate.

Appeal from District Court, Ellis County; F. L. Hawkins, Judge.

W. H. Hendrix was convicted of burglary of a residence, and appeals. Affirmed.

Adair Dyer, of Ennis, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of burglary of a private residence and allotted five years in the penitentiary.

This is a case of circumstantial evidence. Davis and appellant were traveling in an auto through Ellis county from the city of Dallas to the city of Temple. En route they camped near the residence of W. B. Banks for two or three days. The reason assigned for this by appellant's testimony is that when they reached that point the gasoline tank of their auto "sprung a leak and they were out of gasoline"; their purpose being to repair the car and secure gasoline. While there Banks' residence was burglarized. Appellant and Davis were arrested; appellant being found in possession of some of the stolen property. His testimony is to the effect that he did not steal the goods or enter the house, and knew nothing of it until after he had received the goods from Davis; that Davis left the car, the casing of which appellant was repairing, for the purpose of securing gasoline, and on his return had the stolen goods, and gave him some of them; that he knew nothing of the burglary, had no connection with it, and was not aware the goods were stolen. The state's evidence is sufficient to sustain the conviction. It is not deemed necessary to detail it.

[1] Appellant asked and was refused a charge to the effect that if appellant, when his possession was first challenged, gave an account which was reasonable and probably true, or there was a reasonable doubt of it, the jury should acquit. He also excepted to the court's charge, because it did not submit this issue. The facts upon which appellant's requested charge is based are recited by him in his bill of exceptions No. 2, as follows:

"When I was arrested out there, no one asked me anything about the stuff, and I didn't say anything about it. I remember Mr. Banks coming to see me at the jail. He called me over to the door, and I went over to the door, and he asked for the money, and I gave him the money that was in the pockets. There was about 30 cents. That was about all Mr. Banks said to me. Well, Mr. Banks said that he didn't want the clothes; he didn't need them. I offered him the clothes. I asked him if they were his clothes; if they were, I would give them to him. I told him that I got the clothes from Davis. Davis was there in the jail at the time."

As we understand the doctrine of reasonable explanation, this testimony does not bring the question within that rule. His statement excludes the idea that he gave an account of it on the first opportunity. He says that, when he was arrested, no one asked him anything about the stuff, and he himself did not say anything about it. When he was arrested, charged with this offense, it was called to his attention. His right to possession of the property was then called in question. This was not within the doctrine of reasonable account of possession of stolen property.

[2] Appellant testified on the trial substantially as his statement above quoted. The court charged the jury with reference to this, if they should find from the evidence that Davis burglarized the private residence of Banks, but that the defendant was not present and participating with him at the time, or if the jury should have a reasonable doubt upon this issue, it would be their duty to acquit defendant of the charge of burglary, although they may believe from the evidence that he afterwards came into possession of some of the property taken from the alleged burglarized house, and was in possession of the same at the time of his arrest. This we understand was his testimony upon the trial and his theory of the case. The court also gave appellant's requested instruction to the effect that if Davis burglarized the house of Banks, and appellant at the time remained in an automobile or on the road, and waited for Davis, and did not take any part in the burglary, and did not in any way assist in the perpetration of the same, and was not present encouraging such perpetration, or if the jury should have a reasonable doubt as to whether such facts are true or not, then in such event they should find appellant not guilty. These charges aptly and pertinently applied the law to the facts of this case, and give defendant the full benefit of all that he claimed with reference to his connection or want of connection with the burglary of the house and possession of the goods that came from it. This is practically the only question presented by appellant's appeal.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment will be affirmed.

ALARCAN v. STATE. (No. 5351.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 9, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §1086(14)—Denial of continuance not reviewed, where record does not show reservation of exception.

A ruling refusing an application for a continuance will not be reviewed, where the record fails to show an exception reserved.

2. Criminal law §1159(5)—Finding that value of property exceeded $50 not disturbed.

The appellate court will not disturb a conviction for theft of property over the value of $50, because the jury believed the state's evidence as to the value of the property to the exclusion of defendant's testimony, where the state's evidence would justify the conclusion of the jury.

3. Larceny §64(7)—Conviction sustained by evidence.

In a prosecution for theft of property over the value of $50, evidence held to warrant the jury in concluding that defendant was the person who took the property, notwithstanding defendant's explanation of his possession of the stolen goods.

Appeal from District Court, Ellis County; F. L. Hawkins, Judge.

Micario Alarcán was convicted of theft, and appeals. Affirmed.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This conviction was for theft of property over the value of $50.

[1] The application for continuance will not be considered because the record fails to show an exception reserved to the ruling of the court refusing it. Branch's Ann. P. C. p. 183, for collation of many cases.

It is contended that the evidence is not sufficient to support the conviction:

[2] 1. That the facts do not show the value of the property to be in excess of $50. This was a controverted issue upon the trial, defendant introducing such evidence, if the jury believed it, to have authorized the conviction of appellant for a misdemeanor theft. The state's evidence justified the jury in concluding that the property was worth over $50. We do not feel justified in reversing a judgment because the jury believed the state's evidence to the exclusion of defendant's testimony, where the state's evidence would justify the conclusion of the jury.

[3] 2. It is contended the evidence is not sufficient to connect the defendant with the burglary of the house from which the property found in his possession was taken. This is a case of circumstantial evidence. It is uncontroverted that the house was entered and the property taken; that the property taken was in a trunk, which was closed and fastened by its owner; that the residents were away from the house for some days, and during their absence the house was entered, the trunk broken, and the property taken. About the 25th of December, 1919, appellant carried quite a lot of the stolen property in a suit case to the restaurant of Alberta Perez and left it. This was very early in the morning. Mrs. Perez had just gotten up, but her husband was still in bed. This is an uncontroverted fact, testified by all the witnesses who testified in regard to the matter, including appellant. Appellant accounted for his possession of the property by testifying and making statements to the same effect, that about 11 or 12 o'clock at night, prior to the morning he left the suit case at Perez's restaurant, an unknown Mexican came to him, having the grip in possession, and asked him to keep it until he went to and returned from Dallas, which would be about a week; that he took the grip, which contained the stolen property, and early the next morning carried it to the Perez restaurant and left it, and had not gone back to the restaurant from that time until his arrest, which occurred a few days later. He made a statement to the same effect when his possession of it was challenged. He further testified he had never seen the Mexican before, and did not know him, and had not seen him since, but that if the Mexican was shown to him he thought he would recognize him. So far as we understand this record appellant made no attempt to get this Mexican, or to show his presence at the time and place or in the town of Ennis where this burglary was committed. He denied entering the house or stealing the goods. Quite a lot of personal property taken from the house was inclosed in the suit case, the suit case itself being part of the stolen property. Some of the goods taken were not recovered. Appellant says he knew nothing of the contents of the grip. Among other things not recovered was a wrist watch. The case summed up seems to thus present itself: A burglary was committed and property stolen. Appellant is found in possession of the property early the next morning; he leaves it at a restaurant without making any statement, but later, when challenged, says that it was left with him by an unknown Mexican who was leaving the country. We are of opinion this evidence is sufficient to overcome the reasonableness of appellant's explanation; at least that the jury was justified in disbelieving his explanation. We think, under this evidence, this judgment should be affirmed; and it is accordingly so ordered.

MITCHELL v. STATE. (No. 5810.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 5, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, June 23, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §542—Former testimony of deceased witness admissible on second trial.

On the second trial of a homicide case, the former testimony of decedent's wife, who died before the second trial, was properly admitted.

2. Criminal law §547(1)—Former testimony of deceased witness provable by agreed statement used on appeal in former case.

Where the stenographer testified to the correct transcription of her lost notes of testimony of former trial, and that the narrative statement of a deceased witness offered in the second trial was correct, and the statement of facts was agreed on as correct on appeal in the first trial, the statement was admissible to prove the former testimony of such witness.

3. Criminal law §614(1)—Second continuance properly refused for no diligence and for cumulative character of expected testimony.

A second continuance was properly refused, where no diligence was shown to secure the witness, and other witnesses testified to the facts expected to be testified to by the absent witness.

4. Witnesses §380(3) — Statement by deceased witness admissible to contradict her former testimony admitted on second trial.

Evidence of a contradictory statement by a deceased witness should have been allowed to impeach her testimony admitted on a second trial as against objection of no predicate and that former testimony of the impeaching witness contained no such impeachment.

5. Criminal law §1170(2)—Rejection of evidence of contradictory statement of former testimony used on second trial held harmless error.

On second trial of a homicide case, error in rejecting a contradictory statement of a deceased witness, whose former testimony was used, and which stated that no pistol was found on decedent, her husband, was harmless, in view of cumulative evidence contradicting her, and failure of such contradictory evidence to justify defendant in striking deceased.

On Motion for Rehearing.

6. Criminal law §614(3) — Application for second continuance for absent witness must show diligence.

It is incumbent on applicant for a second continuance for absent witness to allege or show what diligence has been exercised.

7. Criminal law §1144(7)—Application for continuance presumed a subsequent one.

In absence of an affirmative showing that an application for continuance is the first, it is presumed that it is a subsequent application.

8. Witnesses §67—Defendant's attorney was competent witness to prove agreed statement showing former testimony of a deceased witness.

Defendant's attorney might, when called by the state, testify to the authenticity of an agreed statement of a former trial containing testimony of a witness since deceased.

9. Homicide §332(2)—Finding supported by evidence of deadly character of weapon used will be upheld.

Unless it affirmatively appears that there was no evidence supporting the jury's finding as to the deadly character of the weapon used, or that such finding is against the weight of the testimony, it will be upheld.

Appeal from District Court, Limestone County; A. M. Blackmon, Judge.

W. H. Mitchell was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Tucker, of Thornton, Wm. Kennedy, James Kimbell, and W. T. Jackson, all of Groesbeck, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LATTIMORE, J. Appellant was tried in the district court of Limestone county on a charge of murder, was convicted of manslaughter, and his punishment fixed at five years in the penitentiary. This is the second appeal of this case. See 209 S. W. 743.

Deceased and appellant married sisters, and from the testimony of several witnesses it appears that they had been hostile toward each other for some time, but that on the night of the homicide appellant and his family came to a public dance and ice cream supper at the home of deceased. Some time after midnight deceased and a son of appellant seem to have engaged in some kind of wordy altercation out in the yard, at some stage of which the appellant hastily approached deceased and struck him on the head with the breast yoke of a wagon, which blow caused the death of deceased some time during the day following. The evidence presents sharply conflicting stories, as same comes from the witnesses for the state or the appellant; but these matters of conflict have been settled by the jury, and the record contains ample facts upon which to predicate this conviction.

[1] The wife of deceased was a witness upon a former trial of the case, but has since died. The state was permitted, over objection, to introduce her testimony on the instant trial, as given upon said former hearing. The objection to this matter, as presented by appellant's bill of exceptions, has so often been before this court, and by it analyzed, and the authorities collated and reviewed, that any further discussion now would be repetition. We adhere to the rule that such evidence, when properly proven up, is admissible. Dowd v. State, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 563, 108 S. W. 389; Nixon v. State, 53 Tex. Cr. R. 325, 109 S. W. 931; Porch v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. R. 7, 99 S. W. 1122; Robertson v. State, 63 Tex. Cr. R. 216, 142 S. W. 533, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 440; Sweat v. State, 77 Tex. Cr. R. 287, 178 S. W. 554.

[2] Objection was made to the introduction of said testimony, because the original notebooks used by the stenographer in taking down the testimony were lost. The stenographer testified that her notes were correctly transcribed, and that the narrative statement of the said deceased witness, which was offered in evidence in the instant case, was correct and true. It was also shown that the statement of facts was agreed upon as correct, upon the appeal from the former conviction had at said former trial. There is no prescribed method or rule for reproducing testimony given at a former hearing, and it may be given by the stenographer, or other persons who heard it, and are able to affirm the correctness of the reproduction offered. Pace v. State, 69 Tex. Cr. R. 27, 153 S. W. 132; Roquemore v. State, 59 Tex. Cr. R. 568, 129 S. W. 1120; Cornelius v. State, 54 Tex. Cr. R. 173, 112 S. W. 1050.

[3] An application for continuance was made by appellant. The absent witnesses were Mrs. Alma Williams, Ura Bailey, and Clarence Johnson. The two latter appeared during the trial and testified in the case. This was a second application, and we think no diligence is shown to secure the attendance of Mrs. Alma Williams, and that it also appears that the same facts stated as expectant from her were given in evidence by several other witnesses.

[4] Error is based on the refusal of the trial court to permit appellant to prove by Jim Walts that the wife of deceased, Mrs. Jordan, whose testimony had been reproduced by the state, had made a statement to him the next morning after the homicide, contradictory of her testimony as given on the former trial, and as reproduced on the instant hearing. It appears that this testimony was refused, because no predicate was laid for impeachment, and because the testimony of said Walts, as presented on the former trial in the shape of an affidavit, contained no such testimony as appears in the statement now sought to be elicited from him, impeaching the testimony of Mrs. Jordan. The appellant wished to prove by Walts that on the morning after the homicide Mrs. Jordan told him that she had taken a pistol off the body of her husband shortly after he was struck by appellant the fatal blow. The testimony was rejected for the reason stated. This testimony should have been admitted. Lyles v. State, 64 Tex. Cr. R. 621, 142 S. W. 592;

Hamblin v. State, 84 Tex. Cr. R. 368, 90 S. W. 1075.

[5] However, we are of opinion that its rejection in the instant case was harmless error. The only purpose of such testimony would have been to contradict or impeach Mrs. Jordan. Looking to her testimony as given on this trial, we find that she stated positively that she did not remove a pistol from her husband's bosom the night he was killed, and did not take any from his body; that her husband had no pistol on that night; that he owned no pistol. She further stated that John Mitchell found a pistol the next morning outside their fence, but it did not belong to her husband. Looking to the testimony of said witness Walts, it will be observed that he swore positively to seeing deceased with a pistol shortly before the fatal blow was struck, and directly afterwards he saw that same pistol in possession of Mrs. Jordan, and that he saw it in her hands the next morning. From the testimony of Felton Carroll and Evie Sanders it also appears that they testified fully for appellant, stating that Mrs. Jordan had a pistol that night, which came off the body of her husband, and which they were directed by her to take from his body. In other words, the record discloses that appellant introduced numerous witnesses whose testimony was wholly contradictory to that of Mrs. Jordan, and put her in the attitude of being impeached as completely as would the added statement of said witness Walts that she told him that she took the pistol from the body of her husband.

We think the error harmless, for the further reason that, if Mrs. Jordan had stated to the witness Walts that she had taken said pistol from the body of her husband, it would have afforded no justification for the act of appellant in striking deceased, as appellant did not claim himself, nor did any one for him claim, that appellant saw any pistol in possession of deceased before striking him. Appellant stated that deceased and the son of appellant were quarreling, and that deceased called the boy a "long-legged son of a bitch," and stated that he was going to kill him. Appellant said that, when he called his son this name and made this threat, deceased threw his hand back to his hip, and he thought that he had a pistol; that he was excited, and struck in defense of his boy. The trial court fully charged on appellant's right to act in defense of his son, whether the danger was real or only apparent, and no exceptions were taken to the court's charge. So, in view of the fact that appellant had the full benefit of abundant testimony contradictory of Mrs. Jordan's testimony regarding said pistol, and that at least half a dozen witnesses for him testified that deceased had a pistol on the occasion in question, we conclude that no possible harm could have resulted from the error of the trial court in refusing said impeaching testimony of said witness Jim Waits.

Having disposed of the various questions raised in this bill, and finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment of the trial court will be affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

[6] This case was affirmed at a former day of this term, and is before us on appellant's motion for rehearing. It is urged in said motion that the application for continuance, made when the case was called for trial, should have been granted, because of the absence of Mrs. Alma Williams. Again examining the record in reference thereto, we find that said application contains no showing of any diligence whatever to secure the presence of said witness. The instant trial began January 26, 1920. The indictment shows to have been returned September 4, 1918, a year and a half before this trial. No subpoenas are attached to the motion, or appear in the record, and the one only statement in said application as to diligence is that "said witness had been duly subpoenaed." It is not stated that she was in attendance upon court at any time, nor that she had ever before disobeyed process, nor when the subpoena was issued. It is the plain duty of one asking for a continuance to place in the application such allegations, or make such showing, as that the trial court and this court may know what diligence has been used. Massie v. State, 30 Tex. App. 64, 16 S. W. 770; Isham v. State, 49 S. W. 594; King v. State, 67 Tex. Cr. R. 63, 148 S. W. 325.

[7] Appellant states in his motion that said application was the first one, but no such statement anywhere appears in the record. On the contrary, the bill of exceptions reserved to the action of the trial court in overruling this application states that it was a second application. This court has held that, in the absence of some affirmative showing that the application for continuance is the first one, it will be presumed to be a subsequent application. Branch's Ann. P. C. vol. 1, § 313.

[8] Error was also urged originally upon the ground that the trial court should not have permitted the state to put on one of appellant's counsel as a witness, and to prove by him that the carbon copy, which Miss Dierlam, the official court reporter had identified as a true statement of the testimony of the deceased witness, Mrs. Jordan, was a true copy of the statement of facts as agreed to by both parties and approved by the court upon the former trial. Neither as originally presented, nor in this motion, are we cited to any authority upholding this contention. The fact that the witness was an attorney of the accused was not a valid objection. Section 345, Branch's Penal Code, vol. 1. Miss Dierlam, the official court reporter, had earlier testified that she took down the testimony of the deceased witness upon a former trial in shorthand; that she had searched for her original notes, but that they were lost; that she made a careful and accurate transcription of said notes of the former trial; and that the copy showed her, which was the same one shown the witness Jackson, attorney for appellant, was an exact carbon copy of such transcript; and she stated, after having read the statement, that the matter refreshed her memory, and that also by referring to her independent recollection, she was able to state that the same contained a true statement of the deceased witness. In this condition of the record, we do not think it error to permit the witness Miss Dierlam, and the witness Jackson, to testify that the copy identified was a true copy of the statement of facts, in so far as the testimony of Mrs. Jordan went. The original stenographic record was lost. If it had been in existence, Miss Dierlam's statement of its contents would have been uncontrovertible. If the copy did not speak the truth, appellant had every opportunity and right to assail same. No error appears in overruling this objection.

We have reviewed the facts of the case, and adhere to our former ruling that the rejection of the testimony of the witness Waits was harmless error.

[9] It is further insisted that the evidence was not sufficient to support the verdict, because of the lack of testimony showing that the breastyoke, with which appellant struck the fatal blow, was a deadly weapon, or such weapon as was reasonably calculated to produce death, and further that the weight of said breastyoke was not shown. The court duly defined to the jury a deadly weapon, and required them to believe that it was such a weapon, and that from its character, or the manner of its use, etc., by appellant, it was reasonably calculated to inflict death, and no exception to this charge appears in the record. In this same connection, and as a part of said definition, the court specifically told the jury that, if the instrument used was one not likely to cause death, it would not be presumed that death was intended. The breastyoke was that of an ordinary farm wagon. Appellant admitted that he struck deceased one blow on the head with same, further admitting that he may have used both hands. The blow was such as to render deceased unconscious, and he never at any time recovered consciousness before his death the day following. The physician said this blow caused the death of deceased; that it was a tolerably large wound, and cut through the flesh and muscles to the bone, and it seemed to him to make a dent on the skull. No requested charge on the character of the weapon was asked, or can be found in the record.

Our statute (article 1082, Branch's Ann. P. C.) states that, if the death of deceased unquestionably resulted from the injury inflicted by the accused, the case is one of homicide. The trial court submitted both grades of homicide in a manner apparently satisfactory to the accused. With this charge before them, and probably remembering that the state's testimony showed that at the time appellant struck the deceased, the wife of the latter had hold of his hands, and was pulling him away from where appellant was, the jury declined to believe, or find him guilty of any lower grade of homicide than murder. The question of what is a deadly weapon is one of fact for the jury, under appropriate instructions of the court, and unless it affirmatively appear that there was no evidence supporting their finding, or that such finding is against the weight of the testimony, we will uphold the action of the trial court in refusing a new trial, based on the insufficiency of the testimony.

The motion for rehearing will be overruled.

GREER v. STATE. (No. 5450.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 2, 1920. State's Rehearing Denied June 25, 1920.)

Criminal law §369(8)—Prior acts of intercourse not provable.

In prosecution of father for rape committed upon his daughter, under 15, evidence of prior acts of intercourse between the parties held inadmissible.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; W. S. Anderson, Judge.

O. H. Greer was convicted of rape on his daughter, and appeals. Reversed and cause remanded.

W. C. Linden and Joe H. H. Graham, both of San Antonio, for appellant.

E. A. Berry, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of rape upon his daughter, a girl just under 15 years of age, and allotted 20 years in the penitentiary.

There was no exception reserved to the court's charge, and several of the bills are so qualified by the judge that they present no reversible error. They are not therefore discussed.

By a bill of exceptions the question is presented that the court erred in admitting evidence of prior acts of intercourse between the father and daughter, running back for 5 or 6 years, some occurring at Beaumont, some in Williamson county, and some in San Antonio. The details of these acts are unnecessary to be stated. Appellant objected on various grounds. The court signs the bill of exceptions with the statement that he admitted these acts under the holding of this court in Hamilton v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 372, 37 S. W. 431. The Hamilton Case was overruled in Barnett v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 593, 73 S. W. 399, 100 Am. St. Rep. 873. The rule laid down in the Barnett Case seems to have been generally followed. See Hackney v. State, 74 S. W. 556; Smith v. State, 74 S. W. 557; Wiggins v. State, 47 Tex. Cr. R. 541, 84 S. W. 821; Clifton v. State, 46 Tex. Cr. R. 22, 79 S. W. 824, 108 Am. St. Rep. 983. The same rule with reference to burglary has been followed in a number of cases (see Glenn v. State, 76 S. W. 758), and the same rule applied in arson (see Smith v. State, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 81, 105 S. W. 501), and incest (Skidmore v. State, 57 Tex. Cr. R. 507, 123 S. W. 1129, 26 L. R. A. [N. S.] 466; Pridemore v. State, 59 Tex. Cr. R. 563, 129 S. W. 1112; Bohannon v. State, 204 S. W. 1166). The general proposition is thus correctly stated:

"On a trial for rape where the prosecutrix is under the age of consent, testimony of former acts of intercourse are not admissible unless it has some unmistakable bearing on the case and tends to solve some issue in the case."

There may be and are cases arising where extraneous crimes and acts are permissible. Under such circumstances they are only admissible to explain some pertinent fact in the case such as res gestæ, showing intent, or to connect defendant with the matter under investigation. These acts are not admissible under any of the exceptions. The issue was fairly and squarely made in the case by the state that the act was committed as set out in the indictment by positive evidence of the girl with some sustaining evidence from other witnesses. The defendant, taking the stand in his own behalf, denied the intercourse. The prior acts as testified by the girl could not, therefore, be used under any of the exceptions to the general rule. They are not res gestæ, because some of them occurred years before, and all of them occurred some time prior to the particular act for which appellant was tried. There could be no question of intent. The testimony of the girl with reference to prior acts did not connect the defendant with this act. The best that could be said of this was that if appellant may have committed prior acts, therefore he may probably have committed the act charged in this case, but this character of evidence is not brought within the exceptions. Her corroboration, if it be sought to be used for that purpose, was of no greater cogency than her testimony in regard to this particular act. Incest is a crime not of a continuous nature, but each incestuous act would constitute a separate offense for which the party might be punished, and is analogous on this phase of the law to rape. Under the state's view of this case appellant could have been tried for incest or rape. She was his daughter, and any act committed upon her when she was under 15 years of age would constitute either rape or incest, the difference being that the age limit does not apply to incest, whereas it does to rape without consent where the girl is under 15. We are of opinion that the evidence of the prior acts was inadmissible under this record.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

JOBE et al. v. PATTON et al. (No. 2242.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
June 20, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 24, 1920.)

1. Husband and wife \S 249—Burden of proof on children claiming as heirs of mother to show adverse possession completed before her death.

Plaintiffs suing as heirs of their mother, claiming she had title by limitations, had the burden of showing that her possession was adverse within the statute, also that it had continued as long as 10 years before the mother died, since possession of father after her death could not help plaintiffs, for, if adverse possession commenced by a husband and his wife has not continued long enough before the death of one occurs, and if the survivor continues such possession until the statutory title is complete, the title does not vest in the community estate, but vests in the survivor, and becomes part of his separate estate.

2. Appeal and error \S 1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Where finding of court on conflicting evidence as to adverse possession could not be said not to have support in the evidence, it is conclusive.

Appeal from District Court, Wood County;
J. R. Warren, Judge.

Suit by J. J. Jobe and others against A. Patton and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

M. D. Carlock, of Winnsboro, for appellants.

E. A. Tharp and Jones & Jones, all of Mineola, for appellees.

WILLSON, C. J. Appellants were the plaintiffs below. They were the children of Seaborn Jobe and his wife, Tildy. The latter died prior to 1901. Appellants' suit was against A. Patton. They claimed title to the east half of the C. R. Patton 320-acre survey in Wood county by force of the statute of limitations of 10 years. In their petition appellants alleged that Patton was setting up some kind of claim to the land, and that the claim was a cloud on their title. They prayed for "judgment forever quieting them in their title," and for a writ of injunction "enjoining the said A. Patton asserting any claim or title to the land." Pending a trial of the suit Patton died intestate, and appellees, his only heirs, became parties defendant, filing an answer consisting of a general denial, a plea of not guilty, and a plea in the nature of a cross-action, in which they prayed judgment for the land. The appeal is from a judgment that appellants take nothing by their suit and that the title and interest they had in the land be divested out of them and vested in appellees.

The trial was to the court without a jury. The contention on the part of appellants was that the land belonged to the community estate between Seaborn Jobe and his wife, Tildy, and, she having died intestate, that they, as her children and only heirs, owned her part of it. In support of their contention appellants undertook to prove that during the lifetime of Tildy she and Seaborn had adverse possession of the land within the meaning of the 10-year statute of limitation long enough to vest title thereto in said community estate. Contentions on the part of appellees were that the possession Seaborn and Tildy had was not "adverse" within the meaning of the statute, and, moreover, if it was, that Tildy died before it had continued as long as 10 years.

Eight of the nine assignments in appellants' brief are predicated on the action of the trial court in admitting testimony appellants objected to. The contention presented by the other one is that the testimony did not warrant a finding that appellees had title to the land. In the view we take of the case, the assignments need not be considered; for, if they were sustained, the judgment should not therefore be reversed. The burden was on appellants to prove that they had the title to the land, and we think the trial court had a right to say they failed to discharge the burden. If they did, of course they were not entitled to recover, and are not entitled to a reversal of the judgment in appellees' favor, notwithstanding the trial court may have erred in admitting the testimony they objected to, and notwithstanding it may not have appeared that appellees had title to the land.

[1] Appellants did not claim they had title to the land in any other way than as heirs of their mother, and they did not claim that she had title otherwise than by force of the statute of limitations of ten years. The burden was on them to show not only that the possession Seaborn and Tildy had of the land was "adverse" within the meaning of the statute, but also that it had continued as long as ten years before Tildy died; for possession continued by Seaborn after her death would not help appellants' case. It seems to be settled, if adverse possession contemplated by the statute of limitations commenced by a husband and his wife has not continued long enough to vest the title before the death of one of them occurs, and if the survivor continues such possession until the statutory period is complete, the title does not vest in the community estate, but vests in the survivor and becomes a part of his separate estate. Sauvage v. Wauhup, 143 S. W. 259; Cook v. Oil Co., 154 S. W. 279; Brown v. Lumber Co., 178 S. W. 787; Simpson v. Oats, 102 Tex. 186, 114 S. W. 105.

[2] We have read the testimony in the record. If it should be conceded, and we do not say it should be, that it appeared as a matter of law that appellants discharged the burden on them so far as it was to prove that the possession of Seaborn and Tildy was "adverse," it certainly cannot be said the testimony was so conclusive of the fact as to require the court to find that the possession by Seaborn and Tildy continued as long as 10 years. The testimony with respect to that feature of the case was conflicting, and, moreover, the part of it adduced by appellants to support their contention was uncertain as to the time when the possession commenced and as to the time when Tildy died. The testimony would have supported a finding either that the possession had or that it had not continued during the life of Tildy long enough to perfect the title in the community estate between her and Seaborn. That being the state of the case before the trial court, we cannot say he erred when he made the finding involved in the judgment that Tildy died before the 10 years' possession necessary to vest the title was complete. Therefore the judgment will be affirmed.

COMPTON et al. v. FRANKS. (No. 6160.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Austin.
April 14, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 9, 1920.)

1. Tenancy in common §53—Co-owners held not bound by misrepresentations of another owner.

Where a father and children were entitled to undivided interests in land, and, sale having been negotiated, the father without authority from his children undertook to point out the premises sold, his representations are not binding on the children, and the deed which clearly described the premises, but did not include a portion of the lands pointed out, will not be reformed as to them.

2. Appeal and error §1033(5) — Where charges were unduly favorable to defendant, held that he could not complain of conflicts therein.

Where the main charge was unduly favorable to defendant, and the special charge contained no affirmative error, defendant's assignment complaining of conflict between the two will be overruled.

3. Reformation of instruments §43—Defendant seeking reformation of deed has burden of proof.

Defendant, who by cross-action seeks reformation of a deed, has the burden of proof.

4. Covenants §100(5)—Covenant of warranty not breached because land pointed out was not included in the deed.

While, if one sells land which he does not own, the purchaser may obtain relief in equity for damages which he has suffered, yet, if the seller makes a deed which by its terms does not include some of the land pointed out, the purchaser cannot recover upon the warranty; for it is only where there is failure of title to part of the land which the deed purports to convey that the covenant of warranty is broken.

Appeal from District Court, Coryell County; J. H. Arnold, Judge.

Action by John Y. Franks against H. S. Compton and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Mears & Watkins, of Gatesville, for appellants.

McClellan & McClellen, of Gatesville, for appellee.

JENKINS, J. D. R. Franks, as the survivor of the community estate of himself and deceased wife, and her children were the owners each of an undivided one-half interest in about 200 acres in the Clayton survey, and also the land lying east and adjoining said survey. Franks and his children executed to L. E. Todd a warranty deed conveying 200 acres of the Clayton survey, describing the east boundary line of the land so conveyed as the east boundary line of said survey. Todd took possession of a strip of land lying east of the Clayton survey, which he subsequently sold to one Farmer, and Farmer sold the same to appellant Compton. Appellee, John Y. Franks, was one of the children of D. R. Franks and wife, and he, after the death of his father, purchased the interest of the other children in the land lying east of the Clayton survey. He brought this suit to recover the strip of land east of the Clayton survey, of which Todd had taken possession, describing the same by metes and bounds.

Appellant Compton, in addition to general denial and plea of not guilty, alleged that the land in controversy was sold to him by appellant Farmer, and that the same was sold to Farmer by appellant Todd, and that the same was sold to Todd by Franks and his children. He alleged that Franks pointed out the land in controversy as being within the boundaries of the Clayton survey, and as the land sold to Todd.

Appellee denied these allegations, but alleged the truth to be that D. R. Franks informed Todd at the time said land was sold to him that he did not know exactly where the east line of the Clayton survey was, that he would either have the same surveyed, and sell it to him at $75 an acre, or that he might take the tract, supposed to contain 200 acres, at $15,000, and that Todd accepted the proposition last above stated. Appellee also pleaded the four-year statute of limitation.

The children of D. R. Franks other than appellant were made parties on their warranties, and judgment was sought against all of said children on their warranty deed to Todd.

Appellant Compton prayed that the deed from Franks and his children be reformed so as to include the land in controversy; the same being alleged to be the land actually pointed out and sold to Todd by Franks, Sr.

The court sustained exception as to the parties who were sought to be made liable upon their warranty. The issue as to limitation was not submitted to the jury.

In its main charge the court, after clearly defining the issues as made by the pleadings, instructed the jury, in substance, that if the land sold by D. R. Franks to L. E. Todd was correctly described in the deed, they would return a verdict for the plaintiff, but that, on the other hand, if they found that D. R. Franks pointed out the lines of the land that he was selling to Todd, and that such lines included the land in controversy, they would find for appellants.

[1] The court, at the request of appellee, gave the jury a special charge, in which it informed them that, where a party selling land goes upon the ground and points out the lines of the same, and thereafter a deed is executed to such land, which, by mistake, does not include the land so pointed out, such deed may be reformed, if such mistake was mutual to all parties.

Appellants assign error upon the action of the court in giving this special charge, and under said assignment submit the following proposition, to wit:

"A father and ten children, where the father owns an undivided one-half of the land conveyed, and the children own the other undivided one-half, and the father goes upon the land with the purchaser, points out the land, sells same, and puts the purchaser in possession of the land, and the consideration is paid by the purchaser, and each of the grantors to the deed accepts the consideration paid in proportion to their respective interests, the same is binding upon each grantor; and if there was a mutual mistake between Dave Franks, Sr., and L. E. Todd as to the description of the land in the deed, the said deed could be reformed without all of the grantors at the time actually knowing of the mistake in the deed."

We do not think this is a sound proposition. If an owner of an undivided interest in land points out supposed lines of the land intended to be sold, and a deed is thereafter executed which does not include the land so pointed out, he might be responsible in equity to the extent of his interest in the land not included in the deed; but, if there are other grantors owning an undivided interest who did not authorize the grantor who pointed out the land to do so, and did not know of his having done so, the fact that they thereafter signed a deed to land which they owned, and which land was properly described in the deed, would not authorize the deed to be reformed as to them. They having made no representation other than contained in their deed, they would not be bound by representations made by a co-owner without their authority.

The second proposition under the first assignment of error is that the court erred in charging on the weight of the evidence, in that it assumes that the line pleaded by plaintiff is the correct line. This charge is not subject to such criticism.

The third proposition is that the main charge and the special charge given are contradictory.

[2] The main charge states a proposition of law which was more favorable to appellants than the law would have authorized. The special charge does not contain any affirmative error, for which reason we do not sustain appellants' third proposition.

[3] The second assignment of error complains of the charge of the court, in that it places the burden of proof upon the defendant on his cross-action, wherein he seeks to have the deed reformed. In this there was no error. Railway v. Shirley, 45 Tex. 377; Moore v. Giesecke, 76 Tex. 543, 13 S. W. 290.

[4] The third assignment complains of the action of the court in sustaining appellee's exceptions to appellants' allegations, wherein they seek to make the children of D. R. Franks liable upon their warranty. In this there was no error. It is true that, if one sells to another land which he does not own, the purchaser may obtain relief in equity for damages which he has suffered by reason of such land being sold to him, but, if the seller makes a deed which by its terms does not include some of the land pointed out, a purchaser cannot recover upon the warranty. It is only where there is a failure of title to the land, or a part thereof, which the deed purports to convey, that the covenant of warranty is broken. Stark v. Homuth, 45 S. W. 763, and authorities there cited.

Finding no error of record, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.
Affirmed.

LANCASTER et al. v. TUDOR et al.
 (No. 1123.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. El Paso.
 May 27, 1920. Rehearing Denied
 June 17, 1920.)

1. Trial \S 251(3)—Instruction in action for damage to cattle erroneous as not confining issues to negligence charged.

In action against receivers and railroads for damage to a shipment of cattle, charge not requesting finding as to whether either receiver was guilty of the acts charged, and whether such acts were negligence and the proximate cause of the injuries complained of, held erroneous, under Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 1971, as too broad, as permitting the jury to consider elements of negligence not pleaded by plaintiff, and as not confining issues to specific negligence charged.

2. Carriers \S 229(2)—Shipper's damages difference between value of cattle as they should have been and as they were delivered.

In action against railroads for damage to shipment of cattle measure of damages is difference between market value of cattle at time and place of delivery as actually delivered and their market value as they would have been without injury.

3. Carriers \S 228(3)—Proof of intrinsic value of cattle at destination admissible in absence of market value.

In action against railroads for damage to shipment of cattle, if the proof showed no market value at destination, proof of intrinsic value at the time and place was admissible for use in establishing damages.

4. Carriers \S 230(1) — Whether no market value for cattle at place of delivery a jury question.

In action against railroads for damages to shipment of cattle, where the evidence leaves it doubtful whether there was no market value at the place of delivery, the question becomes one for the jury.

5. Trial \S 338—Separate verdict against each defendant intelligible.

In action for damages to shipment of cattle against receivers of one railroad and against another road, the fact that the jury wrote a separate verdict as to each defendant did not render it unintelligible.

Appeal from District Court, Reeves County; Chas. Gibbs, Judge.

Suit by C. W. Tudor against J. L. Lancaster and Pearl Wight, receivers of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, and against the Rio Grande, El Paso & Santa Fé Railway Company. From a judgment against them, and in favor of the other defendants, defendant receivers appeal. Reversed and remanded as to defendant Wight, receiver of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company; affirmed as to the Rio Grande, El Paso & Santa Fé Railway Company and defendant Lancaster.

Jno. B. Howard, of Pecos, for appellants.

Ben Randalls and Palmer & Russell, all of Pecos, and Ellis Douthitt, of Sweetwater, for appellee.

HARPER, C. J. C. W. Tudor brought this suit against J. L. Lancaster and Pearl Wight, as the receivers of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, and the Rio Grande, El Paso & Santa Fé Railway Company, for damages to 615 head of cattle shipped from Pecos, Tex., to La Tuna, Tex.

The grounds of negligence urged are that: First. By virtue of his contract and the promise of the agent of the receivers to have cars ready, the cattle were placed in the pens of the railway company at Pecos on October 21, 1917. That no cars were furnished, and cattle not shipped until October 28, 1917. That by reason of the cattle being range cattle, and being compelled to remain in the pens during said time, they lost strength, etc., and were thereby deteriorated in value. Second. That he was compelled to buy feed for them and to hire help, for which he incurred expenses. Third. That the cars were not properly bedded, which caused the cattle to fall down and be trampled upon, etc. Fourth. That after the cattle arrived at El Paso the defendants permitted them to remain upon the side track for 24 hours without unloading or feeding, etc. That by said acts of negligence some of the cattle were caused to die and others were injured, etc.

The receivers of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company answered by general and special exceptions, general denial, and specially that the cattle were received under a contract which limited its liability for damages to acts occurring upon its own line, and that a separate contract was made with the Rio Grande & Santa Fé Railway Company for transportation from El Paso to La Tuna; that all injuries to the cattle were caused by them being thin and weak and not by any act of defendant; that the cars were furnished within a reasonable time after legal demand for them was made, etc. The answer of the El Paso, Rio Grande & Santa Fé Railway Company is substantially the same.

Tried with a jury, submitted upon general charge, and upon the verdict for plaintiff against the receivers for $1,750, and for the other defendants, judgment was entered for plaintiff against the receivers for said sum, and for the other defendants that plaintiff take nothing as to them, from which the receivers only have appealed. The appellant assigns error upon the charge of the court that it is too broad, and permits the jury to consider elements of negligence arising during the trial not pleaded by plaintiff, and that it fails to confine the issues to the specific acts of negligence charged by plaintiff.

The charge complained of reads as follows:

"Gentlemen of the Jury: The plaintiff, C. W. Tudor, seeks to recover damages from the defendants Pearl Wight and J. L. Lancaster, as receivers of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, and against the defendant Rio Grande, El Paso & Santa Fé Railway Company, alleged to have accrued to a shipment of cattle shipped by plaintiff over defendants lines of railroad from Pecos, Tex., to La Tuna, Tex. The defendant Pearl Wight has answered, admitting that he handled the shipment of cattle in question as receiver of said Texas & Pacific Railway Company; the defendant J. L. Lancaster has filed no answer; and, there being no evidence showing that said Lancaster handled said cattle as receiver, you will therefore return a verdict in favor of said J. L. Lancaster. The defendants plead a contract limiting their liability to such injuries, if any, as accrued to said cattle while in charge of the respective defendants; they also allege that such damages as accrued to plaintiff, if any, so accrued by reason of the poor and weak condition of said cattle, and by reason of their wild and vicious natures.

"(1) You are charged that it was the duty of the defendants and Pearl Wight, receivers of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, to furnish cars for the transportation of said cattle upon such date, if any, as you may find that said receivers, through its agent, promised to furnish said cars, if any, and to promptly receive said cattle when tendered to it at such time and to transport the same with ordinary care to El Paso, and there to deliver the same to its codefendant, the Rio Grande, El Paso & Santa Fé Railway Company, and that it was the duty of the defendant the Rio Grande, El Paso & Santa Fé Railway Company to promptly receive said cattle when tendered to it at El Paso, Tex., and to transport the same to their final destination with ordinary care.

"(2) 'Ordinary care' is such care as a reasonably prudent person would have exercised under the same or similar circumstances, and a failure to exercise such care constitutes negligence.

"(3) If you find for the plaintiff, you will assess his damages at the difference, if any, between the intrinsic value at La Tuna, Tex., of the cattle in question, at the time and in the condition in which they should have arrived at their final destination, and their value at the time and in the condition in which they did arrive at their final destination, to which you may add the reasonable cost and expense of handling and caring for such cattle at Pecos, Tex., while waiting for cars, in the event you should find from the evidence that such cars were promised at an earlier date than they were furnished.

"(4) Neither of the defendants is liable for damages to plaintiff except such damages as you may find accrued by reason of the negligence of such defendant.

"(5) The defendants are not liable for damages that may have accrued to said cattle by reason of their poor and weakened condition, nor by reason of their inherent viciousness.

"(6) The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to establish his right to recover by a preponderance of the testimony, and unless he had done so you will find for the defendants."

[1] The charge does not request a finding by the jury as to whether or not either of the defendants were guilty of the acts charged and whether such acts were negligence, and the proximate cause of the injuries complained of, in fact, does not affirmatively submit any definite issue in the case; for such reason it is subject to the criticisms urged.

Article 1971, R. S. Vernon's Sayles', provides:

"The court 'shall so frame the charge as to distinctly separate the questions of law from the questions of fact; he shall decide on and instruct the jury as to the law arising on the facts, and shall submit all controverted questions of fact only to the decision of the jury.'"

The charge in this case falls short of the requirements of this statute.

[2] The next assignment is that it was error to permit witness to testify to the intrinsic value of the cattle at the point of destination. The measure of plaintiff's damages in this case is the difference between their market value at the time and place of delivery in the condition they were in at the time of their delivery and their market value in the condition they would have been in without injury.

[3, 4] If the proof showed no market value, then proof of intrinsic value at the time and place, etc., was admissible; however, in this case there was one witness testified "that there was no market value that he was able to find," and another testified positively that there was a market value at the place, and there is no other evidence upon the issue. We think it doubtful whether the evidence is sufficient to prove that there was no market value at the place of delivery; in such cases it becomes a question for the jury to determine. Ara v. Rutland, 215 S. W. 445; G. H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Patterson, 178 S. W. 274.

In view of another trial we make no comment upon the assignment charging excessive verdict.

[6] That the jury wrote a separate verdict as to each defendant does not make it unintelligible, as charged by the fifth.

Reversed and remanded as to the appellant receiver of Texas & Pacific Railway Company, Pearl Wight, and affirmed as to the Rio Grande & Santa Fé Railway Company and J. L. Lancaster. Tudor has not appealed from the judgment in favor of the latter defendants, and appellant does not complain of the decree, and for the further reason that the evidence shows a separate and distinct cause of action against each of the railway companies. Danner et al. v. Walker Smith Co., 154 S. W. 295; Miller v. Bank & Trust Co., 184 S. W. 614; Hamilton v. Prescott, 73 Tex. 565, 11 S. W. 548; Railway Co. v. Enos, 92 Tex. 577, 50 S. W. 928; Wimble v. Patterson, 117 S. W. 1034.

RAYMOND v. ASHLEY et al. (No. 2287.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. June 8, 1920.)

Landlord and tenant — 321—Contract held not to charge greater rent than allowed by law.

Where plaintiffs rented land to defendant, and were to furnish animals, feed, and everything necessary, except labor, and were to receive as rent one-half of all the crops, and agreed to feed one team of defendant's horses, and defendant was to let plaintiffs have the use of such team during the year for their feed, and plaintiffs turned the team over to defendant to be used by him in cultivation of the crop, it was not the intention of the parties that the value of the use of team above cost of feed should form and be a part of the rents and the contract was not void as charging rent greater than that allowed by law.

Appeal from District Court, Red River County; Ben H. Denton, Judge.

Action by H. T. Ashley and others against W. M. Raymond. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Travis T. Thompson, of Clarksville, for appellant.

Chambers & Dodd, of Clarksville, for appellees.

LEVY, J. Appellees as landlords sued the appellant, a tenant, to recover rents for a farm and on an account due for the year 1919. Appellant answered by a general denial, and specially pleaded that the rental contract sued on was void, because it charged a greater amount of rent than allowed by law, and by a cross-action sought affirmative relief. The case was tried before the court, and a judgment was entered for the plaintiffs.

The court made the findings of fact that the plaintiffs rented 40 acres of land to the defendant about January, 1919, upon the terms that they were to furnish the land, animals to work the land, feed for the animals, and all of the tools necessary for the cultivation of the land, and that the defendant was to furnish all labor necessary to make, gather, and market the crops grown on the land, the plaintiffs to receive as rent one-half of all the crops grown thereon; that plaintiffs furnished everything necessary for the proper cultivation of the whole 40 acres, except the labor; that defendant worked only 30 of the 40 acres, and failed to work 10 acres thereof; that—

"about the time the said rental contract was made the defendant purchased a horse from Dr. Thomason. I find that plaintiffs and defendant made a special arrangement by which plaintiffs agreed to feed one pair of the defendant's horses—the pair of horses being the horse purchased from Dr. Thomason and a brown mare—and the defendant was to let plaintiffs have the use of said team during the year for their feed. I find that the plaintiffs turned this team of horses over to defendant, to be used by him in the cultivation of his crop. I find that plaintiffs furnished ample feed for said team from the time of this special arrangement until the 26th day of July, at which time plaintiffs and defendant had a disagreement about the further use of said team."

The appellant insists that he should have a judgment in his favor on the facts found by the court, upon the ground that there appears a greater rental charge than the law authorizes. The point is that the special arrangement by which the appellees were to feed a team belonging to the appellant for its use constituted a part of the rental contract. It was not the intention of the parties, and the court does not so find, that the value of the use of the team above the cost of their feed should form and be a part of the rents; and there is nothing in the facts indicating that more than one-half of the crops was charged or agreed to as rents. We conclude the assignment should be overruled.

The second assignment does not present error, and it is overruled.

The judgment is affirmed.

BANK OF SLATER v. UNION STATION BANK. (No. 20799.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 25, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨205—Sustaining objections to evidence not reversible without an offer of proof.

The action of the trial court sustaining objections to questions asked by appellant is not reversible, where there was no offer to show what the answer of the witnesses would be.

2. Banks and banking ⇨154(1)—Indorsement of deposit slips for use of individual does not prevent crediting amount to that individual.

The fact that a bank, which deposited to the credit of another bank the amount of a note given by an individual, indorsed on the deposit slip that it was to the use of that individual, does not preclude recovery of whole deposit by the assignee of latter bank which had permitted the individual to draw from it the entire amount of deposit.

3. Banks and banking ⇨154(1)—Not liable for note of president which it did not sign.

To deny recovery by an assignee of the deposit credited to the assignor bank because the deposit was the proceeds of a note of the assignor's president would be to hold the bank liable on a note which it had not signed, contrary to Rev. St. 1909, § 9989.

4. Banks and banking ⇨154(9)—Directed verdict for recovery of deposit held proper.

Where the evidence was undisputed that plaintiff's assignor had the amount credited on deposit with defendant bank, and defendant offered no evidence to establish the alleged oral agreement limiting the disposition of the deposit, a directed verdict for plaintiff was proper.

5. Banks and banking ⇨178—Agreement to credit deposit to another bank to increase its book assets is not "loan."

An oral agreement by one bank to deposit to the credit of another an amount represented by the note of the president of the latter bank, to deceive the state bank examiner as to the assets of the latter bank, with a provision that deposit should not be drawn against, but should remain in former bank, is not a loan since to lend is to allow the custody and use of a certain thing on condition of return of the thing loaned or its equivalent in kind (citing Words and Phrases, First Series, Loan).

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Karl Kimmel, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Slater against the Union Station Bank. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is a suit on the part of the Bank of Slater as assignee of the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Slater, Mo. (hereinafter called the Farmers' Bank) against the Union Station Bank, to recover a deposit of $7,560.

43 claimed by plaintiff to have been due to the Farmers' Bank from the Union Station Bank. The assignment was dated July 1, 1913, and plaintiff demanded payment on July 5, 1913. Defendant refused to pay. The petition, in substance, set up the facts above stated.

The defense was a general denial, coupled with allegations to the effect that on or about September 15, 1910, defendant loaned the Farmers' Bank the sum of $8,000, upon a parol agreement that the entire sum should remain on deposit with defendant to the credit of the Farmers' Bank; that the Farmers' Bank should pay defendant interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and that defendant might, at any time, credit said loan with said deposit, and thereby discharge the indebtedness of the Farmers' Bank to it, but that this money was never to be drawn out of appellant's bank. The purpose of this arrangement was to swell the apparent assets of the Farmers' Bank to that extent, presumably for the benefit of inquisitive bank examiners, since appellant alleges that the loan was desired in order to keep up the reserve of the Farmers' Bank as required under the laws of Missouri. Since this purpose would be defeated by the execution of an obligation by the Farmers' Bank in evidence of this loan, it was further agreed by the borrowing and lending banks above named, as defendant alleges, that one I. W. Avitt should execute and deliver to defendant his personal note for $8,000, bearing interest at 6 per cent. per annum, which he accordingly did. Defendant then credited the Farmers' Bank with $8,000. Avitt was then president of the Farmers' Bank. It is alleged that the original note was renewed on March 1, 1913, subject to the same understanding; that the Farmers' Bank paid the interest, both on the original and the renewal notes, and that prior to July 1, 1913, defendant applied so much of the deposit as then remained in its hands, to wit, $7,569.43, to the payment of the Avitt renewal note, given in evidence of the alleged loan to the Farmers' Bank, and thus closed the account. Defendant also averred that the money was loaned to the Farmers' Bank and not to Avitt, and that the Farmers' Bank got the benefit of the loan "as aforesaid." The reply was a general denial.

The evidence tended to support the allegations of the petition and answer, except as to the alleged parol agreement, concerning which no evidence was admitted. Whether or not any was offered will be determined later. The evidence also showed that upon the delivery of the original Avitt note, defendant issued to the Farmers' Bank a deposit slip, showing a deposit of $8,000 to the credit of the last-named bank. The Farmers' Bank passed the amount to the credit of Mr. Avitt, who promptly checked it out. This slip was in the usual form except that it bore this memorandum: "Use of I. W. Avitt, E. C." The letters "E. C." were the initials of Emerson Chancellor, who was the cashier of the defendant bank when the slip was made, but who was dead at the time of the trial. Mr. Avitt also executed to defendant another note upon which he secured the sum of $8,000. By a contract bearing date of July 1, 1913, the Farmers' Bank in writing assigned to plaintiff certain assets, including the claim here in question, in consideration of an agreement upon the part of plaintiff to pay the claims of the depositors of the Farmers' Bank, and thereupon the last-named institution, being insolvent, went out of business. Mr. I. W. Avitt, in like unfortunate condition financially, took up his abode in Winnipeg, Canada, of which city he was a resident at the time this case was tried. It is alleged in the answer that "prior to, to wit, July 1, 1913," defendant applied the deposit in question to the payment of "the loan aforesaid," meaning thereby the loan of $8,000 to the Farmers' Bank. The evidence showed the application was made August 8, 1913. This was the sum of plaintiff's evidence.

Defendant then asked for a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for defendant. This instruction was refused, and defendant excepted. No evidence being offered by defendant, the court thereupon gave to the jury a peremptory instruction to find for the plaintiff in the sum of $7,569.43, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the date that payment was demanded by plaintiff. Defendant duly saved an exception to this instruction. The verdict was in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $7,569.43 and interest at 6 per cent. per annum from July 5, 1913, or a total sum of $9,504.12. A motion for a new trial having met with defeat, defendant has duly appealed. Its assignments of error are shown, in substance, in the opinion.

Marshall & Henderson, of St. Louis, for appellant.

Jones, Hocker, Sullivan & Angert, of St. Louis, for respondent.

WILLIAMSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] Appellant's first assignment of error relates to the refusal of the trial court to permit appellant to prove the alleged parol agreement between itself and I. W. Avitt concerning the $8,000 deposit. The record touching this matter is as follows:

The president of the appellant bank, called as a witness for respondent, testified that he instructed appellant's cashier to take I. W. Avitt's note for $8,000 and place that amount to the credit of the Farmers' Bank. On cross-examination, he was asked by appellant to tell the jury what he knew about "the arrangement under which this note was executed to the Union Station Bank." To this question respondent objected on the ground that the note was an obligation in writing, and that parol evidence concerning any negotiations leading up to its execution was inadmissible. The court sustained the objection. Later, this witness testified concerning the original $8,000 note, in substance, that Avitt came to St. Louis to negotiate a loan, and, in the words of the witness:

"After talking over the matter with Mr. Chancellor, the latter telephoned to me, and then explained to me why he desired a loan of $8,000."

At this point, respondent again objected on the grounds above stated, and the court sustained the objection. Appellant then asked the witness:

"What, in banking circles, is understood when a deposit ticket, such as this is, issued by a bank, by [bears] the words, 'Use of I. W. Avitt'?"

The witness answered that he knew the custom of his bank, but not of any others. He was then asked what was the purpose and intent of the Union Station Bank, in putting the words "Use of I. W. Avitt" on this deposit slip? Respondent's objection was sustained. The witness was then asked to what use this money was to be applied, and respondent's objection to that question was sustained. Appellant duly saved an exception to these rulings in each instance. This is all that appears in the record on this proposition. It will be noted that appellant made no offer to show what it expected to prove by the witness in this connection. So far as this record discloses, the witness might have been utterly ignorant concerning any matter to which these questions related. We cannot reverse a judgment on a speculation as to what a witness would have said had he been permitted to testify. In the absence of an offer of proof showing what appellant expected to prove by the answers of the witness to these questions, we must hold that the matter is not before us for review. This is the immemorial rule in this jurisdiction. Arlstrum v. Baker, 214 S. W. 859, loc. cit. 860; Smith v. Riordan, 213 S. W. 61, loc. cit. 64; Holzemer v. Railway Co., 261 Mo. 379, loc. cit. 411, 169 S. W. 102; Shelby County R. R. v. Crawford, 235 Mo. 489, loc. cit. 492, 139 S. W. 115. We rule this point against appellant.

II. Appellant's second assignment of error is that the trial court erroneously permitted respondent to prove that the Farmers' Bank passed the loan in question to the credit of I. W. Avitt, and that he thereupon checked that sum out of that bank. The essence of appellant's argument upon this point is that since Avitt was president of the Farmers' Bank, his knowledge was the knowledge of the bank, and therefore that bank was charged with notice of the arrangement alleged to have been made by Avitt with the appellant that the money was to remain on deposit with appellant, and was never to be drawn out either by Avitt or the Farmers' Bank. The fundamental fault in this argument is, of course, that there is neither proof nor an offer to prove that any such arrangement ever was made. We rule this point against appellant for that reason. Other reasons might easily be assigned, but this suffices.

[2] III. Appellant assigns as error the refusal of the trial court, upon the close of respondent's evidence, to give to the jury a peremptory instruction to find in favor of the appellant. In substance, appellant argues, under this assignment, that by the indorsement of the words "Use of I. W. Avitt" upon the deposit slip which it sent to the Farmers' Bank, that bank "became the trustee of the $8,000, * * * and I. W. Avitt became the beneficiary of that money, and he alone had the right to draw it or assign his right to some one else, none of which was ever done."

Again appellant is confronted with the fatal flaw in its case that there is in this record neither proof nor an offer to prove that the use of this money by I. W. Avitt was subject to any limitation or restriction whatever. So far as this record discloses, the Farmers' Bank was merely notified that it had on deposit with appellant the sum of $8,000, which was for the use of I. W. Avitt. So far as appears here, the Farmers' Bank might as well have had this $8,000 in its own vaults as in the vaults of appellant. If it had had the money in its actual, physical possession, could there be any doubt of its right to credit it to Avitt's account and to honor his checks for the full amount. We think not. In effect, that is what it did. All that the Farmers' Bank knew was that Avitt was entitled to use $8,000, which it had to its credit for his use. Avitt got the use of it. There is no doubt about that. It appears that appellant had loaned Avitt another $8,000 also. There is no question about his right to use that sum. Now suppose that appellant had notified some bank other than the Farmers' Bank that appellant had credited such other bank with that second sum of $8,000 for the "use of I. W. Avitt," and the bank so notified had thereupon cashed Avitt's check, drawn upon itself for $8,000, would anybody question the right of such bank to collect $8,000 from appellant? We cannot imagine upon what grounds such a contention could be entertained.

[3] But the whole matter may be disposed of upon another ground. In effect, appellant is asserting that respondent, as assignee of the Farmers' Bank, must pay a note which appellant holds against I. W. Avitt, and upon which, so far as appears in this record, the Farmers' Bank was never bound. This note is a renewal of another note which was executed in 1910. There was at that time, as there has ever since been, a terse declaration in our statute relating to negotiable instruments, which reads as follows:

"No person is liable on the instrument whose signature does not appear thereon, except as herein otherwise expressly provided." Section 9989, R. S. Mo. 1909.

We do not know of any exception whose saving grace would relieve appellant from the effect of this sweeping statute, nor has appellant's eminent counsel pointed out such an exception. True, this is not an action brought by appellant upon that note, but observe the guarded language of the statute, "No person is liable on the instrument. * * *" To support appellant's contention here would be as effectually to hold the Farmers' Bank liable upon the Avitt note as if appellant were directly suing that bank upon that note. But if it be said that appellant is simply seeking to enforce a parol agreement made at the time the note was executed, we are again confronted with the insuperable objection that there is no proof nor offer of proof that there ever was such an agreement. There is no merit in this assignment.

[4] IV. As a fourth and last assignment of error, appellant asserts that the court erred in the instruction given to the jury, as above set out. This instruction is a peremptory direction to the jury to find for the respondent. The only matter left for the jury to determine was the date upon which respondent demanded and appellant refused payment. The determination of that date fixed the time from which interest should be calculated. There was substantial evidence to support the verdict upon that proposition. Unless the instruction was erroneous upon other matters, the appellant must fail on this point also. The undisputed facts are that on July 1, 1913, the Farmers' Bank had on deposit with appellant the sum of $7,569.43; that on that day the Farmers' Bank for a valuable consideration assigned that credit to the respondent, and that on July 5, 1913, respondent demanded payment, and appellant refused to pay. There was neither proof nor offer of proof to the contrary. Appellant's argument under this assignment is based upon the assumption of error on the part of the trial court in refusing to admit evidence of the alleged parol agreement. For the reasons stated in paragraph 1 of this opinion, we hold that that point is not before us for review. No assault is made upon this instruction upon any other ground. We hold that this assignment is likewise without merit.

[5] V. Certain other phases of this case are worthy of consideration because of their peculiar character. Appellant's whole case is based upon the alleged parol agreement. As pleaded, this agreement was, in effect, merely a device to aid Avitt and the Farmers' Bank to mislead and deceive the officers of the law whose duty it was from time to time to examine into and ascertain the financial condition of the Farmers' Bank, for the protection of its depositors and others having business dealings with it. Furthermore, the alleged loan was not a loan. To lend is to allow the custody and use of a certain thing, on condition of the return of the thing loaned, or, in the case of money, and perhaps other things, of its equivalent in kind. Webster's Dictionary; Century Dictionary; Anderson's Dictionary; Black's Dictionary; Words and Phrases, First Series, vol. 5, p. 4196; Griffen v. Train, 40 Misc. Rep. 290, 81 N. Y. Supp. 977, loc. cit. 981. But the very pith and marrow of this alleged contract of lending was that neither Avitt nor the Farmers' Bank was for a single instant to have the custody or use of any part of this money. Every dollar of it was to remain in the actual possession and control of appellant. Neither Avitt nor the Farmers' Bank was to get anything whatever, except an entry upon appellant's books—and that entry appellant reserved the right to cancel at any time without cause and without notice. Neither of the pretended borrowers had the right to use a single dollar of the money for any purpose whatever, except to deceive the state banking department. It was for that explicit reason that the alleged contract was not reduced to writing. No hint of it was written, except the cryptic phrase. "Use of I. W. Avitt," which, signed by initials only, appeared upon the deposit slip, but not upon the books of either bank. The transaction had one, and but one, earmark of a loan—it bore interest. In plain terms, appellant and Avitt, intending to evade the law, entered into a scheme whereby the assets of the Farmers' Bank were to be made to appear to be $8,000 greater than they actually were, "in order to keep up its required reserve under the laws of the state of Missouri," but, to quote the answer itself, "as said bank did not want said loan evidenced by a note or bill payable which would show on its books a liability," it was agreed that the true nature of the matter should rest in parol. In other words, the books of both of the banks were to be falsified. The Farmers' Bank was to be liable, but was not to appear liable. For a money consideration, appellant lent its active aid to this plan, well knowing the full intent and purpose of it. The alleged parol agreement might well be held void for reasons of public policy.

"The law will not enforce contracts * * * that are against the public good, and therefore are forbidden by public policy." Harlan, J., in Ritter v. Mut. Life Ins. Co., 189 U. S. 158, 18 Sup. Ct. 300, 42 L. Ed. 603; Miller, J., in Sprott v. U. S., 20 Wall. 463, 22 L. Ed. 371.

"Public officers should act from high consideration of public duty, and hence every agreement whose tendency or object is to sully the purity or mislead the judgments of those to whom the high trust is confided is condemned by the courts. The officer may be an executive, administrative, legislative, or judicial officer. The principle is the same in either case." Cyc. vol. 9, p. 485; Greenhood on Public Policy, p. 529.

Similar defenses are also barred in many well-considered cases on the ground of estoppel. Lyons, Receiver, v. Benney, 230 Pa. 117, 79 Atl. 250, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 105; Harrington v. Connor, 51 Neb. 214, 70 N. W. 911; Pauly v. O'Brien (C. C.) 69 Fed. 460; State Bank v. Kirk, 216 Pa. 452, 65 Atl. 932; Lyons v. Westwater, 181 Fed. 681, 104 C. C. A. 664; State Bank v. Forsythe, 41 Mont. 249, 108 Pac. 914, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 501; Hurd v. Kelly, 78 N. Y. 588, 34 Am. Rep. 567; Best v. Thiel, 79 N. Y. 15; Murphy v. Gumaer, 18 Colo. App. 183, 70 Pac. 800.

The facts in this case inevitably suggest the question we have discussed in this paragraph. Counsel for respondent, however, have not raised it, being deterred, doubtless, by the decision in Title Trust Co. v. Brady, 185 Mo. 197, 65 S. W. 308, where a contrary doctrine is countenanced, and we therefore refrain from ruling upon the proposition. We have touched upon it for the reason that if the Brady Case, supra, is considered as announcing "the Missouri rule" upon this topic, as some commentators have said, that rule is apparently in conflict with numerous and respectable authorities, and its soundness may admit of question.

For the reasons stated in preceding paragraphs, the judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

ARNOLD v. ARNOLD. (No. 20217.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, in Banc. May 26, 1920. Motion for Rehearing Denied June 19, 1920.)

1. Divorce ¶1—Nature of proceeding.

A proceeding for divorce is an action at law, in that courts of general common-law jurisdiction are by statute vested with jurisdiction of such cases with all their incidents, although the proceeding also has some of the incidents of a criminal proceeding, in that the state is in effect a party thereto, and it may therefore be said to be sui generis.

2. Divorce ¶150(2)—Special findings of fact may not be required.

Statutory special findings of facts cannot be required in a divorce proceeding, such findings being equivalent to a special verdict and not binding upon the trial court.

3. Divorce ¶184(1)—Declaration of law may be disregarded on appeal.

A declaration of law by the trial court sitting in a divorce suit may be disregarded on appeal.

4. Divorce ⚡135—Evidence held insufficient to show "condonation" of indignities.

In a wife's suit for divorce on the ground of indignities, consisting of habitual intoxication and that defendant was affected with a venereal disease, evidence held to show that plaintiff had not condoned defendant's offenses, notwithstanding toleration and subsequent association; condonation being forgiveness and pardon for past offenses committed with full knowledge.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Condonation.]

5. Divorce ⚡108—Facts which may be proved under statutory allegation of indignities stated.

In a suit for divorce based upon indignities practiced by the husband towards the wife, although the petition does not allege infidelity, it, as well as that the husband is afflicted with a venereal disease, may be proved in support of the statutory allegation of indignities.

6. Divorce ⚡240(5)—$25,000 alimony held not excessive.

In a wife's suit for divorce based upon indignities, decree providing for $25,000 alimony to be paid by defendant at the expiration of a trust, and for $75 per month during the existence of a trust, as well as $1,000 for attorney's fees and $599 for suit money on appeal, held to require modification by elimination of the allowance for counsel's fees, and, when so modified, held not excessive.

7. Evidence ⚡18—Courts take judicial notice of increase of real estate values.

It is a matter of common knowledge that since 1916 real estate values have increased generally.

8. New trial ⚡156—Continuance of motion carries case over with all incidental powers.

The pendency and continuance to a subsequent term of a motion for new trial carries the case over, and suspends a judgment until such time as the motion for new trial is passed upon, and the court then has the same power and disposition of the case as it had at the term at which the judgment was rendered for all purposes.

9. Divorce ⚡245(1)—Alimony in gross not subject to modification at subsequent term.

A decree awarding alimony in gross is not subject to modification of the court at a subsequent term, under Rev. St. 1909, § 2375.

10. Dower ⚡52—Divorce decree for fault of husband does not of itself divest wife of dower.

Under Rev. St. 1909, § 359, if a woman is divorced from her husband through the fault or misconduct of the husband, the judgment of divorce does not of itself divest her of her dower.

11. Divorce ⚡211—Temporary alimony within discretion of trial court.

The allowance of temporary alimony is largely a matter of discretion with the trial court, and is allowed solely upon the theory that the wife has no means with which to prosecute her suit; it being entirely independent of the merits of the case.

12. Divorce ⚡213—Temporary alimony to pay counsel fees will not be granted to wife who has sufficient means.

In a divorce suit if the wife has sufficient property out of which to pay or secure counsel fees and other expenses of the suit, she will not be granted temporary alimony in view of Rev. St. 1909, § 2375.

13. Divorce ⚡225—Allowance for counsel fees held erroneous, where wife had sufficient means.

Where a wife, bringing suit for divorce, owned a house, in which she lived, unincumbered, and had property worth about $17,000, incumbered for about $2,000, out of which she received $100 a month, and also received from her husband a monthly allowance of $50 for support, an allowance of $1,000 for counsel fees was erroneous.

14. Divorce ⚡286—Reviewing court will not consider allowance of suit money pending appeal made by separate order not appealed from.

Where in a divorce suit a wife was by a separate and distinct order after final judgment allowed $500 for suit money pending an appeal, such allowance will not be considered by the reviewing court, where no distinct appeal was taken therefrom, in view of Rev. St. 1909, § 2381.

15. Divorce ⚡282—Allowance of suit money pending appeal will not be considered, in absence of motion for new trial.

Where in a divorce suit no motion for new trial was filed upon a separate order allowing suit money pending appeal, and no error preserved with reference thereto, it was not before the appellate court for review.

16. Divorce ⚡287—Supreme Court may modify and affirm judgment below.

It is within the authority of the Supreme Court on appeal from a decree of divorce to render judgment or to modify the judgment of the trial court in such manner as seems best, and to affirm it as modified.

Goode and Graves, JJ., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Thomas B. Buckner, Judge.

Divorce action by Crystal C. Arnold against James H. Arnold. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Johnson & Lucas, Blackmar & Bundschu, and Holmes, Holmes & Page, all of Kansas City, for appellant.

McCune, Caldwell & Downing, of Kansas City, for respondent.

WHITE, C. The action is for divorce. The petition of the plaintiff filed May 10, 1916, alleges that the plaintiff and defendant were married in Jackson county, Mo., July 19, 1905; that there were born of the marriage two children, Crystal Aristo, a girl, who was at the time of filing the petition four years of age, and an infant son at that time five months of age.

The ground on which the plaintiff seeks a divorce from her husband is such indignities as to render her condition intolerable. Several acts of cruelty are alleged, the principal of which, and those supported by the strongest evidence, were the habit of the defendant to become intoxicated at frequent intervals, and the fact that he had contracted a venereal disease, which was likely to be communicated to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff testified at great length relating to the unhappy course of her married life. Her husband was drunk at their wedding, and drunk at frequent intervals during the time they lived together, often requiring medical attention on that account. The youngest child was born October 19, 1915. The plaintiff left the defendant's home on the 2d of December, 1915, when her baby was five or six weeks old, and never returned. About four months before the birth of this child the plaintiff discovered that her husband was afflicted with syphilis, an affliction which he admitted. We do not need to burden this opinion with the repulsive details regarding his condition. There was testimony that a blood test, called the Wasserman test, being applied to the defendant, showed positive, that is, unmistakable, indication of infection by him. The two children, it transpired in the evidence, had been treated for the disease; the boy because of positive symptoms indicating its presence, and the girl on account of mere suspicion that she might be infected. Defendant denied any infidelity to his wife during their marriage, and claimed that if he was affected with the syphilis it was inherited from his father. It was proved by the evidence that the defendant's father, James H. Arnold, Sr., was afflicted with locomotor ataxia and atrophy of certain optic nerves. It is said that those afflictions, particularly locomotor ataxia, were universally conceded symptoms of syphilis. He claimed that while his affliction was inherited it did not develop upon him until a short time before the birth of his last child. The expert evidence in general was to the effect that the infection of the disease from inheritance usually manifests itself at an early age, between birth and four or five years of age. This was offered to rebut the claim of the defendant as to the hereditary nature of the complaint. There was much expert testimony by physicians concerning whether or not the disease was curable. While it was the general opinion of the physicians that the disease, whether hereditary or acquired by contagion, was curable by the modern methods, the latest scientific discoveries and treatment with the specific known as 606, nevertheless there was a possibility of contagion in case of pregnancy and childbirth.

There was much evidence relating to the award of alimony by the court. This award and the evidence relating to same, as well as evidence relating to other features of the case, will be more fully considered later in the opinion.

I. Appellant claims that the court committed error in refusing to make a special finding of facts under section 1972, R. S. 1909, as requested at close of the testimony. It is argued that the statute is mandatory in a suit at law, and, when requested by either party, the court commits error in refusing to make such a finding separate from its conclusions of law.

[1] A proceeding for divorce is an action at law in that courts of general common-law jurisdiction, as distinguished from the equity side of such courts, by statute are vested with jurisdiction of such cases with all their incidents. In practice many of the features of the English ecclesiastical courts, which had authority in such cases, obtain in our courts where specific provision by statute is not made. Gilsey v. Gilsey, 198 Mo. App. 605, 201 S. W. 588; Chapman v. Chapman, 269 Mo. 663, loc. cit. 668, 669, 192 S. W. 448; Hauck v. Hauck, 198 Mo. App. 381, loc. cit. 385, 386, 200 S. W. 679. The proceeding also has some of the incidents of a criminal proceeding, in that the state is in effect a party to it. It is therefore said to be sui generis. Chapman v. Chapman, 269 Mo. loc. cit. 668, 192 S. W. 448.

[2] The procedure in many respects is very like that which obtains in a court of equity. English v. English, 158 Mo. App. 330, loc. cit. 334, 139 S. W. 814; 9 R. C. L. p. 247. The reason why the statutory special finding of facts is not required in a case in equity applies with equal force to a divorce proceeding. Such finding is equivalent to a special verdict. Land Co. v. Bretz, 125 Mo. 418, loc. cit. 423, 28 S. W. 666. A special verdict is binding upon the court where there is evidence to support it. A trial court is not bound to make a finding in an equity case because such finding may be entirely disregarded by this court. This court must make its own investigation of the facts, and determine for itself the correctness of the finding of the trial court. Miller v. McCaleb, 208 Mo. 562, loc. cit. 574, 106 S. W. 655; Blount v. Spratt, 113 Mo. loc. cit. 64, 20 S. W. 967. In a divorce proceeding, while giving due deference to the finding of the trial court, this court is not bound by such facts as are found, but must review the evidence and make a finding of its own. Cherry v. Cherry, 258 Mo. loc. cit. 403, 167 S. W. 539; Barth v. Barth, 168 Mo. App. 423, loc. cit. 426, 151 S. W. 769. It was not error for the trial court to refuse to make a special finding which would be entirely futile and fruitless so far as to relieve this court from the necessity of reviewing the evidence.

[3] II. It is claimed by appellant that the only matters for this court to consider are the facts in relation to the disease which afflicted the defendant, because the court gave declarations of law upon every other issue which tended to show a finding in favor of the defendant. For instance, the defendant asked the court to declare the law to be that the allegation that the defendant had frequently become intoxicated was unsustained by the proof or had been condoned by the conduct of the plaintiff, and the declaration was given. A similar instruction was given in relation to each other act of indignity mentioned in the petition except that in relation to the disease. However, since a special finding of facts by the trial court is not important and may be disregarded by this court, so a declaration of law may be disregarded as in an equity case. Besides, it might be inferred from the giving of that sort of declaration the trial court found the defendant was guilty of the drunkenness and the intolerable condition caused by it, but further found that it was condoned by the plaintiff, or that it was not of itself enough to create a ground for divorce. This court may consider the evidence in relation to that in connection with the other evidence in the case. The evidence is conclusive that the defendant was frequently drunk as alleged in the petition, even requiring medical attention. In fact, defendant admitted it. So, upon the entire record it is for this court to determine whether the allegations of the petition are sustained by the proof. Giving the deference ordinarily paid to a trial court in such a case, we find the evidence was sufficient to support the finding by that court that the petition was supported by the facts in relation to the indignities alleged. The only serious conflict in the testimony was whether or not the defendant's disease was curable so as to prevent infection after a period of time.

It was contended by defendant, and is argued by defendant's counsel with great earnestness, that plaintiff was afflicted with a hallucination; that she suffered with a sort of mania, syphilophobia, which affected her judgment so that she could not even accept the advice of a physician. The general finding of the trial court, however, was contrary to that contention, and the testimony of the plaintiff was clear, temperate, and indicated a normal state of mind.

III. It is further claimed by defendant that the plaintiff condoned all the offenses of the appellant by continuing to live with him after all that had occurred. This is stoutly contradicted by the plaintiff. She admits that she bore with his drunkenness and his cruelty with patience and forbearance for a long time, but that, added to his unfaithfulness, made her condition intolerable, and she never did condone the last. It is true she lived in the house with him after the discovery of his afflicted condition for four or five months, but she explained that at the time of the discovery, a short time before the birth of her child, she was obliged to take the utmost care of herself and avoid any excitement; that it was her helpless condition at the time which prevented her leaving the house, and that she left him in five or six weeks after the child was born, as soon as her condition would permit. During a part of that period the defendant was away in Oklahoma, and during the rest of the time she refused to live with him as his wife, but held aloof from him, intending to leave him whenever she was able. She left at a time when her husband was absent in Oklahoma, where he was in some kind of trouble, the nature of which is not mentioned. True, he testified that at all times he had been faithful to her, but there was evidence tending to show that his disease had been contracted shortly before it was discovered. If the drunkenness and alleged acts of cruelty stood alone as the indignities which she claimed to have suffered, it is possible that it was condoned. But the indignities were cumulative, and she herself put her refusal to accept a reconciliation upon the ground that she had lost all confidence in him, and could no longer trust him even when he had promised to reform in the matter of drunkenness.

[4] Much stress is laid upon the proposition made by him to her to give him a trial; that they might live apart six months or a year or two years until he had thoroughly reformed, and there was proof that he was not only reformed, but cured. These protestations of his she refused to credit, and based her refusal upon her belief that she could no longer trust him. We think the evidence fails to show that his offenses were condoned. In the well-considered case of Weber v. Weber, 195 Mo. App. 126, 189 S. W. 577, Judge Sturgis of the Springfield Court of Appeals cited many cases illustrative of the different conditions under which offenses of the kind considered here might be condoned. Condonation is forgiveness and pardon for past offenses committed with full knowledge. Condonation for repeated acts of cruelty and indignities will not be inferred from toleration and association afterwards.

[5] It is argued by appellant that the petition does not allege, as a ground for divorce, the infidelity of the defendant. While that is true, and while the plaintiff urges the unfaithfulness of her husband as a reason for her refusal to return to him, nevertheless it is one of the indignities inflicted, as is the venereal disease, both of which may be proved in support of a statutory allegation of indignities. Hooper v. Hooper, 19 Mo. 355, loc. cit. 357; McCann v. McCann, 91 Mo. App. 1, loc. cit. 2, 3; Goodman v. Goodman, 80 Mo. App. loc. cit. 283.

IV. It was shown that the plaintiff possessed the house where she lived, valued at $3,250. She also owned a flat building worth $17,000 or $18,000, on which there was a mortgage for $2,000. Her net income from that property was $100 per month. The defendant owned in his own name, at the time of the decree, a residence which was valued at $8,000, with a mortgage on it of $4,000. He also owned a duplex building which rented for $85 per month, and was estimated by Mrs. Arnold to be worth $8,000, with a mortgage of $3,250 on it.

James H. Arnold, Sr., father of the defendant, died in April, 1911. By his will he disposed of about 30 pieces of real estate in Kansas City, Mo., in the following manner: The title was vested in the two sons, James H. Arnold, defendant here, and Paul J. Arnold, as trustees, for a period of five years and during the natural life of the widow of James H. Arnold, Sr., J. Edna Arnold. It was provided that during the life of J. Edna Arnold the trustees should pay her $100 per month; that at the expiration of the trust period at the end of five years or on the death of Edna Arnold, one-third of the property should become vested in J. H. Arnold and Paul Arnold, as trustees, for the benefit of the daughter of the testator, Mary Hood Arnold. They were required to pay her $100 a month out of the income of the estate, and on her death the property should vest in the two sons, James H. Arnold and Paul J. Arnold. The remaining two-thirds of the property should vest at the expiration of the trust in the two sons, James H. Arnold and Paul J. Arnold.

[8] The decree of the court provided for $25,000 alimony in gross to be paid by the defendant at the expiration of the trust mentioned in the will; that is, at the expiration of five years or at the death of J. Edna Arnold if she should live beyond that period. In the meantime the defendant was ordered to pay the plaintiff $75 per month during the existence of the trust. In addition the plaintiff was allowed $1,000 as attorney's fees for services rendered in the case, and $500 suit money on the appeal.

It will thus be seen that this alimony in gross awarded the plaintiff was to be paid out of the interest of appellant in his father's estate on the termination of the trust; that is, as soon as the title to the property vested in him. The property mentioned in which the defendant should receive a third interest was estimated by the witnesses for the defendant to be $214,000 and by the witnesses for the plaintiff $266,500. While a good deal of the real estate included in the estate produced no income, the rents received from the balance amounted to about $1,240 a month. The estate owed debts amounting to $9,800, to be paid out of that property, leaving, according to plaintiff's valuation, a net value of the estate of $256,700. In addition to that the appellant was vested with a remainder, a half-interest in the one-third devised to his sister for life. The individual property of the appellant, not acquired through the will, and valued at $6,500 with a mortgage of $4,000, was paid for in part by the plaintiff, who contributed $1,700 to the purchase. Appellant's deposition showed that he owed individual debts amounting to $9,300.

Assuming that the trial court found the net value of the estate in which the defendant had a one-third interest valued at $256,000, then the defendant's one-third interest would be $85,560. Deducting his indebtedness of $9,300 would leave about $76,000 as his individual property at the termination of the trust out of which the alimony was to be paid. This without counting the remainder in his sister's estate. Defendant's individual property mentioned above may also be disregarded. He has filed affidavits in this court, since the appeal, to show it was sold at a net price to him of $2,500 and that Mrs. Arnold, plaintiff, got most of the money, presumably the $1,700 which he owed her.

The appellant figures, by taking the lesser valuation put upon the estate by the defendant's witnesses, that after the payment of the alimony in gross, suit money, and the attorney's fees, the defendant would have left net, out of his entire resources, something over $32,000. Since the evidence was conflicting upon the values and fairly balanced, we will assume that the court correctly found the values to be as testified to by plaintiff's witnesses.

[7] This decree was rendered in 1916. Both parties by this decree took the hazard of the fluctuations of value of real estate. If it should decline in value the plaintiff's burden would be relatively increased, and if it should increase in value it would be relatively lightened. It is a matter of common knowledge that the latter condition has obtained in regard to real estate generally.

The defendant makes several objections to this award of alimony, claiming that it is grossly excessive for several reasons. First, it is urged that since the decree of divorce is granted in favor of the plaintiff the defendant is the guilty party, and she is not thereby divested of dower in his estate if he should die before her. The motion for new trial filed at the May term, 1916, was continued until the next September term, and at the September term the court modified the decree by adding this paragraph:

"The award of alimony herein made shall be in lieu of all dower and property and marital rights of the plaintiff in or against the estate of defendant."

[8] This order was made and the motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment were overruled on the same day. Appellant asserts that this part of the decree was ineffective because made at a term subsequent to that at which the original judgment was rendered.

The pendency and continuance to a subsequent term of a motion for new trial carries the case over; that is, it suspends a judgment until such time as the motion for new trial is passed upon, and the court then has the same power and disposition of the case as it had at the term at which the judgment was rendered, for all purposes. That is, the court might set aside or modify in any manner the judgment, as he might do at the term at which the judgment was rendered. Childs v. K. C., St. J. & C. B. Ry. Co., 117 Mo. 414, loc. cit. 427, 23 S. W. 373; State ex rel. v. Ellison, 267 Mo. 321, concurring opinion of Farris, J., loc. cit. 331, 184 S. W. 963.

[9] It is true, a decree awarding alimony in gross is not subject to modification of the court at the subsequent term under section 2375; Meyers v. Meyers, 91 Mo. App. 151 loc. cit. 155; Biffle v. Pullam, 114 Mo. loc. cit. 54, 21 S. W. 450. That rule does not affect the order made in this case modifying the decree because it was made at the term at which the court had absolute control over the judgment.

[10] At common law, on the divorce of husband and wife, the marital interest of either in the property of the other was annulled so that the husband had no curtesy in the property of his deceased wife from whom he had had divorce (Doyle v. Rolwing, 165 Mo. 231, 65 S. W. 315, 55 L. R. A. 332, 88 Am. St. Rep. 416), and the wife had no dower in the real estate of her deceased husband. Under section 359, R. S. 1909, if a woman is divorced from her husband through the fault or misconduct of the husband she does not thereby lose her dower; that is, the judgment of divorce itself does not divest her of her dower. That does not mean that the court in adjusting the matter of alimony and property between parties could not make any order affecting the wife's dower interest; on the contrary, it has been held by this court that a trial court might award alimony on condition that the wife release her dower. Aylor v. Aylor, 186 S. W. 1068, loc. cit. 1071, 1072. The paragraph in modification of the decree in this case, quoted above, is sufficiently explicit to show it was the intention of the court that the award should be on that condition. If it is not sufficiently explicit to express that condition, then a nunc pro tunc entry would make it so. The court possesses great latitude in disposition and division of the property of the parties when a decree of divorce is granted.

It is further contended by appellant that the obligation to support the child is still upon the husband, notwithstanding the allowance of alimony; that the $25,000 in gross for plaintiff was for her own benefit and would not relieve her husband, although divorced, of his obligation to support the children, and she could recover of him the expenses incurred in such support.

While the husband would be liable in a suit by the divorced wife for the maintenance of the children, nevertheless the courts do sometimes take into consideration that the wife had their custody in awarding her alimony; that there are many things in connection with the care of children aside from the mere expense of support and education that entail the expenditure of money, and doubtless in such suit the court would take into consideration the circumstances of the parties at the time. There are many cases in which the allowance of alimony in a proportion of the husband's estate, equal to that considered here, has been upheld by this court. Gercke v. Gercke, 100 Mo. 237, 13 S. W. 400; Viertel v. Viertel, 212 Mo. 562, 111 S. W. 579; Lemp v. Lemp, 249 Mo. 295, 155 S. W. 1057, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 307; Harner v. Harner (App.) 206 S. W. 385.

[11] V. As a part of the decree the court adjudged that the plaintiff might recover the sum of $1,000, "to be paid to her or to her attorneys of record for their services in this case." The plaintiff did not, at the beginning of the suit, file any motion for temporary alimony for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the suit, including attorneys' fees. The allowance of temporary alimony is largely a matter of discretion with the trial court, but is allowed solely upon the theory that the wife has no means with which to prosecute her suit. Hedrick v. Hedrick, 157 Mo. App. 633, loc. cit. 635-637, 138 S. W. 678; Blair v. Blair, 131 Mo. App. 571, 110 S. W. 652. The allowance is independent of the merits of the case. Libbe v. Libbe, 166 Mo. App. 240, loc. cit. 243, 244, 148 S. W. 460. In the case of State ex rel. Gercke v. Seddon, 93 Mo. 520, 6 S. W. 342, this court discussed the propriety of an order of court granting temporary alimony. The court said (93 Mo. loc. cit. 522-523, 6 S. W. 343):

"The power of the court to order and enforce an allowance for alimony pendente lite, although an adjunct of the action of divorce, is an independent proceeding standing upon its own merits, and in no way dependent upon the merits of the issues in the divorce suit, or in any way affected by the final decree upon those merits. It grows, ex necessitate rei, out of the relations between the parties to the controversy."

[12] It must be considered entirely apart from the merits of the case. If the wife has sufficient property out of which to pay or secure counsel fees and other expenses of the suit, the courts do not grant temporary alimony. Penningroth v. Penningroth, 71 Mo. App. 438. The statute allows such an order "where the same would be just" (section 2375, R. S. 1909); that is, where it would be just, independent of the merits of the case. This has been interpreted to mean where the wife is without means to prosecute the suit, and of necessity relies upon her husband to furnish the means. Rutledge v. Rutledge, 177 Mo. App. 469, loc. cit. 473, 119 S. W. 489; Coen v. Coen, 130 Mo. App. 480, 109 S. W. 1083; Robertson v. Robertson, 137 Mo. App. loc. cit. 95, 119 S. W. 533; Dowling v. Dowling, 181 Mo. App. 675, loc. cit. 679, 164 S. W. 643; Scism v. Scism, 184 Mo. App. 543, 167 S. W. 455; Smith v. Smith, 192 Mo. App. 99, 180 S. W. 568.

[13] If the wife has sufficient property to defray the expenses of her suit, it does not matter what property the husband has; an allowance pendente lite would not be made. In this case the wife had a house, in which she lived, unincumbered. She had property valued at about $17,000, incumbered for about $2,000, out of which she received an income of $100 per month. She also was receiving $50 per month from her husband for support. While it might be said that the income she had was only sufficient for her to live on and maintain herself and two children pending the suit, nevertheless she had sufficient property to secure her attorneys' fees. The question is put at rest in this case by the fact that she did not ask temporary alimony; she did employ counsel and they furnished the necessary services; she had sufficient property to justify that employment, and did not ask allowance until the end of the suit. This was a tacit confession that she did not need an allowance from her husband to enable her to prosecute the suit. Counsel for respondent assert that the allowance of $1,000 for her attorneys was not temporary alimony, but a part of her permanent gross allowance. The very wording of the decree negatives that suggestion; the allowance is for the service of her attorneys which they have rendered in the case.

[14] VI. When the appeal was taken, on motion of the plaintiff the court made a further allowance of $500 for suit money pending the appeal. This is the basis of a complaint by appellant. That order the court in its discretion might well make in this case, and the appellant is precluded from the consideration of the subject here because that was a separate and distinct order after final judgment, from which he might have prosecuted a separate and distinct appeal. Section 2381, R. S. 1909.

[15] No motion for new trial upon that order was filed by defendant; no error preserved with reference to the same, and therefore it is not before this court for review. State ex rel. Gercke v. Seddon, 93 Mo. loc. cit. 523, 6 S. W. 342; Smith v. Smith, 192 Mo. App. loc. cit. 105, 180 S. W. 568.

[16] VII. It is within the authority of this court to render judgment here in cases of this character, or to modify the judgment of the circuit court in such manner as seems best, and affirm it as modified. Henry County v. Salmon, 201 Mo. 136, loc. cit. 172, 100

S. W. 20; Chilton v. Nickey, 261 Mo. 232, loc. cit. 243, 169 S. W. 978; State ex rel. v. Trust Co., 209 Mo. 472, loc. cit. 494, 108 S. W. 97; Majors v. Maxwell, 120 Mo. App. loc. cit. 287, 98 S. W. 731; Mangold v. Bacon, 249 Mo. loc. cit. 50, 155 S. W. 393.

The judgment of the trial court is therefore modified so as to eliminate the allowance of $1,000 counsel fees, and, as modified, it is affirmed.

BUCHANAN v. RALLS COUNTY. (No. 20816.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Counties ~~67~~73—Must furnish treasurer with suitable office.

It is the duty of the county to furnish the treasurer with suitable office space, heat, lights, and janitor service.

2. Counties ~~67~~73—Whether office for county treasurer sufficient held for jury.

Whether the space provided for the county treasurer in a room already occupied by the county clerk was obviously insufficient, the only other place where the treasurer could have office being a jury room, plainly unsuitable, held a question for the jury, as reasonable men could honestly differ; there being nothing requiring privacy in such offices.

3. Evidence ~~48~~48—The court will not take judicial notice that room furnished a county treasurer was insufficient.

In an action by a former county treasurer for the expenses of maintaining an office, where the treasurer might have used a room with the county clerk, and the number of the assistants and the business of the office did not appear, the court will not take judicial notice that the room, which was about 14 by 18, with vault, was insufficient for the two officials, but the question should be submitted to the jury.

4. Evidence ~~483~~(1)—Opinion as to suitability of room for county office not competent.

Opinion evidence as to the suitability of a room for an office for county treasurer is not competent.

5. Counties ~~67~~73—Statute relating to contracts by counties does not apply to expenditures by treasurer in furnishing office.

Rev. St. 1909, § 2778, relating to contracts by counties and municipalities, is inapplicable to action by county treasurer, who sought to recover amount expended in maintaining an office, which the county failed to furnish.

6. Counties \Leftrightarrow 73—County, failing to provide treasurer with office, is bound to pay cost thereof.

Where the county failed to provide the treasurer with an office, it is bound to pay the reasonable cost of an office, janitor service, etc., provided by the treasurer.

7. Estoppel \Leftrightarrow 62(3)—That treasurer provided her own office held not to estop the county from denying liability therefor.

Where county treasurer, instead of occupying a room jointly with the county clerk, as had been done by preceding treasurers, with knowledge of county court provided an office elsewhere, it does not estop the county from denying its liability to pay for such office.

8. Counties \Leftrightarrow 73—Failure of county treasurer to demand that county provide office not bar to recovery.

Where the county court was fully advised of the situation, the failure of the county treasurer to demand that she be provided an office will not bar recovery for $7.50 per month expended for rent, light, and janitor service, the maxim "de minimis lex non curat" applying in such case.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ralls County; W. T. Ragland, Judge.

Action by Estella Buchanan against the County of Ralls. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

This is a suit on the part of Estella Buchanan against Ralls County for certain expenses paid by her while she was treasurer of the defendant county. Plaintiff had judgment below, and the county duly appeals. Plaintiff alleged, in substance, that she was the duly elected, qualified, and acting treasurer of Ralls county from the 1st day of January 1909, until the 1st day of January, 1917; that as such official she was by law required to keep an office at the county seat of said county, and to attend to the same during the usual business hours, there to receive and disburse the funds of the county, and that it was also her statutory duty to keep the books, records, and papers pertaining to her office; that during that time it was defendant's duty to provide her with a suitable office room, properly equipped, lighted, and maintained, but that it failed to do so; that as a result of such failure she was compelled to supply and did supply the office, and defray the expenses of lights and janitor service therefor, and pay therefor out of her own funds; that she had expended the sum of $720 in so doing; that that sum was the reasonable value thereof; and that payment of said sum had been demanded and refused.

By its answer defendant admitted plaintiff's official position, followed this admission with a general denial, and then averred, in substance, that during the period aforesaid it maintained a county courthouse for the use of the county officials at the county seat, wherein it supplied the things which plaintiff claimed to have supplied; but it appears from the answer that it was necessary, if plaintiff kept her office in the courthouse, that she should occupy one room jointly with the county clerk, unless she chose to occupy a room on the second floor, which, as the evidence showed, was used by the grand jury and petit jury when court was in session. Defendant further averred that plaintiff maintained a separate office elsewhere than in the courthouse for her own business convenience; that during her term of office she made periodical settlements with the county court of Ralls county, and upon said settlements being made she was duly paid all that was due her, and all that she then demanded, and in consequence was estopped to claim more; that so much of her claim as accrued prior to five years next before the filing of her petition was barred by the statute of limitations; and that no contract in writing for said expenses was ever made by defendant. The reply was a general denial.

The evidence for plaintiff tended to show that she maintained a separate office in the central portion of New London, the county seat of Ralls county; that rent, lights, and janitor service cost $7.50 per month, which was a reasonable charge; that the county clerk's office was too small for joint occupancy; that the only unoccupied room in the courthouse was the jury room; that a short time before her term expired she presented her demand to the county court and payment was refused. A demurrer to the evidence was overruled. Defendant's evidence tended to show that the county court offered to fit up the jury room for plaintiff's use when court was not in session; that some former treasurers had occupied the county clerk's office jointly with him, and that others, at their own request, had maintained offices elsewhere in New London by permission of the county court. Defendant also offered, but was not allowed, to prove that in the opinion of various witnesses plaintiff could have maintained her office in the county clerk's office in joint occupancy with him. No further evidence of any importance was offered by either party. Defendant's request for a peremptory instruction was refused. The court instructed the jury that plaintiff was entitled to recover the reasonable expenses paid by her for rent, light, and janitor service, at not exceeding the rates shown in the evidence, separately assessing the amount of each, for a period not longer than five years before the date of the filing of the petition. Defendant asked an instruction, No. 2, to the effect that unless there was a written contract plaintiff could not recover; another, No. 3, to the effect that if "there was sufficient room, space, and conveniences in the courthouse for the plaintiff to have, keep, and maintain her office of county treasurer therein," including light, heat, and janitor service, and if such room was subject to plaintiff's use, but that plaintiff for reasons of her own kept her office elsewhere, then she could not recover; another, No. 4, to the same effect; another, No. 5, substantially to the effect that plaintiff could not recover without first showing a demand upon defendant to furnish appropriate accommodations; No. 6, on the burden of proof; and No. 7, on the theory of estoppel—all of which were refused, and defendant excepted. A verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff for $300. The usual steps followed, with the usual result, and defendant duly appealed.

Thos. E. Allison, of New London, and Charles E. Rendlen and Harry Carstarphen, both of Hannibal, for appellant.

D. H. Eby and Ben E. Hulse, both of Hannibal, for respondent.

WILLIAMSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-3] It was the duty of the appellant to furnish respondent with suitable office space, heat, lights, and janitor service. Ewing v. Vernon County, 216 Mo. 681, loc. cit. 689, 116 S. W. 518, and cases there cited. Respondent claims that appellant neglected to discharge this duty, and appellant asserts the contrary. The evidence shows, we think, that the jury room, which, it is said, respondent might have occupied, was obviously unsuitable. Apparently the only practicable arrangement was for respondent and the county clerk jointly to occupy the room in the courthouse designated as the county clerk's office, or to have a separate office elsewhere in the county capital. There is nothing inherent in the nature of the duties of these two offices, which so imperatively demands privacy, as to enable the court to say as a matter of law that separate offices must be provided. That being true, the question of whether or not the joint use of the county clerk's office by that official and respondent was or was not reasonably practicable, and whether or not such room was reasonably suitable room for respondent's use, under the circumstances, becomes a question of fact, unless, in the light of the evidence, the impracticability or unsuitableness of such an arrangement is so obvious that the minds of reasonable men could not honestly differ about it. The county clerk's office is shown by the evidence to be about 14 feet wide by 18 feet long. There is a vault in connection with it, the size of which is not shown. It appears that respondent, in her official capacity, had charge of about one dozen large record books. It may be assumed that she would need, and the evidence in fact discloses that she used, a desk, a typewriter, a table of moderate size, and a few chairs. It does not appear that there was not sufficient space in the vault for the records of both of these officials. Some of respondent's predecessors and her successor in office did, in fact, make use of these quarters in conjunction with the county clerk. Whether a room the size of this room was reasonably suitable for the use of both would obviously depend upon the volume of business usually done there, the number of persons usually employed in the two offices, and the number of persons who had occasion to be in that room on business connected with one or the other of the two offices, and, perhaps, upon other considerations. On these matters the record is silent.

It is, perhaps, possible for a room either to be so large or so small as to justify the court, in declaring as a matter of law that such room was or was not reasonably suitable for the joint use of two or more county officials, provided the volume of business, the number of assistants, and the extent to which the public had occasion to resort to the offices in question, and other relevant circumstances, were also shown. But we cannot take judicial notice of these things, nor could the trial court do so. As stated, practically nothing except the size of the room in question is shown in this record. Under these circumstances, a practically peremptory instruction in favor of the respondent was not justified. The interests here involved are not large, and it is regrettable that we cannot make final disposition of this case here and now; but, considering the functions of this court, our duty seems plain. Our ruling on this instruction makes it necessary to send this case back for a new trial. For that reason we indicate our opinion on some questions raised by appellant.

[4-8] Opinion evidence as to the suitability of a given room for respondent's use as an office is not competent. Section 2778, R. S. 1909, is not applicable to the case at bar, and for that reason no error was committed in refusing appellant's instruction No. 2. Ewing v. Vernon County, supra, 216 Mo. loc. cit. 693, 116 S. W. 518; Gammon v. Lafayette County, 79 Mo. 223. If this case is again tried, we think the jury should be instructed that, if the appellant failed to provide for the use of respondent reasonably suitable space in the courthouse or elsewhere in the county seat in which to maintain her office and transact her official business, then respondent had the right to provide such office, and to provide heat, light, and janitor service therefor, and that the county is bound to pay the reasonable cost of the same. The evidence, as shown by the record before us, does not, in our opinion, justify an instruction on the theory of estoppel, nor upon the necessity of a demand by respondent upon appellant that it should supply her with a suitable office, before she was justified in renting an office elsewhere. It seems that all parties were familiar with the situation. No one was misled. The expense actually incurred by respondent for rent, light, and janitor service was only $7.50 per month. It could hardly have been less. The omission of a formal demand on respondent's part has harmed no one. Courts—including county courts—should not be mere “snappers-up of unconsidered trifles.” The maxim “de minimis lex non curat” is one graciously to be borne in mind at times, and this is one of those times.

For the reason stated, this cause is reversed and remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

All concur.

KRIBS v. UNITED ORDER OF FORESTERS. (No. 20485.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1. October, 1919. Rehearing Denied and Opinion Modified April 10, 1920.)

Courts §231 (6)—Where contentions based on ruling statute inapplicable, and not on constitutionality, appeal is to Court of Appeals.

Where constitutional contentions are all based ultimately on the ruling and instruction that Rev. St. 1909, § 6962, did not apply to the insurance contract in suit, and it was not contended that the statute is unconstitutional, the appeal is to the Court of Appeals, and not the Supreme Court.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Kent K. Koerner, Judge.

Action by Henry Kribs against the United Order of Foresters. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed to the Supreme Court. Cause transferred to St. Louis Court of Appeals.

Douglas W. Robert, of St. Louis, for appellant.

Conrad Paeben and J. T. Roberts, both of St. Louis, for respondent.

BLAIR, P. J. This cause has been tried five times in the circuit court, and heard twice in the Court of Appeals. On the first trial plaintiff was nonsuited. The Court of Appeals (171 Mo. App. 87, 156 S. W. 571) sent the case back for trial. On the second trial the verdict and judgment were for the defendant. On appeal the judgment was reversed and the cause remanded. 191 Mo. App. 524, 177 S. W. 766. On the third trial a verdict for plaintiff was set aside in the trial court. The fourth effort resulted in a hung jury. On the fifth trial judgment went for plaintiff in the sum of $4,250.50, and defendant appealed to this court.

It is contended jurisdiction is vested in this court by reason of the presence of a constitutional question. Whether this is true is the first question for decision. One of the decisive issues in the case is whether the insurance contract involved is on the assessment plan, or whether it is such as may be entered into by a fraternal beneficiary association. On the second appeal the Court of Appeals held the contract was on the assessment plan, and that section 7913, R. S. 1899 (section 6962, R. S. 1909), exempting fraternal benefit societies from the operation of the statutes on assessment insurance was inapplicable to the case, because the insurance contract in suit was “not such as a fraternal benefit society is authorized to enter into, but rather one on the assessment plan.” On the trial which followed this decision the trial court gave and refused instructions on the theory that the above-mentioned section of the statutes did not apply to the contract in suit. To these rulings or instructions defendant objected, on the ground that they infringed certain of its constitutional rights. It is argued in the brief that defendant (1) was denied the equal protection of the laws; (2) deprived of the privileges and immunities granted to all fraternal beneficiary associations by section 6962, R. S. 1909; (3) and was deprived of its property without due process of law.

Defendant's constitutional contentions are all based, ultimately, upon the fact that the trial court ruled and instructed that section 6962, R. S. 1909 (formerly section 7913, R. S. 1899), did not apply to the insurance contract in suit. These instructions were given and refused in an effort to comply with the ruling of the Court of Appeals, on the second appeal, that the section did not apply. It is not contended the statute is unconstitutional. A practically identical question of jurisdiction was examined by the court en banc in McManus v. Burrows, 217 S. W. 512, and resolved against defendant's present contention. The opinion of the Commissioner in this case antedated that action of court in banc. It reached the same conclusion by a different route.

On the authority of McManus v. Burrows, supra, this cause is transferred to the St. Louis Court of Appeals. All concur, except WOODSON, J., absent.

In a railroad's suit to enjoin maintenance of a stone wall along its right of way, evidence held to show equitable title to the land on which the wall bordered and was erected in defendant's predecessor, who had exchanged lands with the railroad.

2. Boundaries ¶3(5) — Boundaries control farther description of lot as wedge-shaped.

The boundaries being given by a deed, whether the lot was actually wedge-shaped or not as described, the deed conveyed the land within the boundaries, which controlled.

3. Property ¶9—Possession evidence of ownership.

Defendant being in possession of land under a bona fide claim of ownership, his possession was evidence that he was owner as against plaintiff and all the world, except the true owner, if defendant was not such owner.

4. Evidence ¶213(2)—Testimony not inadmissible as offer of compromise.

In a railroad's suit to enjoin maintenance of stone wall by defendant along road's right of way on a lot claimed by defendant, court properly permitted defendant to testify road's representatives approached him to buy or exchange other property for a part of his on which to build side track; testimony being recognition of defendant's title, and not an offer of compromise.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Franklin County; R. A. Breuer, Judge.

Suit by B. F. Bush, receiver of the Railroad and other property of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, against August Stumpe. From judgment dismissing the petition, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jesse H. Schaper, of Washington, Mo., and C. D. Corum, of St. Louis, for appellant.

D. W. Breid, of Union, for respondent.

SMALL, C. I. Injunction. Petition filed October 5, 1917. Plaintiff alleges that the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, of which he is receiver, was entitled to the possession of a certain strip of ground 144 feet long, 69.6 feet wide at the west end, and 74 feet wide at the east end, as part of its right of way in the city of Washington in said county; that defendant unlawfully entered and took possession thereof, and to annoy plaintiff and his employes in operating said railroad erected a stone wall within 4 feet of the south rail of plaintiff's "passing" track; that said wall is about 2 feet high, but defendant intends to build it 6 or 8 feet high, which will endanger the lives and limbs of the employes operating and switching trains on said track; that unless enjoined the defendant will complete said wall, and thereby expose the said employes to unnecessary danger, and said railway will be unable to transact its business; that plaintiff and said railway have no adequate remedy by an action for damages, etc. Wherefore plaintiff prays for an order restraining defendant from constructing said wall, or any wall on said premises, and from in any manner interfering with the possession and title of said railway, and for general relief.

A temporary injunction was granted by the county court of said county October 7, 1916. At the November term, 1917, defendant filed a motion in the circuit court to dissolve the temporary injunction, which the court sustained, and final judgment was then entered dismissing plaintiff's petition. After his motion for new trial was denied, plaintiff appealed to this court.

The following sketch illustrates, in a general way, the "lay of the land."

Without deciding, for the purposes of this case, we assume that plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the lot in question was originally embraced in the deed of June 30, 1853, from McLean and wife to the Pacific Railroad Company, the predecessor in title of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company. But there is no evidence that any part of said lot was ever used by the railroad company for its right of way. Front street runs east and west. Lots 3 and 4, block 9, McLean's addition, run north and south, and each had a frontage of 66 feet on the north line of Front street, and extend north about 132 feet in depth. They adjoin each other. The lot in question runs 144 feet, the long way east and west, the east end, being 74 feet wide, abuts against said lot 4, and the west end is 69.6 feet wide, and adjoins plaintiff's right of way. The south side of the lot sued for, part of the way, is separated from Front street by a wedge-shaped tract, which is 18 or 20 feet wide at the east end, where it adjoins said lot 4 and runs to a point on Front street, as shown by a deed made in 1865, or 8 feet wide at that point, according to scale of plaintiff's plat put in evidence. On this wedge-shaped tract, and partly (about one-half) on the land in question, a barn had been built by the defendant's predecessor in title, as early as 1865 or 1866, and continuously occupied by the successive owners up to the time suit was brought. In the conveyance of the property in 1865, this small wedge-shaped tract was described as "lying between Front street and the land deeded to the Pacific Railroad Company by Dr. McLean, being 18 or 19 feet where it joined said lot 4 and running to a point some distance westwardly." Subsequently and until purchased by Philip Mueller, the title deeds described it as "a wedge-shaped lot adjoining said lot 4 of block 9 of McLean's addition, upon which wedge-shaped lot stands a brick stable," without stating the dimensions of the wedge-shaped lot. In the deed to said Mueller, made March 15, 1892, it was described as follows:

"Lot 4 of block 9 of McLean's addition to Washington. Also a certain wedge-shaped piece of land in said city adjoining the aforementioned lots on the west side of the whole of both tracks aforesaid, being bounded east by lot 3 of said block, south by Front street, north and west by the Missouri Pacific Railroad."

The railroad tracks and the right of way originally, and until 1902, ran across and occupied the north 40 feet of said lots 3 and 4. In 1902 the railroad company desired to widen its right of way. Accordingly a deed was obtained from Philip Mueller, the then owner of the remainder of said lots 3 and 4, dated August 30, 1902, and filed for record October 1, 1902, by the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, conveying to it a 7-foot strip of ground off the north end of Mueller's property. This deed recited that he makes the conveyance "in consideration of the sum of $1.00 and exchange of ground." Mueller died about 8 years before the trial. There was no deed shown in evidence conveying to Mueller the ground which he was to receive from the railroad company in exchange for said 7-foot strip. But on behalf of the defendant several witnesses testified on that subject. Joseph Mueller, about 35 years of age and son of said Philip Mueller, testified:

That in 1902 the representatives of the railroad company came to his father, and said the company wanted to widen its right of way along his property, and proposed that if he would give the company a strip 7 feet wide off the north end of his land the company would give him land adjoining his property on the west, where the lot in controversy was located. That his father made the company a deed to the 7-foot strip, and the company moved its right of way fence on lots 3 and 4 back to the south 7 feet, and built a fence inclosing the lot in controversy on the north and west sides. His father built a fence along Front street, and the lot in suit abutting said lot 4 on the west was thus completely inclosed. That thereafter, said Mueller and his heirs claimed and kept possession of the said lot and used it for a garden until said heirs made their deeds to the defendant. That he (Joseph Mueller), after making his deed, claimed no interest in the lot in question.

Edward Maschman testified: That he was the city marshal of Washington, and was born and raised there. Was section foreman for the Missouri Pacific Railway Company for 8 years. That the railroad company was never in possession of the lot in litigation. The fences around the lot were built by the railroad company. They have always been there on the north and west sides, and are there to-day. Does not remember any change. He, himself, once helped to build them.

Henry Nolte testified that he was then at the time of the trial, section foreman for the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, and had been for 15 years; had known the property in suit for 32 years; during that time the railroad company had not, to his knowledge, been in possession of the property. Philip Mueller was living upon it. Witness had charge of the section along this lot. About 14 years before the trial, the railroad company built a new track along the lot. He was a laborer at the time, and helped build the track, and "Mueller gave the company some land off the north side of his land. They did not have room enough to build the track, and they gave Mueller land on the west of his lot." The railroad company tore down the right of way fence along Mueller's lots 3 and 4, and moved it further south, and tore down Mueller's fence on the west of lot 4, and moved it further west, making a larger lot adjoining lot 4. The west fence was pushed out to the west to where it is to-day. But he did not know how far they moved it. Did not hear the agreement to exchange lands made. Heard about it from the section foreman. The railroad company moved the fence. Did not see the fence moved or erected, but the railroad company took the ground away, and the fence dropped in. "I seen that work done." It was done by the fencing gang.

Alex Brown testified: That he was section man. Had worked for the railroad 34 years in that vicinity. Knew this property since he was a boy. The railroad company was never in possession of it that he knew of. It has been in possession of other parties who lived on and occupied it. There was a fence there on the north side of this wedge-shaped lot until last spring, when it was knocked down. Remembered the building of the new track about 14 years before. But only knew about the exchange of property and building of the fence from what he had heard.

Judge John W. Booth testified that he put his horse up in the barn of the wedge-shaped tract in 1885 or 1886, when he went there to visit Maj. Lewright, who lived there. He had noticed the property frequently since then, and it had always been occupied by private parties, but he paid no particular attention, and could not fix the boundaries of the wedge-shaped lot.

August Stumpe, the defendant, testified, that he was in possession of the lot in suit, and had been ever since he purchased it, about 2 years before, from the heirs of Philip Mueller. At this point defendant introduced in evidence his deeds from said Mueller heirs. They were dated May 8, April 9, November 20, and ———, 1914. In three of them the property was described as follows (after conveying said lots 3 and 4):

"And a certain wedge-shaped piece of land in said city of Washington, adjoining the aforesaid lot 4 on the west side, bounded on the south by Front street, and on the north and west by the Missouri Pacific Railroad."

And in one of said deeds, as follows:

"And a wedge-shaped piece of land adjoining said lot 4 on the west."

At and shortly before the suit was brought, the plaintiff was constructing a side track near the property sued for on its right of way. Defendant built a stone wall on the property in suit within 4 or 5 feet of said track, which would render the use of the track dangerous to the employes of the plaintiff in moving and switching trains. The plaintiff, therefore, tore down this wall, but defendant threatened to put it up again. Plaintiff had also torn down part of the north fence around said property. The defendant testified that he built the wall as a retaining wall. He also testified that the plaintiff's representatives approached him and offered to buy the ground necessary to build and operate this side track, or exchange other property for it, but no agreement was reached; that they did not claim to own it until after they could not agree. Then they said the company had some right to it. Plaintiff objected to this testimony on the ground that it was an effort to compromise, but the court overruled the objection.

[1] II. We hold that the evidence shows an equitable title in said Mueller. The deed he made to the railroad company for the 7-foot strip recited that it was made in consideration of $1 and exchange of property. What property was exchanged, or was to be exchanged, was not stated, but the evidence is clear that at that time, the railroad company set its right of way fence back 7 feet, so as to take possession of the 7-foot strip conveyed to it by Mueller, and also erected a fence on the north and west sides of the lot sued for, and Mueller erected a fence along Front street. It was thus inclosed and ever afterwards occupied as a part of the Mueller premises. This contemporaneous and long-continued construction of the transaction and exchange of property mentioned in the Mueller deed to the railroad company could reasonably mean but one thing, and that is that the railroad company gave him that portion of their property west of his lot 4, which they inclosed within this fence, in exchange for his 7-foot strip, which they ever afterwards retained.

We hold, therefore, that the equitable title to the lot in suit was vested in Philip Mueller and his heirs prior to the conveyance of the latter to the defendant, Stumpe.

[2] III. But plaintiff claims that defendant did not obtain title for the land in question by his conveyance from the Mueller heirs. His deeds describe the land as "a certain wedge-shaped piece in said city adjoining the above-mentioned lot 4 on the west side, bounded on the south by Front street, north and west by the Missouri Pacific Railroad." The land embraced within this description was somewhat wedge-shaped. It included, not only the original wedge, but the land received from the railroad company in exchange for his 7-foot strip by Philip Mueller in 1902, which was the land in suit. But the boundaries being given, whether the lot was actually wedge-shaped or not, the land within the boundaries would pass. The boundaries would control. The Mueller heirs conveyed their deeds as conveying this land to the defendant, because they surrendered possession of it to him under their deeds. He had been in possession ever since, and Joseph Mueller testified that he claimed no further interest in it.

[3] IV. But, in any event, the title and right to possession of the property was not in the railroad company of which plaintiff is receiver, when this suit was instituted. Defendant being then in possession, under a bona fide claim of ownership, his possession was evidence that he was the owner of the property, as against the plaintiff and all the world, except the true owner, if he himself was not such true owner.

[4] V. The lower court properly permitted the defendant to testify that the plaintiff's representatives approached him to buy or exchange other property for a part of this property upon which to build the new side track.

He says they did this before any controversy as to ownership arose. They did not claim the railroad company had any interest in the property until afterwards. This was a recognition of the defendant's title, not an offer to compromise.

We find no error in the rulings of the learned chancellor below, and affirm the judgment.

BUSH v. STUMPE. (No. 20293.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Adverse possession § 114(1)—Evidence held not to show possession in defendant's predecessors.

In ejectment by railroad against defendant claiming wedge-shaped lot adjoining right of way, evidence held not to show any of persons under whom defendant claimed were in possession of whole tract in controversy, or in possession under color of title of part thereof, in name of whole, prior to August 1, 1866, the date of taking effect of the statute, now Rev. St. 1909, § 1886.

2. Ejectment § 26(1)—Defendant can invoke equitable title acquired by predecessor from plaintiff.

Defendant in ejectment, if he so elects, can invoke as a defense to the action the equitable title acquired by his predecessor from plaintiff.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Franklin County; R. A. Breuer, Judge.

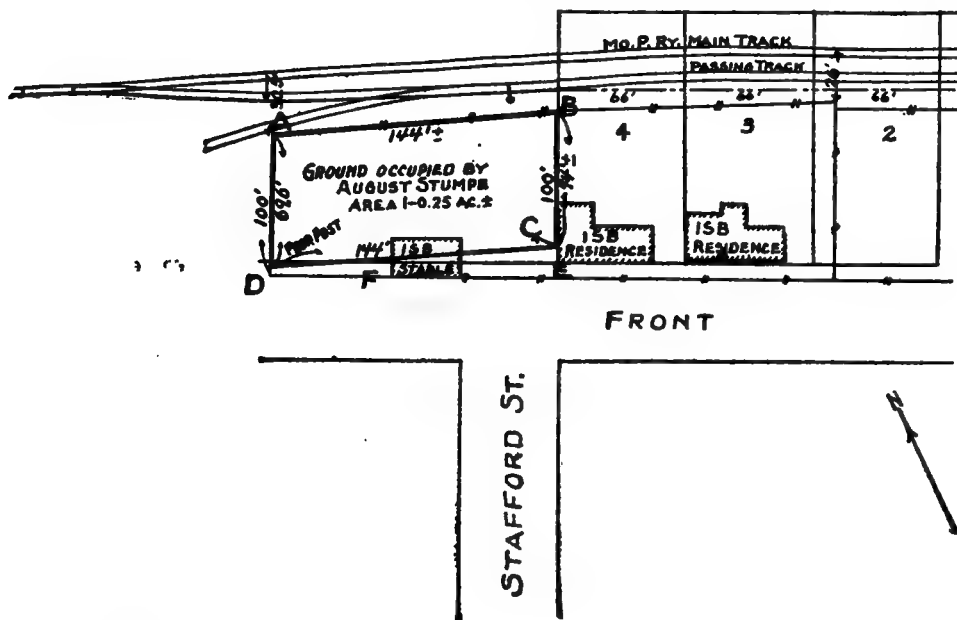

Ejectment by B. F. Bush, as receiver of the railroad and other property of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, against August Stumpe. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and cause remanded.

C. D. Corum, of St. Louis, and Jesse H. Schaper, of Washington, Mo., for appellant.

RAGLAND, C. Ejectment for recovery of the possession of about one-fourth of an acre of ground in the city of Washington, Franklin county, claimed by plaintiff to be a part of the right of way of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company of which he is receiver.

The petition is in the usual form. The answer admits that the defendant is in possession, but denies generally the other allegations of the petition. It further avers that the defendant and those under whom he claims have been in the adverse possession of the premises for more than fifty years.

Prior to the institution of the suit the plaintiff caused the premises to be surveyed. From such survey he made the following plat which he introduced in evidence at the trial:

The ground enclosed within the lines A B C D is that in dispute. It is conceded that the railroad company owns the ground north and west of it and the defendant lots 3 and 4 on the east and the wedge-shaped piece within the lines C E F. It was admitted that one McLean is the common source of title. June 30, 1853, McLean conveyed to the Pacific Railroad Company, the Missouri Pacific Railway Company's predecessor in title, a strip of ground 160 feet in width on which that part of its road and road bed from "station No. 970.20" westwardly to "station No. 1023.10" had been located, approximately a mile in length. That part of the strip that lay south of the center line of the track was 100 feet wide, that part that lay north was 60 feet wide. According to plaintiff's survey, "station No. 970.20" is the point of intersection of the west line of lot 4 with the center line of the railroad company's main track, and points C and D are each just 100 feet distant from the center line of the main track. It follows that, if the survey is correct, the ground in dispute is a part of that which was conveyed by McLean to the Pacific Railroad Company. The evidence affirmatively shows, however, that neither that company nor any of its successors ever occupied or used any of the ground for any purpose, or attempted to do so, until shortly before the commencement of this controversy which was occasioned by the plaintiff's effort to get possession preparatory to constructing or extending a switch track over a part of it.

Defendant put in evidence the deed records showing the chain of title under which he claims lot 4 and "the wedge-shaped lot adjoining said lot 4 upon which stands a brick stable." They are as follows: Deed from Elijah McLean to Benjamin F. Burch, dated February 23, 1856; deed from Burch and wife to Martha A. Lack, dated December 1, 1865; deed from Wm. J. Lack to Mary V. Lewright, wife of James N. Lewright, dated November 19, 1872; deed from Luther M. Lack and wife to Mary V. Lewright, dated February 22, 1873; deed from Mary V. Lewright and husband to I. W. Boulware, dated January 10, 1873; deed from I. W. Boulware and wife to Philip Mueller, dated March 15, 1892; and deeds from the heirs of Philip Mueller to defendant in 1914. In the deed from Burch to Martha A. Lack the "wedge-shaped lot" is described as follows:

"The said wedge-shaped piece of ground hereby deeded to said party of the second part extending westwardly from said lot 4 in block 9 of McLean's addition and lies between the northern line of Front street when extended westwardly and the land deeded to the Pacific Railroad Company by Dr. E. McLean, being eighteen or twenty feet wide where it joins said lot 4 and running to a point some distance westwardly, the contents not being precisely known, together with the buildings thereon, said wedge-shaped piece of ground being the same on which stands a stable built by the said B. F. Burch."

In the subsequent deeds down to the one from Boulware to Mueller it is described simply as a wedge-shaped lot adjoining lot 4 upon which stands a brick stable. In the latter deed made in 1892 the entire tract conveyed is described as follows:

"Lot 4 of block 9 of McLean's addition to Washington. Also a certain wedge-shaped piece of land in said city adjoining the aforementioned lot on west side of the whole of both tracts aforesaid, being bounded east by lot 3 of said block, south by Front street, north and west by Missouri Pacific Railroad."

In the deeds from the Mueller heirs to defendant this parcel is described as "a wedge-shaped piece of land adjoining the said lot 4 on the west side."

A residence on lot 4 and the brick stable on the wedge-shaped piece of ground had been built and were occupied and used in connection with each other as early as the fall of 1865. Philip Mueller purchased and received a conveyance of the premises in 1892, and immediately went into possession. He also acquired the title to lot 3 on the east. In 1902 the railroad company, desiring more room, offered Mueller other ground in exchange for a strip 7 feet wide off the north ends of lots 3 and 4 where they abutted the right of way. Mueller accepted the offer, and conveyed to the company the 7-foot strip, the deed of conveyance reciting that it was made "in consideration of the sum of one dollar, and exchange of ground." The railroad company, however, never made a conveyance to Mueller of the ground it gave him in exchange for the strip off of lots 3 and 4. The agreement between them rested entirely in parol, and, but for what they did in carrying it out, it would be impossible from the other evidence in the case to identify the ground that was to be conveyed to Mueller pursuant to its terms. Joseph Mueller, a son of Philip Mueller (then deceased), was the only witness offered by defendant who had any personal knowledge of the transaction. He stated that he heard the conversation between his father and the representative of the railroad company, and that it was agreed between them that for the strip of 7 feet his father was to get some ground "on the west end." He was unable to state more definitely what ground, or how much, his father was to get by the exchange, so far as the terms of the agreement which he heard were concerned. He testified, however, that immediately thereafter the railroad company set their fence back south a distance of 7 feet across lots 3 and 4, continued it thence westwardly along the northern line of the tract now in controversy, and thence southwardly along the western side thereof to Front street. That is, that the company at that time built its right of way fence from B to A and from A to D, as those points are designated on the foregoing plat, thereby inclosing the ground in question within Mueller's premises. He further testified that his father occupied and used the entire tract in controversy thereafter. So that the railroad company put Philip Mueller into the possession of whatever part of the ground in dispute that he was not at that time already occupying.

The evidence shows conclusively that defendant and those under whom he claims have been in the open adverse possession of the ground in controversy since 1902. It also shows a similar possession as to lot 4 and the "wedge-shaped lot" as far back as 35 years prior to the trial in 1916. But whether any of the ground in dispute, and, if so, what part of it, was included in the designation "wedge-shaped lot" by the witnesses is not clear. The only evidence as to the possession of any part of it prior to August 1, 1866, is the testimony of Judge John W. Booth. He testified that in the late fall of 1865 he rode from Indian Prairie, where he was living, to Washington, to visit his friend, Maj. James N. Lewright. He found Maj. Lewright living in the brick house just east of the brick stable, and his horse was put in the stable by his host. He was under the impression that the residence and the stable were under one inclosure, but he paid no attention to the boundaries, or whether it was in fact fenced, and consequently was unable to say whether Lewright occupied or used any of the lands surrounding the stable.

At the instance of the plaintiff the court instructed the jury that the deeds read in evidence by the plaintiff vested the record title to the lands sued for in the plaintiff for railroad right of way purposes. At the request of defendant the jury was further instructed to return a verdict for him "if the evidence shows that the defendant, and those under whom he claims, have been in the open, notorious, uninterrupted, exclusive, and adverse possession of the premises in controversy for a period beginning prior to August 1, 1866, up to the time of the commencement of this suit." The verdict and judgment were for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

[1] 1. Among others, appellant assigns as error the giving of the instruction asked by defendant. This because the evidence was not sufficient to warrant it. At defendant's instance the case went to the jury on the sole issue of whether he and those under whom he claims had been in the adverse possession of the land in question for a period beginning prior to August 1, 1866, and extending down to the commencement of this suit. By his instruction he seems to concede that the ground in dispute was originally granted for and as a part of the railroad right of way and hence to a public use within the meaning of section 1886, R. S. 1909; Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad Co. v. Totman, 149 Mo. 657 51 S. W. 412; Dice v. Hamilton, 178 Mo. loc. cit. 89, 77 S. W. 299. So much, therefore, will be assumed. As already stated, the only evidence as to the possession of any part of the premises prior to August 1, 1866, is the testimony of Judge Booth. From that it may be inferred that James N. Lewright was in possession of the brick stable in the fall of 1865. An inspection of the preceding plat discloses that about one-half of the stable is on the ground in dispute. At the time of Booth's visit the record title to lot 4 and the wedge-shaped lot that adjoined it and lay immediately north of the railroad ground was in Burch or Mrs. Lack. Burch conveyed to Mrs. Lack December 1, 1865, and, as heretofore noted, the wedge was described in that deed as lying between the northern line of Front street when extended westwardly and the land deeded by McLean to the railroad company, and being 18 or 20 feet wide where it joins lot 4. Mrs. Lack's heirs did not convey to Lewright's wife until 1872. The character of Lewright's possession is wholly undisclosed. Whether he claimed in his own right, or held under or in privity with Mrs. Lack, does not appear. In any event, such possession could not have been under color of title to a wedge-shaped lot exceeding 18 or 20 feet in width at its base. The wedge limited to that dimension would probably include all of the ground on which the stable stands, and but very little more of that in controversy. As the evidence does not tend to show that any of the persons under whom defendant claims was in the actual possession of the whole tract in controversy, or in possession, under color of title, of a part thereof in the name of the whole, prior to August 1, 1866, it does not support the verdict, and the judgment will have to be reversed.

[2] In the case of Bush v. Stumpe (No. 20,617) 222 S. W. 1006, a companion case to this, in which plaintiff sought to restrain defendant from building a stone wall along the northern boundary of the ground in dispute, decided at this term, we held on the same facts in proof in this case that Philip Mueller, having fully complied on his part with the terms of the agreement entered into between him and the Missouri Pacific Railway Company for an exchange of ground, and the company having put him in possession of the land in controversy pursuant to the agreement, he thereby acquired the equitable title to it, and that the defendant is now the owner of such title. That title defendant can, if he so elects, invoke as a defense to this action. Shaffer v. Detle, 191 Mo. 377, 90 S. W. 131; Tibeau v. Tibeau, 19 Mo. 78, 59 Am. Dec. 329.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jasper County;
R. A. Pearson, Judge.

Action by Ruth Ales against Harry Epstein and others. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is a proceeding in equity, and was commenced in the circuit court of Jasper county, Mo., at Carthage, on January 17, 1918. The cause was transferred to the circuit court of said county at Joplin, and tried there. The petition alleges that in December, 1917, the legal title to lot 6 in Moffet's subdivision, an addition to Joplin, Jasper county, Mo., was vested in the heirs of Mahala J. Chamberlain, deceased, namely, Albert Heanell, Nellie Elliott, Beulah Hennell, Anna G. Thompson, Mabel Hennell, and Kate Hennell, as tenants in common; that at the November term, 1917, of the Carthage circuit court, there was pending therein a partition suit between said Albert M. Hennell, as plaintiff, and the other tenants in common, supra, as defendants, in which a decree was rendered, providing for the sale of above lot, at public vendue, by L. C. Wormington, special commissioner; that said commissioner advertised said property for sale at the Carthage courthouse on December 20, 1917; that for a long time prior to said last-named date plaintiff herein had been in possession of said real estate as tenant; that said property was reasonably worth $4,525 and more; that plaintiff and defendant Harry Epstein had been personal friends for a long time, and she often went to him for counsel and advice in matters pertaining to her business ventures; that, relying on said defendant's superior ability and sagacity, and relying upon his honesty and fair dealing with plaintiff, she requested him to go with her to attend said sale, to act in her behalf, and to assist her in purchasing said property; that plaintiff agreed to pay him, in addition to his expenses, a reasonable sum for his said services; that said defendant agreed to act for her and perform the services aforesaid; that they were both present at above advertised sale; that plaintiff bid for said property $4,525, it being the highest bid, and which said sum she was willing, ready, and able to pay therefor; that said commissioner declared said property had been sold to plaintiff for above sum; that the undertaking and agreements aforesaid were by parol.

It is further alleged that said Epstein, in violation of said undertaking and agreement, wrongfully and fraudulently, for the purpose of cheating and defrauding plaintiff, in order that he might become the owner of said property, represented that it was to her interest that the deed from the commissioner for said real estate should be made, and delivered, to said Epstein; that he promised, without delay, to convey the same to this plaintiff; that, relying upon said defendant, as heretofore stated, she consented to above conveyance being made to him; that thereafter said defendant, in violation of his said agreement, for the purpose of cheating and defrauding her, conspired and confederated with the defendants Benjamin Raymond and David Raymond, whereby they procured said deed to be made to said Epstein and said Raymonds; that at all times since said sale she has been ready, able, and willing to take the title to said property in accordance with said agreement made with said Epstein, and to pay said $4,525, with the reasonable expenses and charges of said defendant, etc., and tenders the same into court.

The petition concludes by asking the court to declare that defendants hold the property in trust for plaintiff; that the court ascertain the amount of all moneys, if any, expended by said Epstein; to determine the interest thereon from date of said sale; to fix reasonable compensation to said Epstein for his said services; and that said defendants be divested of the title to said property, and the same be vested in plaintiff.

Defendants' answer contains: First, a general denial; second, it alleges that the agreements alleged to have been made in petition were not in writing, and are contrary to the statute of frauds; third, that plaintiff released in writing whatever claim she may have had to said property mentioned in petition; fourth, that the petition states no cause of action upon which plaintiff can recover in equity against defendants, or either of them; fifth, it charges that plaintiff and husband are aliens, and, as such, have no right to maintain this action.

Plaintiff moved to strike out the fifth ground above stated, and her motion was overruled. She then filed a reply denying the allegations of said answer.

We will consider the evidence and rulings of the court in the opinion to follow.

On May 18, 1918, the court found the issues against plaintiff, dismissed her bill, and judgment was entered accordingly. A motion for new trial was filed by plaintiff, which was overruled, and the cause duly appealed by her to this court.

John J. Wolfe, of Joplin, for appellant.

Haywood Scott, of Joplin, for respondents.

RAILEY, C. (after stating the facts as above). Appellant in her first assignment of error contends that the trial court erred in refusing to sustain her motion to strike out the fifth paragraph of defendants' answer, which reads as follows:

"That plaintiff and husband are aliens and subjects of the kingdom of Russia and not citizens of the United States, and have not lawfully declared their intention of becoming such, and under the law cannot hold real estate, and cannot maintain this suit for said lot, even though she might otherwise have some interest therein."

[1] In passing upon said motion, the allegations of paragraph 5, supra, must be taken as true. Section 750, R. S. 1909, among other things, contains the following provisions:

"It shall be unlawful for any person or persons not citizens of the United States, or who have not lawfully declared their intention to become such citizens, * * * to hereafter acquire, hold or own real estate so hereafter acquired, or any interest therein, in this state, except such as may be acquired by inheritance. * * *"

Appellant is here asking a court of equity to declare in her favor a constructive trust, and to vest the title to the real estate aforesaid in her, regardless of the plain provisions of above statute.

[2] If the plaintiff had received a deed to the real estate in controversy, conveying to her the absolute title to same, and these defendants were seeking to divest her of said title, on the ground that she is an alien and could not hold the real estate, then it might be well said that the state alone could attack the conveyance, declare a forfeiture, and take the property. If it was unlawful, as declared by above statute, for plaintiff, under the circumstances of this case, to take and hold the real estate aforesaid, it would be equally as unlawful for a court of equity to aid her in violating said law.

[3] We are therefore of the opinion that said paragraph 5 of defendants' answer constitutes a valid defense in this cause, and that the trial court committed no error in overruling appellant's motion to strike out same. Fishing & Hunting Club v. Kessler, 252 Mo. loc. cit. 436, 159 S. W. 1080; Davis v. Realty Co., 241 Mo. loc. cit. 259, 260, 145 S. W. 424; Garrett v. Kansas City Coal Mining Co., 113 Mo. loc. cit. 339, 20 S. W. 965, 35 Am. St. Rep. 713; Pacific R. R. Co. v. Seely et al., 45 Mo. 212, 100 Am. Dec. 369; Case v. Kelly, 133 U. S. loc. cit. 28, 10 Sup. Ct. 216, 33 L. Ed. 513; United States v. N. Pac. R. Co., 152 U. S. 300, 14 Sup. Ct. 508, 38 L. Ed. 443; Baker v. Schofield, 243 U. S. 120, 37 Sup. Ct. 333, 61 L. Ed. 626; Barnes v. Multnomah County (C. C.) 145 Fed. loc. cit. 700; South & North Ala. R. R. Co. v. Highland Ave. & Belt R. Co., 119 Ala. 105, 24 South. 114; 4 Clark & Marshall, Private Corporations, § 230, p. 3254; 3 Thompson on Corporations (2d Ed.) § 2393.

In Case v. Kelly, 133 U. S. loc. cit. 28, 10 Sup. Ct. 220, 33 L. Ed. 513, Mr. Justice Miller, in discussing the subject before us, said:

"It is next objected to the principle adopted by the court that the limitation upon the power of the corporation to receive land is one which concerns the state alone, and the title to such lands in a corporation can only be defeated by a proceeding in the nature of a quo warranto on behalf of the state. The case of National Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, is strenuously relied on to support this view. We need not stop here to inquire whether this company can hold title to lands, which it is impliedly forbidden to do by its charter, because the case before us is not one in which the title to the lands in question has ever been vested in the railroad company, or attempted to be so vested. The railroad company is plaintiff in this action, and is seeking to obtain the title to such lands. It has no authority by the statute to receive such title and to own such lands, and the question here is, not whether the courts would deprive it of such lands if they had been conveyed to it, but whether they will aid it to violate the law and obtain a title which it has no power to hold. We think the questions are very different ones, and that, while a court might hesitate to declare the title to lands received already, and in the possession and ownership of the company, void on the principle that they had no authority to take such lands, it is very clear that it will not make itself the active agent in behalf of the company in violating the law and enabling the company to do that which the laws forbid."

The same principle is clearly stated in 1 Ruling Case Law, § 32, pages 822, 823, as follows:

"In the absence of statutory prohibition against an alien holding real estate it follows, as in the case of a direct grant or purchase, that a use or trust in real estate for the benefit of an alien is valid until inquest and office found; but equity will never raise a resulting trust in fraud of the laws of the land, and therefore where an alien purchases land and takes an absolute conveyance in the name of a citizen, without any agreement or declaration of a trust, the law will not raise a trust in favor of the alien purchaser, who cannot hold the land, any more than it would cast it by descent upon an alien heir, who cannot hold it against the state. The result in such a case must be, either that the nominal grantee takes the land, discharged of any trust, by mere implication of law, or that there is a resulting trust in behalf of the people of the state, which they alone can enforce against the grantee in the deed."

The other authorities cited, including the latest utterance of this court in Fishing and Hunting Club v. Kessler, 252 Mo. loc. cit. 436, 159 S. W. 1080, are to the same effect.

The most casual reading of the case of Pembroke v. Huston, 180 Mo. 627, 79 S. W. 470, relied on by appellant, will disclose its inapplicability to the case at bar. In the above case, plaintiff sought to rescind a land contract which had been fully performed on each side, on the ground that he was an alien and had no right to hold the land which he traded, etc. Judge Vallant concluded the opinion in said cause, at page 642 of 180 Mo., at page 473 of 79 S. W. as follows:

"The plaintiff was not entitled to a rescission of the contract on any theory presented by him." (Italics ours.)

The above case is clearly distinguished from the one at bar, by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Baker v. Schofield, 243 U. S. 120, 37 Sup. Ct. 333, 61 L. Ed. 626.

The trial court was within the law, in refusing to strike out of defendant's answer paragraph 5, supra. Turning to plaintiff's own testimony, we find that she and her husband have lived in the United States more than four years; that they are citizens of Russia; that they have never been admitted as citizens of the United States, nor have they ever declared their intention of becoming citizens of this country, etc. We are therefore of the opinion that under the law and facts of this case the trial court committed no error in dismissing plaintiff's bill.

The judgment below is accordingly affirmed.

WHITE and MOZLEY, CC., concur.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of RAILEY, C., is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court.

All concur.

STATE v. WICKER. (No. 21908.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Witnesses \S 379(1)—Extrajudicial statements admissible for impeachment.

Generally, where a witness has made statement out of court in conflict with his testimony at the trial such statements may be shown to discredit his testimony.

2. Witnesses \S 388(3)—Cross-examination of defendant as to inconsistent statements improper.

Under Rev. St. 1909, \S 5242, providing that a defendant shall be liable to cross-examination as to any matter referred to in his examination in chief and may be contradicted or impeached as any other witness, cross-examination of defendant, to lay foundation for impeachment, as to whether the testimony of the prosecuting witness was not practically the same as his testimony at the preliminary trial and whether defendant had not stated that the prosecuting witness had sworn the truth concerning the difficulty, was improper.

3. Criminal law \S 695(1)—Objection that the question was immaterial insufficient.

An objection that a question as to where defendant secured a pistol was immaterial is no objection at all.

4. Witnesses \S 277(4)—Where defendant testified to using a pistol, cross-examination as to whether he was in the habit of carrying a pistol was proper.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to kill by using a pistol, where defendant on examination in chief testified as to using the pistol, cross-examination as to where he got the pistol and as to whether he habitually carried a pistol was germane to the direct examination, under Rev. St. 1909, \S 5242, despite objections that it tended to disclose a distinct offense.

5. Homicide \S 300(12)—Instruction not objectionable in failing to present the theory of self-defense.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to kill, an instruction requiring the jury to find that the act was committed on purpose and of malice aforethought, drawn under Rev. St. \S 4481, was not objectionable in failing to present the theory of self-defense.

6. Homicide \S 300(12)—Instruction not objectionable in failing to present the theory of self-defense.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to kill, where an instruction drawn under Rev. St. 1909, \S 4482, required the act to have been done without just cause or provocation, defendant cannot complain that the theory of self-defense was not presented.

7. Criminal law \S 823(6)—Error in an instruction on self-defense cured by others.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to kill, an instruction that a person is not justified in using any more force than is reasonably necessary, while erroneous in failing to tell the jury that a person is not required to nicely gauge the amount of force to repel an attack, was not cured where subsequent instructions announced the rule that defendant could act upon appearances and use whatever force was necessary to protect himself.

8. Criminal law §785(16)—Instruction on right of jury to disregard testimony of false witness not erroneous.

Where the court instructed that if any witness testified falsely the jury could disregard such false testimony, the failure of the instruction to announce that the jury could disregard all or any part of the testimony of such a witness was not erroneous.

9. Criminal law §747—Conflict in testimony for jury.

Where a witness as to defendant's peaceable character testified that he had heard defendant was convicted on a charge of common assault, and in another place that he was convicted of a charge of assault with intent to rape, the conflict was for the jury.

10. Criminal law §400(2)—Record of a previous conviction is the best evidence.

The record of a previous conviction is the best evidence, and is the proper objection to a question as to whether a witness had heard defendant had been convicted.

11. Criminal law §722½—Statement by prosecutor in argument that defendant had been charged with assault to rape not erroneous.

Where witness to the peaceable character of defendant, charged with assault with intent to kill, on cross-examination testified without objection that he had heard defendant had been convicted of assault with intent to rape, and in another place called the offense common assault, it was not erroneous for the prosecutor to state in argument that defendant had been charged with assault with intent to rape.

12. Homicide §163(1)—Where defendant introduced testimony as to his peaceable character the state may prove his former conviction.

Where defendant charged with assault with intent to kill offered testimony as to his previous peaceable character, it is competent for the state to prove defendant had been convicted of assault, etc.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Howell County;
E. P. Dorris, Judge.

William Wicker was convicted of assault with intent to kill, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. N. Evans and M. E. Morrow, both of West Plains, for appellant.

Frank W. McAllister, Atty. Gen., and Henry B. Hunt, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. Appellant was charged by information in the circuit court of Howell county with having feloniously, with intent to kill, assaulted one Earl Vaughan by shooting him with a pistol. Upon a trial the appellant was found guilty and his punishment assessed at two years' imprisonment in the penitentiary. From this judgment he appeals.

In the early part of the day of the shooting J. F. Vaughan, father of the prosecuting witness, and the appellant met in a public highway; no one else being present. Bad feeling existed between them, arising from a controversy in regard to the opening of a public road. Following an inquiry made by Vaughan as to the appellant's connection with this transaction the latter became angry and began to throw stones at the former; one of them striking him on one of his arms. Upon being struck he said to the appellant, "I believe you have broken my arm." To which appellant replied, "I don't care if I had broken your d—d head." Vaughan asked the defendant the cause of his anger and he said Vaughan had made a statement, evidently regarded as derogatory, to a neighbor in regard to him. Vaughan denied having done so; appellant said there would be another day, and they separated. Appellant stopped at a house on the highway and Vaughan went on his way and met his son Earl and another in a buggy about an eighth of a mile from where he had met the appellant. Vaughan had a talk aside with his son and they started down the road towards where Vaughan had left the appellant. When opposite the house where the latter had stopped, they saw him sitting in the doorway. Earl Vaughan called to him, saying, "If you want to throw rocks, come out and I will have a round with you." Appellant declined, when Earl offered him $10 to go down on the road with him. Vaughan, the father, added that if Earl did not have the $10 he would furnish it. Appellant then approached, and when distant about six feet he pulled out a pistol and fired at Vaughan, who had jumped off his horse on the opposite side from where appellant was standing. This shot went wild. Appellant then turned and shot Earl, who, with his companion, was sitting in the buggy. One of the shots struck him in the back of the head, inflicting a flesh wound, and the other, more serious, inflicted a wound in one of his knees. Appellant thereupon turned and went back to the house from whence he had come. Earl was making no offensive demonstrations at the time he was shot. There was evidence that some time prior to the shooting he had threatened to attack appellant with a pitchfork, and that the father had also previously made vague threats against appellant. This rancor all arose from the road controversy. Appellant and a witness, his brother-in-law, who testified in his behalf, stated that after some abusive words had passed between appellant and the father and son the latter leaned over in the buggy, looked back over his shoulder, and appellant began to shoot. There was testimony that Vaughan, the father, was of a quarrelsome disposition, but that the son was a quiet and peaceable citizen. There was a contrariety of opinion in regard to the reputation of the appellant, there being testimony that he was truthful and law-abiding, but subsequently the same witness stated that he had been convicted of an assault.

The errors assigned upon which appellant relies for a reversal, which we note in the order of the presentation, are: The improper cross-examination of appellant; the giving of certain instructions; and the remarks of the prosecuting attorney.

[1, 2] I. The language of the statute (section 5242, R. S. 1909) which it is alleged was violated in the trial of this case is that—

"A defendant shall be liable to cross-examination, as to any matter referred to in his examination in chief, and may be contradicted or impeached as any other witness in the case."

The examination of the appellant to which objection is urged was as to whether the testimony of the prosecuting witness was not substantially the same as his testimony at the preliminary examination. Upon appellant answering that he did not recollect, he was further asked if he had not stated that the prosecuting witness had sworn the truth concerning the difficulty at that examination, to which he answered, "No, sir." The state then introduced other witnesses who contradicted the appellant concerning his statements as to the testimony of the prosecuting witness at the preliminary examination.

Generally, where a witness has made statements out of court in conflict with his testimony at the trial, such conflicting statements may be shown to discredit his testimony. State v. Burgess, 259 Mo. loc. cit. 390, 168 S. W. 740. This rule, however, is to be applied under the limitations of the statute to a defendant testifying in his own behalf in a criminal proceeding.

Under the provisions of a statute enacted in 1877 (Laws 1877, p. 356), a defendant whose competency to testify in his own behalf was authorized by that act was, upon taking the stand as a witness, subject to cross-examination as any other witness (State v. Hathorn, 166 Mo. loc. cit. 239, 65 S. W. 756); but in 1879 (section 1918, R. S. 1879) the law was so amended as to confine the cross-examination of a defendant witness to any matter referred to in his examination in chief, and so the law has remained without change to this time (section 5242, R. S. 1909). The purpose evident from the questions put to the defendant and the examination of other witnesses was to lay the foundation for his impeachment. We have had occasion in recent cases to review this statute. In State v. Sherman, 264 Mo. loc. cit. 381, 175 S. W. 73, while treating it with the utmost liberality consonant with its terms and purpose, we said in effect that the cross-examination of a defendant in a criminal case was not to be confined to a mere categorical review of the matters stated in the direct examination, and that to warrant a reversal on account of its improper exercise the statute must be given a reasonable construction and the cross-examination must be in regard to matters material to the cause concerning which the defendant did not refer in his examination in chief, or, if immaterial, must be upon subjects tending to prejudice the jury against the defendant. Further, in State v. Stewart, 274 Mo. loc. cit. 659, 204 S. W. 10, the rule of construction announced in the Sherman Case, supra, and which has prevailed ever since the enactment of the statute in 1879, was reaffirmed, with the added statement that the cross-examination of the defendant should, to avoid reversible error, be limited to matters which by reasonable construction could not be regarded as material to the cause or from their nature could not prove prejudicial to the defendant. To the same effect is State v. Bowman, 272 Mo. loc. cit. 501, 199 S. W. 161, and cases. The cross-examination of the appellant transcended the limits indicated as permissible in the cases cited, and constituted error.

[3, 4] The inquiry made of the appellant on cross-examination as to where he got the pistol was objected to as immaterial. This constituted no objection. State v. Castleman, 255 Mo. loc. cit. 208, 164 S. W. 492. To the subsequent question put to the appellant as to whether he was in the habit of carrying a pistol, the objection was interposed that the inquiry tended to disclose a separate offense for which appellant was not on trial. On his examination in chief appellant had testified to using a pistol. His cross-examination, therefore, in regard to the weapon, was not improper. Section 5242, supra; State v. Rumpfelt, 228 Mo. loc. cit. 452, 128 S. W. 737; State v. Mitchell, 229 Mo. loc. cit. 630, 129 S. W. 881, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 908; State v. Sherman, supra; State v. Stewart, supra.

[5, 6] II. Objections are urged to instructions numbered 1 and 4 given by the court. The first is drawn under section 4481, R. S. 1909, and requires that the offense be shown to have been committed on purpose and of malice aforethought; the fourth is drawn under section 4482, which defines an assault to kill or do great bodily harm. The objection made to each is that it does not present appellant's theory of the case, viz., that his act was in self-defense. The instructions are not lacking in the usual formal requisites required in a case of this character. The first instruction required the jury to find that the act was committed on "purpose and of malice aforethought." The incorporation of these words in the instruction required the jury to find the facts negating the defense of self-defense before a verdict could be returned, and hence was not subject to the objection urged against it. State v. Stubblefield, 239 Mo. loc. cit. 533, 144 S. W. 404; State v. Lewis, 248 Mo. loc. cit. 504, 154 S. W. 716.

The fourth instruction contained the words "without just cause or provocation," the omission of which, it was held, rendered an instruction in State v. Helton, 234 Mo. loc. cit. 565, 137 S. W. 987, erroneous. State v. Janke, 238 Mo. loc. cit. 381, 141 S. W. 1136.

[7] Appellant contends that instruction numbered 10 is erroneous because it told the jury that a person is not justified in using any more force than is reasonably necessary to repel his assailant; that the instruction should have told the jury that a person is not required to nicely gauge the amount of force necessary to repel an attack.

In the cases of State v. Higginson, 157 Mo. loc. cit. 401, 57 S. W. 1014, and State v. McQuitty, 237 Mo. loc. cit. 236, 140 S. W. 869, instructions somewhat similar to the one under discussion, although more fully stating the law, were approved. Said instructions numbered 10, when read in connection with instructions numbered 11 and 12, brings instruction numbered 10 substantially within the instructions as mentioned in the Higginson and McQuitty Cases and avoids the rule in State v. Hopkins, 213 S. W. 126. Instructions numbered 11 and 12 each announce the rule that appellant could act upon appearances; that he could use whatever force and means were reasonably necessary to protect himself; that it was not necessary that the danger should have been real or actual; that if he believed he had reasonable cause to apprehend death or great bodily harm he had the right to use the pistol in the way he did. Instruction numbered 10, standing alone, is subject to criticism, but taken in connection with instructions numbered 11 and 12, the law of self-defense was fairly stated to the jury.

Appellant's contention that the instructions on self-defense precluded appellant's right to act on appearances, even though there was in fact no real danger, is not well taken. Instructions numbered 10, 11, and 12 embody the principles set forth and approved in the cases of State v. Shultz, 25 Mo. loc. cit. 153; State v. Pennington, 146 Mo. loc. cit. 35, 47 S. W. 799; State v. Hudspeth, 159 Mo. loc. cit. 196, 60 S. W. 136; State v. Gee, 85 Mo. loc. cit. 650; State v. Parmenter, 213 S. W. loc. cit. 441.

[8] Instruction numbered 9 was not erroneous, in that it did not tell the jury they could reject the whole or any part of the testimony of any witness who testified falsely. In the cases of State v. Hicks, 92 Mo. loc. cit. 434, 436,¹ State v. Mounce, 106 Mo. loc. cit. 229, 17 S. W. 226, and State v. Orr, 64 Mo. loc. cit. 344, instructions as to the credibility of witnesses, wherein the jury were permitted to reject the whole of the testimony of any witness who testified falsely, without the words "whole or any part" being used, were approved.

A glance at instruction numbered 9 discloses that the court used the following language: "You are at liberty to reject such false testimony." This instruction could not have harmed the appellant because the court instructed the jury to reject false testimony only. This contention is therefore without merit.

[9-12] III. Counsel for the state was not in error in telling the jury that the appellant had been charged with the crime of assault with intent to rape. A witness for the appellant, on cross-examination, testified that he had heard of appellant having been convicted on a charge of assault with intent to rape. Appellant did not object to the question or the answer. On redirect examination this witness testified that he heard that appellant's conviction was for common assault. This conflict in the testimony of the witness was a question for the jury. State v. Weber, 272 Mo. loc. cit. 480, 199 S. W. 147. Appellant's appropriate objection was that the record of the conviction was the best evidence. Having interposed no such objection, he cannot complain that the record shows that he was convicted of an assault with intent to rape. This witness was examined in chief by the appellant as to the trait of character involved in the suit, to wit, "for being a peaceable man." Having made this trait of appellant's character an issue in the case, it was competent for the state to prove his former conviction. State v. Beckner, 194 Mo. loc. cit. 288 et seq., 91 S. W. 892, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 535; State v. Spivey, 191 Mo. loc. cit. 110, 111, 90 S. W. 81; State v. Freeman, 238 Mo. 395, 141 S. W. 1095. This former conviction appearing in the record, the evidence authorized counsel for the state to argue that the appellant had been charged with the crime of assault with intent to rape.

For the errors noted, the judgment of the trial court is reversed and the cause remanded. It is so ordered.

All concur; WILLIAMS, P. J., in paragraphs 1 and 3 and the result.

JONES et al. v. PARK. (No. 21093.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Judgment ¶825—Adequacy of notice to sustain foreign judgment depends on law of the foreign state.

In a partition suit, where the court gave effect to a judgment in partition in a foreign state, whether the proceedings to give notice in such foreign state to nonresident defendants were adequate for that purpose is controlled by the law of such state.

2. Evidence ¶82—Foreign court presumed to have jurisdiction of proceedings forming basis of suit in this state.

Where, under Gen. St. 1883, c. 28, art. 4, § 1, a Kentucky circuit court is shown to have general legal and equitable jurisdiction, it will, in a partition suit in this state, be presumed to have had jurisdiction of a suit brought by administrators for partition of lands belonging to the estate, and to appoint trustees needed to carry out the provisions of the will and for a construction thereof; such proceedings constituting the basis of the suit in this state.

3. Judgment ¶17(1)—Notice essential to bind parties.

Although all property title to which is affected by a judgment in partition was before a foreign court and in its territorial jurisdiction, notice, either actual or constructive, to the parties interested was essential to conclude them by a decree concerning their titles.

4. Will ¶436—Presumed made with reference to law of testator's domicile.

It will be presumed that testamentary dispositions of property were made with reference to the law of the testator's domicile, and his intentions should be ascertained in the light thereof.

5. Judgment ¶822(4)—Foreign decree controls investments in this state, where beneficiary had constructive notice.

A foreign decree in partition, construing a testator's will, held to control the title to property bought in this state for the benefit of a resident of the state, provided such resident had constructive notice of the foreign suit.

6. Estoppel ¶15—Joinder in deed pursuant to foreign decree held not to estop grantor from attacking decree.

That a married woman joins in a deed conveying lands in a foreign jurisdiction pursuant to a partition decree granted in such jurisdiction held not to estop her as against other parties in interest, to deny the decree determining her interest, particularly where the other claimants have not acted in reliance upon such conveyance.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Platte County;
Alonzo D. Burnes, Judge.

Action by William Zollie Jones and others against Elihu Park and others for partition.

Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant named appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Haff, Meservey, German & Michaels and Samuel D. Newkirk, all of Kansas City, and Anderson & Carmack, of Platte City, for appellant.

Guy B. Park and A. D. Gresham, both of Platte City, for respondents.

GOODE, J. This action was instituted against eight defendants besides the appellant Elihu Park, for the partition of 445.76 acres of land in Platte county, Mo. As all the other parties submitted to the judgment of the court below, the appellant will be spoken of as the defendant, and as he acquiesced in the judgment in so far as it affected 29 acres of the total number of acres involved, that parcel will be understood as not included, unless specially mentioned, when we speak of the lands affected by the judgment.

Elihu Park was the husband of Laura Park, who died June 6, 1916, owning the lands in suit. They were married in Kentucky, where Mrs. Park resided, November 8, 1871, and immediately thereafter came to Platte county, Mo., where they lived until 1914. One daughter, Mary Park, was born to them October 4, 1874. She married Stuart Thompson, and died June 4, 1900, in the lifetime of her mother, leaving no children or descendants surviving her. Before her marriage Laura Park was Laura Ragan (or Regan; the name is spelled both ways in the record), one of the eight daughters of William Ragan, of Montgomery county, Ky., who died in 1881, leaving a last will, which was admitted to probate in the county court of Montgomery county, December 21, 1881. The will was signed, published, and witnessed September 2, 1867; but a codicil was added April 20, 1871. The eight daughters, who were the only children of the testator, were living at the dates of the will and of the codicil; and six of them were then married; but Laura (after November 8, 1871, Laura Park) and Anna Eliza (later Anna El. Burchett) were unmarried. Portions of the will are not relevant to the points involved in the present appeal, except that they show the intention of the testator was to equalize the distribution of his estate among his daughters, and, with that statement of their effect, they will be omitted. The material parts are as follows:

"Second. It is my will that my children Louisa Patterson, Mary C. Reid, Elizabeth Everett, Willie Benton, Sarah Bridges, Fannie Jones, Laura Ragan, Anna Eliza Ragan, shall have equally all my real and personal estate but the lands shall belong to them and their children for their own separate use and benefit not subject to the control, debts or liabilities of their said husbands; and the same shall belong exclusively to my said daughters. It is my will that if any of my daughters should die, before or after I do, the portion so coming to my daughter to come to and belong to her child or children. * * *

"I will that my personal estate consisting of money, stock, bank stock, etc., shall be sold by my executors and be equally divided among my heirs, but the same shall be laid out in land by my executors, and the lands so purchased, with said money, shall belong to my daughters and their children for their separate use and benefit, but it is my will if my daughters Laura and Anna Eliza, or either of them are unmarried at my death, their portion of my personal estate shall not be invested in land, but the same put to interest by my executors, who shall manage the same and the interest paid annually to my said daughters, and this with their portion of my real estate (the rent thereof) I deem sufficient for their support, but after my said daughters' marriage, or before if they so desire, the said fund shall be vested in land as before named, my executor shall execute this trust, and the land so purchased shall belong to my said daughters exclusively, for their own use and benefit and their children.

"It is my will and desire that if the portion of land that falls to either of my daughters shall not be suitable to their condition, the same may be sold, but the proceeds invested in other lands, and no title pass to said land until the title to the land so purchased shall be vested in my daughters and her children, as aforesaid. * * *

The parts of the codicil which need to be considered are as follows:

"I desire to make this additional paper a codicil to the will executed by me on the 2d day of September, 1867, and in the presence of Wm. Hoffman and John W. Clay. The same to be taken and considered a part of said will.

"First. My son-in-law Willis Bridges being in extremely poor health and not able to take upon himself the labors of settling up an estate I hereby revoke his appointment as one of my executors, leaving N. P. Reid my sole executor.

"Second. My two younger daughters Laura and Anna Eliza Ragan being unmarried should either or both of them die without issue, I hereby will and bequeath her or their share of my estate to the surviving sisters and if any of them be dead, the children of such shall take their mother's share, under the same limitation and restrictions that the original will conveys their share to them, viz. that it is to be their sole and separate property and not subject to the debts or control of any husband they now have or may have hereafter.

"Third. If I should decide upon dividing my lands out among my children the portion given to each is to be charged to her at such price as I shall fix upon it and if any one of my daughters gets more than her share of my estate she is to make the rest equal to her by refunding sufficient for that purpose. * * *

The executor named in the codicil refused to serve and so, on December 24, 1881, W. R. Patterson and W. H. Daugherty were appointed administrators with the will annexed. Said administrators and some of the persons interested as devisees and legatees provided for in the will, or as children of the devisees and legatees, filed a suit in the circuit court of Montgomery county, Ky., against the other persons interested as devisees and legatees, or as heirs of said legatees and devisees, for a partition of the lands whereof the testator died seized and which he had devised, and for a construction of the will in order to ascertain the interests of the various parties; also for the appointment of trustees to carry out testamentary directions, as far as trustees were required for that purpose.

Laura Park, her husband, Elihu Park, and her daughter, Mary Park, who was unmarried and a minor at the time the suit was filed, were named as defendants. These defendants were neither residents of nor in Kentucky, but were residents of and in Missouri at the time the suit was commenced, and there was no personal service of process on them. For that reason defendant Elihu Park asserts the decree rendered in the Kentucky case was not binding upon him or his wife, Laura, or daughter, Mary, and does not affect the title to which he succeeded as the husband of his wife and as the heir of her and of his daughter in the lands sought to be partitioned in this action; but plaintiffs say defendant, his wife, and their daughter Mary were made parties by constructive service obtained in accordance with the law of the state of Kentucky. At the foot of the petition in the Kentucky case, was this affidavit:

"State of Kentucky, Bath County.

"W. R. Patterson and W. H. Daugherty say the statements of this petition are true.

The affiants were the administrators of the will of William Ragan.

On the back of the petition were the following notations:

There was also an entry of record in the Kentucky case, under date May 25, 1882, that the attorney for the nonresidents had filed a statement and was allowed $5 to be paid and taxed as costs. The statement of the attorney is as follows:

"The atty. for the nonresident defts. herein, viz. Laura Park, Elihu Park, Mary Park, Fannie Jones, J. H. Jones and William Z. Jones, states that he has written to said nonresidents, duly informing them of the pendency of this suit; that he has received no reply to such communication from said nonresidents, or any of them.

"Wherefore he knows of no defense to make to this action and sees no reason why judgment should not be made, and prays the court to protect the interests of said nonresidents."

"Wm. A. Wilson,

"Attorney for Nonresidents."

A guardian ad litem was appointed for all the minor defendants, including Mary Park, and the order recited that they all had been duly summoned in this action. Said guardian ad litem answered, denying knowledge of the truth or falsity of the allegations of the petition, admitting those beneficial to his clients, and denying those that were prejudicial.

The portion of the decree material to the matter in hand is as follows:

"It is not the duty of the administrators to sell any of the land, which may be allotted to any of the devisees out of the testator's real estate, or to reinvest the proceeds in other lands, should the portion or portions allotted to any of the testator's children be not suitable to their condition or should they desire it sold and reinvested as provided by the will, but this court has power and will appoint a trustee or commissioner for that purpose, who will be required to be sworn and to execute bond with good security to faithfully discharge his duties. * * *

"Six of the testator's children, viz. Louisa Patterson, Mary C. Reid, Sarah Bridges, Elizabeth Everett, Willie Benton and Fannie Jones, by the will take a separate estate for life in their respective shares in the testator's estate and testator's grandchildren by said children take a vested remainder in fee in their respective mother's share subject to her said life estate. Two of the testator's children, viz. Laura Park and Anna Ragan, take a separate estate for life in their respective shares in the testator's estate, with the remainder in fee to the respective issue should they leave any, but if either dies without leaving issue, her share of testator's estate passes to her surviving sisters in fee, or if any of them be dead, the children of such take their mother's share in fee."

On June 5, 1882, a little more than a month after the decree and at the same term of the Kentucky court, William Mitchell was appointed trustee for Laura Park, to collect her share of the personality from the administrator of the estate and to reinvest the same in real estate—

"with the title taken to said Laura Park for her separate and exclusive use, free from the control of her husband for and during her natural life and at her death the remainder in fee to her child or children; but in the event of the death of said Laura Park without having issue, then the title to her share shall pass to her surviving sisters in fee, or if any of them be dead, the children of such to take their mother's share in fee—said trustee will report his acts to this court in writing with a certified copy of such deed or deed as he may obtain in making such instrument" (sic). (Our italics.)

On December 14, 1882, at the November term of the Montgomery county Kentucky circuit court, final judgment in partition was rendered, confirming the report of the commissioners theretofore appointed, which report was that day filed, and showed the lands of William Ragan's estate had been divided by the commissioners among the devisees according to the decree of the court. The court in its final judgment confirming said report made slight changes in it to equalize the interests of the various devisees, and directed John Jay Cornelison, who had been appointed master commissioner, to "execute deeds of partition conveying all the right, title, and interest of the parties herein, legal and equitable, in accordance with the will of the testator as herein construed, for the respective lots as assigned and set out in the report of division to the parties thereto entitled." The said master commissioner thereupon produced such deeds, and they were acknowledged in open court, examined, approved, and indorsed by the court and ordered to be recorded. The deed to Laura Park conveyed a parcel containing 138 acres of land, which had been set apart to her by the commissioners in partition as her share of her father's real estate, and contained a habendum clause different from the provision in the order appointing Mitchell trustee, in that the land was to be held by Laura Park—

"for her sole and separate use and as her separate estate for and during her said life, not subject to the debts of her present or any future husband, with remainder in fee to the issue of her body, if she have any, but if she dies without leaving issue, the remainder in fee to pass to her surviving sisters, or if any of them be dead, the children of such to take their mother's share in fee." (Our italics.)

The order appointing Mitchell said, "Without having issue." The same land so conveyed to Laura Park was conveyed by her and Elihu Park, her husband, and their daughter Mary (then Mary Thompson) and her husband, Stuart Thompson, and H. B. Kinsolving, the trustee selected by Laura Park to act under the will of her father, to Anna E. Burchett, formerly Anna E. Ragan, the daughter whose interest in the lands depended, as did Laura Park's on the codicil to their father's will. This conveyance was dated December 31, 1897, and contained the same habendum clause as the one contained in the deed from the master in chancery to Laura Park. With the proceeds of this land and of Laura Park's interest in the personal estate of her father, William Ragan, the land involved in the action at bar was purchased, except the aforesaid 29 acres; and Elihu Park says, except 91 acres more, for which he claims he paid part of the purchase price. All but one or two of the deeds (which followed the language of the order appointing Mitchell), conveying to Laura Park the lands involved in the present case, that were acquired from different vendors, contain this recital:

"The consideration paid for this deed is part of a trust fund arising from the will of William Ragan, late of Montgomery county, Kentucky, who was the father of Laura Park, and said land by the terms of said will, is her separate estate for life, with remainder in fee to her issue, should there be any; but if she dies without leaving issue, to vest in her surviving sisters in fee, or if any of them be dead, the children of such to take their mother's share in fee." (All italics ours.)

One of the deeds was made by the defendant Elihu Park directly to his wife Laura. It conveyed 160 acres of land, recited a consideration of $5,000, and contained a habendum clause, including the words "without leaving issue," immediately following the description of the land conveyed.

Another of the deeds, conveying land in Missouri to Laura Park (namely the deed wherein Oscar Wells was grantor), contained a habendum clause in this language:

"To have and to hold the premises aforesaid with all and singular the rights, privileges, appurtenances and immunities thereunto belonging or in any wise appertaining unto the said party of the second part as her exclusive, separate estate, free from any debts or interest or control of her present or any future husband, for life, with remainder in fee to her issue, if any survive her; if not, then to her sisters surviving her and the children of such as may be dead, forever."

The court below in its decree in the present case ascertained the respective interests in the lands in controversy of the various parties to the action, but those findings need not be given except as they concern the rights of Elihu Park. Putting aside the ruling regarding his interest in the aforesaid 29 acres, about which there is no controversy, the court found the remaining 416.76 acres, at the death of Laura Park, descended to and became the property of the various plaintiffs and defendants according to their respective interests as found by the court, except that the defendants Elihu Park and Stuart Thompson, the surviving husband of Mary Park, who, as said, was the daughter of Elihu and Laura Park, were decreed to have no right, title, or interest in said 416.76 acres or any part thereof.

In rendering this judgment the court below gave effect to the decree of the Montgomery county, Ky., circuit court, construing the will and ordering partition of the lands of William Ragan's estate, and held the Parks, husband, wife, and daughter, were bound by said decree.

Defendant, contending the decree was not binding on them, claims to own an undivided three-eighths in fee simple in the 416.76 acres, upon the following theory: That Laura Park took a life estate under the will of her father, with a vested remainder in her daughter, Mary, after the birth of the latter. Mary Park married Stuart Thompson, and died leaving him surviving; said Stuart under the law of Missouri inherited one-half of the interest of Mary Park in the lands in controversy; Laura Park, her mother, inherited one-fourth, and defendant Elihu Park the other one-fourth. At the death of the mother, defendant inherited one-half of her interest, that is, one-eighth, which, plus the one-fourth or two-eighths he had inherited from his daughter, vested in him an undivided three-eighths. He also claims that as there was issue born of his marriage with Laura Park, he is entitled to an estate by the curtesy in the undivided one-eighth of Laura Park's interest, which passed to her collateral heirs. This appeal was taken by him from the judgment.

Other facts will be stated, if necessary, in the course of the opinion.

[1] We stated the facts in this case in full for the purpose of disposing of the appeal on the merits. To do so it would be necessary to decide whether or not defendant, his wife and daughter, were affected by the decree of the Kentucky court, ascertaining and defining the interests of the wife and daughter under the will of William Ragan, an inquiry the answer to which depends on the sufficiency of the steps taken to give constructive notice to the Missouri defendants of the pendency of the suit. Whether the proceedings to give notice were adequate for that purpose is a matter controlled by the law of Kentucky, and not by that of Missouri. 13 Ency. Law (2d Ed.) p. 991; Monroe v. Douglass, 4 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 126, affirmed 5 N. Y. 447; Hunt v. Mayfield, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 124; Cassidy v. Leitch, 2 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 315.

[2] The circuit court of Montgomery county was shown, by a statute of Kentucky which was put in evidence, to possess general, legal, and equitable jurisdiction, and to have cognizance of all cases not exclusively delegated to some other tribunal. G. S. of Ky. 1883, c. 28, art. 4, § 1. This being so, it will be presumed to have had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit brought by the administrators of the will of William Ragan for partition of the lands belonging to his estate, the appointment of trustees needed to carry out the directions of the will regarding the estates devised to the daughters, the investment of the personalty in land, and for a construction of the will to make clear the duties of the administrator in carrying out the trusts the testator had created. Butcher v. Brownsville Bank, 2 Kan. 70, 83 Am. Dec. 446; Specklemeyer v. Dailey, 23 Neb. 101, 36 N. W. 356, 8 Am. St. Rep. 119; Leach v. Linde, 70 Hun. 145, 24 N. Y. Supp. 176; 13 Ency. Law (2d Ed.) p. 997, and citations in notes.

[3] All the property, both real and personal (the res), title to which would be affected by the judgment in the suit, was before the court and in its territorial jurisdiction; but notice, either actual or constructive, to the parties interested, was essential to conclude them by a decree concerning their titles. 2 Freeman, Judgments (4th Ed.) §§ 556, 557, 611; Monroe v. Douglass, supra; Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 279, 23 L. Ed. 914; Bradstreet v. Ins. Co., 3 Sumn. 600, Fed. Cas. No. 1798; Hassall v. Wilcox, 130 U. S. 493, 9 Sup. Ct. 590, 32 L. Ed. 1001. This rule has been applied in suits to partition lands when some of the owners were nonresidents of the states where the lands lay and the suits were brought. Kreiger v. Sonne, 151 Ky. 739, 152 S. W. 936; Mason v. Messenger & May, 17 Iowa, 261, 270. But though notice is required, actual notice is not. Cases supra.

The plaintiff introduced in evidence certain sections of the Kentucky statutes to show constructive notice of the suit in the Montgomery circuit court was given to the three Park defendants therein; and plaintiffs have cited in their brief certain decisions of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky construing the statutes providing for a warning order to nonresidents; construing also the appointment of an attorney "to make diligent efforts to inform" said defendants "by mail concerning the pendency and nature of the action against" them, as one of the statutory provisions reads. This method of notifying nonresidents of litigation to which they were parties took the place in Kentucky, at the time of the suit in Montgomery county, of notice by an order of publication, and the steps prescribed must have been followed substantially for the notice to be effective. Carr's Adm'r v. Carr, 92 Ky. 552, 18 S. W. 453, 36 Am. St. Rep. 614. Sections 57, 58, and 59 of Bullitt's Code of 1883, were proved; but section 60, which the Kentucky decisions hold fixes and determines the moment when jurisdiction is completely acquired by following the steps prescribed to notify a nonresident, was not proved. Nor were any of the decisions of the Kentucky Court of Appeals, which have adjudicated the effect of said statute, put in evidence, or their doctrines otherwise proved; and no stipulation was made that the relevant law of Kentucky might be noticed without proof of it. The question of whether there was notice to the Missouri defendants of the suit, if it should be decided without the aid of the omitted Kentucky law, would be answered in the negative. The statement filed by the warning attorney of what had been done did not show he had made diligent efforts to inform the Missouri defendants by mail of the pendency of the action, or that he had made any effort to inform them of its nature; but merely said he had written to them of the pendency of the suit, and had received no reply. Nor did the statement say where he had addressed his letter, though section 58 of Bullitt's Code provided that in the affidavit required to be made by the plaintiffs in a suit in order to obtain a warning order should be stated the post office nearest the place where said defendants resided; no doubt for the purpose of having the warning order attorney communicate with them by correspondence addressed to that post office. Other sections of the Kentucky Statutes bearing upon when the Montgomery court acquired jurisdiction of the Missouri defendants so as to bind them by its decree, and the decisions construing those statutes, were they before us, might show jurisdiction had been obtained so far as to make the decree good against attack in this collateral action. As to that we cannot decide in the condition of the present record.

[4] Not only is the record deficient in the evidence needed to pass upon the question of jurisdiction, but no statute of Kentucky or other evidence of the law prevailing there was put in evidence to elucidate, perchance, the meaning of the words "die without issue," and "die without leaving issue," yet the effect of William Ragan's will and of the Kentucky decree construing it may depend on the meaning of said words as defined in the law of that state. This controversy ought to be determined by said law; for the testamentary dispositions made by William Ragan presumably were made with the law of his domicile in mind, and his intentions should be ascertained in the light of it. Ford v. Ford, 70 Wis. 19, 33 N. W. 188, 5 Am. St. Rep. 117; Staigg v. Atkinson, 144 Mass. 564, 12 N. E. 354. Although we would be justified, perhaps, in deciding the case according to our own law, we have concluded to remand it to the court below for a retrial, in order that the parties, if they desire, may make proof of any Kentucky statutes or decisions which bear upon the questions involved.

[5] The plaintiffs say Laura Park took by her father's will, either a life estate or at most a defeasible fee which terminated when she died without leaving surviving issue; that therefore, regardless of the decree of the Montgomery circuit court, at Laura Park's death, her daughter having predeceased her, the limitation over in the codicil to her surviving sisters and the heirs of any sister who was dead took effect. We are cited to several Missouri cases supposed to support that proposition. We will not undertake to decide whether they do or not, but again say the matter should be determined by Kentucky law. The property disposed of by the will in favor of Laura Park was land and personal property, directed to be invested in land for her when she married, or before, if she desired. This was an imperative direction, and left the executors, or whosoever should execute the testamentary trust, no discretion. It was a conversion of the personal assets into land, at least upon Laura Park's marriage. And in fact the personalty actually was invested in land. If she, her daughter and husband were notified constructively of the Kentucky suit, then, wherever the proceeds of the property willed to her were invested, the decree in the suit controlled the title to the investment. Monroe v. Douglass, 4 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 126. But even if the decree was not binding and the estates taken by her and her daughter under the will must be ascertained without reference to it, the determination, as said above, should be according to the law of the testator's domicile.

The proposition is asserted that defendant is estopped to deny the Kentucky decree is controlling as to his interest in the lands in controversy, even if the notice attempted to be given therein to him, his wife and daughter was not effective. If that position is well taken, the decree ought to be given effect regardless of the question of notice. Whether or not it is well taken turns on what was done by Mary Park subsequently to the decree, although plaintiffs say it turns, too, on what defendant and his wife, Laura, did. We have shown, in stating the facts of the case, that two-eighths of the title claimed by defendant is as a direct heir of his daughter, Mary, and one-eighth is as the heir of his wife, to one-half of a two-eighths interest alleged to have been inherited by his wife from their daughter. He also claims an estate by the curtesy in the other one-eighth interest his wife is alleged to have inherited from the daughter. Therefore the entire estate claimed by defendant is derived, either immediately or mediately, from Mary Park; and, unless said Mary was estopped herself to deny the binding force of the Kentucky decree as regards her estate in the lands involved in this action, the defendant is not estopped by reason of privity with her—is not estopped to claim partly by direct inheritance from her and partly from his wife, who had inherited from her. The fact relied upon to raise an estoppel is the sale and conveyance of the 138 acres of Kentucky land conveyed to Laura Park by John Cornelson, master commissioner, as the portion of the lands of the estate of William Ragan allotted to Laura Park by the commissioners appointed to make partition among the devisees of said testator. This land was sold to Anna E. Burchett, and conveyed to her by a deed executed by H. B. Kinsolving, the trustee appointed to execute, for Laura Park, the power conferred in William Ragan's will to dispose of the land devised to any of his daughters, if it became unsuited to her condition in life, and to reinvest the proceeds in other land. Elihu, Laura, and Mary Park (then Mary Thompson) and her husband, Stuart Thompson, joined with the trustee Kinsolving in the execution of the deed to Anna E. Burchett. The land was conveyed 15 years after the date of the Kentucky decree. Mary Park was a minor when the decree was rendered. Assuming that Mary Park was not notified of the suit by the warning order, and hence was not bound by the decree, then, if there was no estoppel to prevent her from asserting her interest in her grandfather's estate, defendant stands in the same position in that regard, as he himself did nothing except to sign said deed to enable his wife to pass her title. Gill v. Fauntleroy, 8 B. Mon. (Ky.) 177.

[6] We hold the fact that Mary Park joined the deed conveying the Kentucky lands did not estop her (as against the other devisees in the will) to deny that the decree defining her mother's interest and her interest determined her interest in the Missouri lands purchased with the proceeds of her mother's portion of the property, real and personal, of William Ragan's estate. When Mary Park signed said deed, probably she knew of the decree; but the act relied on was too slight and remote a recognition of the decree, if a recognition at all, to raise an estoppel. Moreover, it nowhere appears anything was done by the parties who claim against defendant in the present case, or those under whom said parties claim, on the strength of Mary Park having joined in said deed, which would be prejudicial to the present claimants against Elihu Park were it not held Mary Park, and defendant Elihu, in asserting a title derived from her, were estopped to dispute she was bound by the decree. State v. Lales, 52 Mo. 396. If she was not constructively a party to the Kentucky suit, then her title and interest in the land in controversy here should be ascertained by an independent construction of the will, but, as said above, according to the law of the testator's domicile.

The case of McCune v. Goodwillie, cited by plaintiffs, is not apposite; for there the court held an Ohio judgment determined the rights of the parties to the suit in Missouri lands because, if some of the parties had not been brought before the Ohio court (and really it was held they had been), they had all made partition among themselves in pursuance of the Ohio decree. 204 Mo. 306, 336, 102 S. W. 997. There was no partition among the devisees of William Ragan to carry out the findings of the Kentucky decree, but only a sale of Laura Parks' land to Anna E. Burchett.

Possibly defendant is estopped, by the recitals in the conveyance he made to his wife of some parcels of the lands involved in this action, to assert an interest in those parcels, contrary to the effect of his recitals; but this question, as well as what the effect is, should be reserved for decision after the Kentucky law is proved, as the force of some of the recitals turns on that law.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

All concur, except WOODSON, J., absent.

SORRELL et al. v. BRADSHAW. (No. 20841.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
June 4, 1920.)

1. Descent and distribution §17—Brothers and parents inherit from deceased sister remainderman.

Where the grantor conveyed land to his wife for life, remainder to his daughter, and the daughter died childless and intestate, her estate, under the statutes of descent and distribution, would descend to her parents and her surviving brothers and sisters.

2. Estoppel §47—Conveyance carries after-acquired interest.

Where a life tenant conveyed land by warranty deed, after-acquired title which descended on the life tenant upon death of the remainderman passed under the deed by operation of law.

3. Husband and wife §119(3)—Deed direct from husband to wife carries the equitable, but not legal, title.

Where a husband by direct conveyance granted land to his wife for life, the remainder to his daughter, the deed vested the wife with the equitable title to the life estate, but the legal title remained in the husband in trust for the wife's use and benefit, and upon death of the husband during wife's life the legal title would vest in her.

4. Homestead §167—Conveyance of property and departure from the state is an abandonment of a homestead.

Where a husband who had established a homestead on land conveyed the same to his wife for life remainder to his daughter, and then departed from the state, never returning, his homestead rights, under Act March 24, 1873 (Laws 1873, p. 16) were abandoned, so where judgment was subsequently obtained against the husband and the land sold under execution the purchaser acquired all title which the husband had at the time of rendition of the judgment.

5. Estates §10(2)—Merger of equitable and legal estate.

Where a wife, by virtue of her husband's direct conveyance, received equitable life estate, and thereafter all of the rights of the husband were sold on execution and acquired by the wife, the equitable life estate of the wife became merged in the legal estate and fee thus obtained, if the legal title passed by the execution sale.

6. Homestead §129(1) — Execution against grantor not enforceable against homestead where grantees were purchasers for value.

Where a husband for valuable consideration conveyed land to his wife for life, remainder to his daughter, and they stood in the position of purchasers in good faith for value, their title cannot be divested on sale of husband's interest on execution under judgment subsequently obtained, notwithstanding the husband abandoned his homestead in the lands and the wife failed to file the homestead declaration as authorized by Acts 1895, p. 185.

7. Execution §41—Legal title of trustee cannot be sold on execution.

Where the judgment debtor merely held the legal title as trustee, it does not pass on execution sale.

8. Quieting title §19—Statutory suits to determine title may or may not be equitable, depending on the rights involved.

Suits under Rev. St. 1909, § 2535, are statutory proceedings which may or may not be equitable actions, depending on the issues involved; hence where no equitable rights were set up by either party such a suit is not equitable in its nature.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Maries County:
J. G. Slate, Judge.

Suit to determine title by Wm. Sorrell and others, against Joanna Bradshaw, who filed cross-bill. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Plaintiffs brought suit to ascertain and determine the title to a tract of land in Maries county. They alleged ownership in themselves as heirs of their father, E. J. Sorrell, and of their sister, Fannie E. Sorrell Tayloe, subject to the life estate of their mother, Mary M. Sorrell. Defendant filed an answer and cross-bill, denying plaintiff's alleged title and claiming ownership in fee in herself, and by a second count claiming title by adverse possession. Judgment went in favor of the plaintiffs, and defendant has duly appealed.

The following facts appear in the record: The three plaintiffs are the sons of E. J. Sorrell, deceased, and his wife, Mary M. Sorrell, who is still living. A fourth child, Fannie E. Sorrell Tayloe, married and died in 1901 childless and intestate, so far as this record shows. The land in question belonged to F. J. Sorrell. On April 27, 1878, E. J. Sorrell, while occupying the land as a homestead, conveyed it to his wife, Mary M. Sorrell, and to his daughter, Fannie E. Sorrell, by warranty deed, granting, however, a life estate only to the wife, with remainder over to the daughter. He then went to Texas and never returned. The wife and children remained on the homestead for 10 or 11 years thereafter. The land in suit was sold on October 15, 1879, under an execution issued upon a judgment rendered against E. J. Sorrell on April 17, 1879, and William Smith became the purchaser and on the same day received a deed therefor. This deed purported to convey all of the "right, title and interest of E. J. Sorrell." On January 19, 1880, Smith and wife conveyed the land to Mrs. Sorrell. At the time of the trial Mrs. Tayloe's husband had not been heard of for 10 or 12 years, and, according to rumor, had died in Texas about 1903 or 1905. E. J. Sorrell died about 1908 or 1909. On August 2, 1898, Mary M. Sorrell, "as a single person," conveyed the land by warranty deed to William Smith and J. W. Nieweg. By means of conveyances the title passed to defendant in 1903, and she took possession and paid taxes. How long defendant remained in possession or paid taxes the record does not show.

No other material evidence appears. No declarations of law were asked or given. The judgment is to the effect that plaintiffs are the owners of the land, subject to a life estate for the term of the life of Mary M. Sorrell, and that defendant is the owner of that life estate.

J. J. Crites and J. Ellis Walker, both of Rolla, for appellant.

Frank H. Farris, of Rolla, and L. B. Hutchison, of Vienna, for respondents.

WILLIAMSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] The common source of title in this case is E. J. Sorrell. He conveyed a life estate to his wife, Mary M. Sorrell, with remainder over to his daughter, Fannie E. Sorrell, afterwards Mrs. Tayloe. The daughter died childless and intestate in 1901, and whatever interest she had vested by inheritance, under our statutes of descent and distribution, in her three brothers, respondents, and her father and mother; each inheriting an undivided one-fifth interest in the remainder estate. Whatever title Mary M. Sorrell had she conveyed to appellant in 1898, by warranty deed. The question to be determined is, What title passed from Mary M. Sorrell to appellant? It is undisputed that she conveyed an estate for the term of her own life. If she had, or thereafter acquired, any other title, it also passed, by operation of law. Wood v. Smith, 193 Mo. 484, loc. cit. 490, 91 S. W. 85. Upon the death of E. J. Sorrell in 1906, his undivided one-fifth interest in the estate in remainder vested in his three sons, the respondents in this action, subject to the dower rights of Mrs. Sorrell, and such rights as Mrs. Sorrell thus acquired also passed to her grantee, the appellant. Since Mrs. Sorrell was already the owner of a life estate in this land, the interest she thus acquired became merged in that estate and need not further be considered.

[3] The conveyance from E. J. Sorrell directly to his wife vested the equitable title to the life estate in her, but the legal title remained in the husband, in trust, however, for her use and benefit. Stark v. Kirchgraber, 186 Mo. 633, loc. cit. 422, 85 S. W. 868, 105 Am. St. Rep. 629, and cases there cited. Upon the death of the husband during the lifetime of the wife the trust terminated, and the legal title to the life estate would then have vested in Mary M. Sorrell but for the fact that she had theretofore conveyed the property to appellant by warranty deed. By reason of that conveyance, this subsequently acquired legal title also passed to the appellant. Mrs. Sorrell also inherited an undivided one-fifth interest in the estate in remainder from her daughter, Mrs. Tayloe, and this subsequently acquired estate also passed by her conveyance to the appellant. Unless affected by the execution sale and the conveyances thereunder, the respondents are the owners of an undivided four-fifths interest in the estate in remainder, and the appellant is the owner of the remaining undivided one-fifth interest, and also of the life estate. The effect of the sale under the execution remains to be determined.

[4-6] E. J. Sorrell acquired a homestead in the lands in question about 1876. A judgment was obtained against him in April, 1879, an execution was issued thereon, and the lands were sold on October 15, 1879. But on April 27, 1878, Sorrell had conveyed the lands to his wife and daughter, and had gone to Texas, leaving his wife and children in possession of the homestead. Appellant contends that Sorrell thus abandoned the homestead; that under the law as it then was no homestead right accrued to Mrs. Sorrell or the children, and that the sale of the lands under execution vested perfect title in the purchaser, Smith, and that his title so acquired has been vested, by subsequent conveyances, in the appellant. This contention suggests an inquiry into the state of the law respecting homesteads at the time these transactions occurred.

[7] By an act approved March 24, 1873 (Laws 1873, p. 16) the General Assembly allowed to every head of a family a homestead of not exceeding 160 acres, and of a value not exceeding $1,500, and provided that such homestead should be exempt from sale under execution. It was further provided by this act that—

"Any married woman may file her claim to the tract or lot of land occupied or claimed by her and her husband, or by her, if abandoned by her husband, as a homestead; said claim shall set forth the tract or lot claimed, that she is the wife of the person in whose name the said tract or lot appears of record, and said claim shall be acknowledged by her before some officer authorized to take proof or acknowledgment of instruments of writing affecting real estate, and be filed in the recorder's office, and it shall be the duty of the recorder to receive and record the same."

This law was in effect until 1895. See Acts of 1895, p. 185. The lands here involved were, both as to quantity and value, within the amounts allowed by the statute and subject to its provisions, if applicable. Mrs. Sorrell never complied with the requirements of the statute above mentioned. At the time the judgment against E. J. Sorrell was rendered he had abandoned his homestead and the judgment lien attached immediately upon the rendition of the judgment, if it attached at all. It follows that the purchaser at the execution sale acquired all of the title which Sorrell had at the time of the rendition of the judgment in April, 1879. Smith v. Thompson, 160 Mo. 558, loc. cit. 562, 69 S. W. 1040. It is a further consequence that when the title acquired by the purchaser under the execution was vested in Mrs. Sorrell her equitable life estate became merged in the legal estate in fee thus obtained by her, if, in fact, the legal title passed by the execution sale. Bassett v. O'Brien, 149 Mo. 381, loc. cit. 391, 51 S. W. 107. That E. J. Sorrell had abandoned his homestead is clear, not only from the fact of the conveyance to his wife and daughter, but also from the fact that he left the state and never returned. But we need not long trouble ourselves about the homestead or the execution sale, for the conveyance from the husband to the wife and daughter was not a gift. It was a sale for a valuable consideration. The good faith of the transfer is not assailed. The wife and daughter stood in the position of purchasers in good faith and for value. At the time of the rendition of the judgment against Sorrell the wife and daughter were the owners of these lands, and a sale under an execution against him was, of course, ineffective to divest their title. E. J. Sorrell held the legal title to the life estate in trust for his wife, but trust property cannot be sold to pay the personal debts of the trustee, in the absence of a beneficial interest on his part. Morrison v. Herrington, 120 Mo. 665, loc. cit. 673, 25 S. W. 568. No such interest was vested in the trustee in this instance. Hence the rights of all the parties remain as they would have been had there been no execution sale at all.

[8] Waiving the proposition, suggested but not argued by respondents, that appellant's plea of the statute of limitations is fatally defective, and waiving also the question as to whether or not, under the facts of this case, appellant could claim adverse possession as against respondents, it suffices to say that the evidence of appellant wholly fails to establish title under the statute of limitations. On that point the evidence merely shows that appellant went into possession at the date upon which she received a deed to the property. There is no suggestion that she did not then have at least constructive notice of the condition of the title. How long she remained in possession, what the character of her possession was, whether peaceful, notorious, open, and adverse, or otherwise, nowhere appears. The plea of title by adverse possession under the statute of limitations seems practically to have been abandoned in the trial court. This is a suit at law and not in equity. No equities are pleaded by either party. Suits under section 2535, R. S. Mo. 1900, are statutory proceedings which may or may not be equitable actions, depending upon the issues involved. Lee v. Conran, 213 Mo. 404, loc. cit. 414, 111 S. W. 1151; Hauser v. Murray, 256 Mo. 58, loc. cit. 84, 165 S. W. 376.

In view of the fact that our rulings upon these matters lead to a final disposition of this case, it becomes unnecessary to discuss various interesting questions presented and argued with much ability by learned counsel.

Since the decision of the trial court is at variance with the conclusions here announced, it follows that the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to set aside the judgment entered in this cause and to enter a decree adjudging the respondents to be the owners of an undivided four-fifths interest in the land herein involved, subject to a life estate in favor of appellant during the term of the natural life of Mary M. Sorrell, and further adjudging the appellant to be the owner of the remaining undivided one-fifth interest and of a life estate in said land for the term last above mentioned. It is so ordered.

GILBERT v. HILLIARD. (No. 15923.)

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Argued and Submitted May 11, 1920. Opinion Filed June 8, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 23, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error §930(1)—Party who secured verdict entitled to presumptions in favor of testimony.

Plaintiff, having secured verdict, on appeal is entitled to every reasonable presumption in favor of his testimony.

2. Master and servant §288(1)—Negligence in furnishing vicious team held for jury.

In action for injuries to driver of a wagon when ordered to get on top while driving to hold down a load of wet shingles, he having been thrown off under wagon by attempt of horses to jump a drain, assignment of negligence in respect of the viciousness of the team or one of them, and that the team on some previous occasion had run away, held for jury under evidence.

3. Master and servant §286(3)—Negligence of foreman in requiring plaintiff to drive from unstable load a jury question.

In an action for injuries to a driver ordered to get on top while driving to hold down a wagon load of wet shingles, he having been thrown off under wagon by attempt of horses to jump a drain, question of negligence of defendant employer's foreman in requiring plaintiff to drive from the load held for jury.

4. Master and servant §222(1)—Driver ordered to drive from unstable load did not assume risk.

Driver of a team loaded with wet shingles, ordered by his foreman to drive from the load did not assume the risk of getting upon the load accordingly, though the facts relied on by the master when sued for injuries may be taken into consideration in determining the question of contributory negligence.

5. Master and servant §245(4)—Servant not negligent in doing thing ordered.

Where both master and servant have equal knowledge of the danger incurred by the servant in obeying an order, the jury may assume the servant is free from negligence in doing it.

6. Negligence §4—Term defined; "ordinary care."

"Negligence" is properly defined in an instruction as failure to use ordinary care, which is the care which reasonably prudent men would use under the same and similar circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Negligence; Ordinary Care.]

2. Trial §219—Instruction not defining "dangerous" not erroneous.

The word "dangerous" has so common and well-understood a meaning that an instruction in a servant's action for injuries, merely using and not defining it, is not erroneous.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Charles B. Davis, Judge.

"Not to be officially published."

Action by Charles F. Gilbert against George Hilliard. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George W. Lubke and George W. Lubke, Jr., both of St. Louis, for appellant.

Sears Lehmann and Lehmann & Lehmann, all of St. Louis, for respondent.

REYNOLDS, P. J. This is the second appearance of this case in our court. When here on a former appeal the judgment of the circuit court was reversed and the cause remanded, as will be seen by an examination of our opinion, as see 187 S. W. 594, not to be officially reported. It was recited in the petition then before us, that the defendant's agent "negligently ordered the plaintiff to stand upon the wagon overloaded with wet shingles on which his footing was insecure," etc. Our court held that there was no evidence in the case of any such specific order and no direction in the instructions on which to base a finding of the giving of any such order, and at first reversed the judgment without remanding the cause. On a motion for rehearing being filed, the court modified this order, reversed the judgment of the circuit court and remanded the cause, on the theory that on a new trial, if one was had, the petition might be amended in such manner as to show that the negligent order in evidence in the case, that the plaintiff should drive from the wagon, might have meant, under the facts in the case, that the plaintiff was to stand on the wagon, that is, considering the condition and kind of load, that it would naturally be inferred that he was to stand while driving and that that was what the foreman intended.

An amended petition was filed, in which it is averred, among other things, that owing to the fact that the wagon was overloaded and that there was no seat or footboard, and no place for the driver to sit upon the wagon, and to drive from the wagon required the driver to get upon the shingles, which were wet and slippery and had been thrown upon the wagon in that condition, and were loose, and that when plaintiff suggested to defendant's foreman that he drive the team from the ground, the foreman ordered plaintiff "to get upon the wagon for the purpose of driving said team;" that in obedience to the order plaintiff got on the wagon and attempted to drive and that when he had driven a short distance, owing to the nature of the ground, some of the shingles slipped off, which frightened the horses and they immediately started to run away, and that plaintiff, endeavoring to hold them, the horses vicious and hard-mouthed, and owing to the fact that he was standing upon the wet, loose shingles, he was thrown and fell from the wagon and was run over by the wagon and badly injured. The negligence charged is "that the defendant, George Hilliard, through his foreman, Charles Hilliard, negligently ordered the plaintiff to get upon a wagon overloaded with loose, wet shingles on which his position was insecure and dangerous, as was known to defendant's foreman, and drive a team known to be vicious and liable to run away, when it was known to defendant's foreman that said team could have been safely driven from the ground."

The answer, after a general denial, averred contributory negligence and assumption of risk. To this there was a reply, and on trial before the court and a jury, a verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $8,350 was returned, judgment following, from which defendant has duly appealed.

[1] The aspect which the case would assume on a proper petition and as indicated by our court when the case was before us on the first appeal, was met by amendment and by the evidence and renders it unnecessary to make a very extensive discussion of it. As testified to by plaintiff, and of course he is entitled on an appeal and with a verdict, to every reasonable presumption in favor of his testimony, is, that after dumping out a load that he had had in the wagon, he picked up part of a lot of shingles and had loaded the lower bed and sideboards and was about to get in, when the foreman, Charles Hilliard, came around and said, "We will put them all on," referring to the shingles that were lying there; that to do that they stuck shingles edgewise in the bed all around and piled shingles in the middle up high, about 18 inches above the side, with loose shingles above the bed. These shingles were wet all the way through. The last ones loaded were muddier than the first because they were taken out of the manure; it was not wet, it was moist. They had been lying out in the mud and manure together. The foreman, still present and assisting, and the shingles loaded, plaintiff unwrapped the lines and started to drive from the ground. The foreman said, "Get up on the shingles and hold them down;" to which plaintiff said, "If I do I think I will fall off;" to which the foreman said, "Get up;" and plaintiff said that he knew the foreman well enough to obey orders if he wanted to stay around there. Plaintiff started off, standing about the center of the load, the shingles thrown in loosely, the foreman standing up back of the end of the wagon. The foreman followed behind the wagon with a board. Going around the barnyard and toward his destination he came to a drain with water in it. When the team came to it they stopped—their feet in the edge of the water, and then leaped forward. As they did that plaintiff tried to hold them, the load shifted forward and so did plaintiff and he went off on to the right-hand horse and held on to him and the horses started to run away with him in that position. There was water in this drain and the wagon wheels went down into it. Plaintiff held on a little to the horse but had to let loose and fell behind the right-hand horse and was run over and severely injured, there being testimony to the effect that he would never be as able to work as before the accident. He further said that he had stood upon the load because it would have been impossible to sit, and if he stood up and anything happened he would have a chance to jump.

The assignments of error by learned counsel for the appellant are to the failure of the court to sustain demurrers to the evidence interposed by defendant at the close of plaintiff's case and again at the close of the whole case.

[2] We do not think this assignment is tenable. While it is charged that the team—or at least one of them—was vicious, and that the team on some previous occasion had run away, it must be said that the evidence about this is rather slight as is the evidence that they were hard-mouthed. That point, however, is not of any particular importance, further than to say that there was sufficient evidence to allow that assignment of negligence to go to the jury.

[3] There was sufficient evidence to go to the jury as to the negligent order that the foreman of defendant gave to require the plaintiff to drive from the load—to get up on the load and drive from there. There is evidence to show that there was no seat or footboard to the wagon; that the shingles were wet; that they had been exposed to a rain a few days before and that the shingles which were on top of the load had been lying on a manure pile and were damp and wet. There was evidence to the effect that the usual way under such circumstances for the driver, if he was riding on the load at all, was to stand up. Plaintiff said that was the safest way. In doing so, therefore, plaintiff was doing no unusual thing, doing what might be expected by the foreman that he would do when ordered to get up on top of the load and drive from that position. In other words, it could hardly have been anticipated by the foreman, or by plaintiff, that he was to sit on this load in the condition in which the shingles were. The evidence tended to show that the usual and safest and natural position would be to stand, if riding on the load.

[4, 5] Learned counsel for appellant insists with great force that plaintiff assumed the risk and cite authorities from other states sustaining that view. But our courts have long since repudiated the doctrine of assumption of risk, as that doctrine is here sought to be applied; but the facts relied upon may be taken into consideration when determining the question of contributory negligence. This is so well established in our state that it is hardly necessary to cite authorities in support of it. One of the latest, however, is that of Williams v. Pryor et al., 272 Mo. 613, loc. cit. 621, 200 S. W. 53. Where both master and servant have equal knowledge of the danger incurred by a servant in obeying an order of the master, the jury may assume that the servant is free from negligence in doing it, because it cannot be said that the servant and master are on an equal footing, even when they have equal knowledge of the danger. Jewell v. Kansas City Bolt & Nut Co., 231 Mo. 176, loc. cit. 202, 132 S. W. 703. We hold, therefore, that there was no error in submitting this case to the jury.

[6, 7] But those same learned counsel assign as their second and third errors, that the instructions asked and given at the instance of plaintiff were erroneous. When we examine the argument of those learned counsel as to these assignments, it appears that the point of objection is that the instructions directed the jury to find, among other things, "that owing to these facts it was dangerous for plaintiff to get upon the wagon and drive said team;" and that both of these instructions use the expression, after requiring the jury to find certain specific facts, and that notwithstanding such facts, the foreman of the defendant "negligently ordered the plaintiff to get upon said wagon," and that the plaintiff "was negligently ordered into this position" by the foreman, etc. It is argued that the instructions do not attempt to define the terms "dangerous" or "negligently." As to the last, counsel is in error. By an instruction given by the court the jury were told that negligence, as used in these instructions, "is the failure to use ordinary care, which is the care which reasonably prudent men would use under the same and similar circumstances." That is an entirely sufficient definition as to the word "negligence," and as well covers the word used, "negligently." The word "dangerous" is certainly a word of such common and well-understood meaning that it is difficult to imagine a definition of it that would not be more confusing than the use of the word itself.

The fourth assignment is to the overruling of defendant's motion for new trial. In the light of what we have said above, that action was proper.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

1. Carriers \S 223—Prompt notification of embargo defense for delay in shipment of hogs.

If an embargo on all live stock shipments on account of weather conditions was justified, it was a defense, in an action for damages for failure to promptly ship hogs, that the shipper was promptly notified thereof, even after the hogs were in the pens ready for shipment.

A legal question is never permissible in an instruction.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Livingston County; Arch B. Davis, Judge.

Action by Claude Stewart against the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

H. J. Nelson, of St. Joseph, Frank Sheetz, of Chillicothe, J. C. Carr, of Cameron, and M. G. Roberts, of St. Joseph, for appellant.

Edwin C. Orr, of Chillicothe, for respondent.

TRIMBLE, J. This is an action for negligent delay in the commencement of a shipment of hogs and negligent delay in the transportation thereof after the journey was begun. The shipment in question was from Meadville, Mo., to Kansas City, Mo., and was at all times wholly intrastate.

Plaintiff contemplated shipping hogs on Monday evening, December 10, 1917. He brought in some of his hogs on Saturday evening and placed them in the stock pens. He had an arrangement with the station agent at Meadville for a car, and Monday morning the car was at the chute. The rest of his hogs were delivered in the pens that morning between 8:30 and 9 o'clock. According to plaintiff's evidence, after they were in the pens, the agent notified him that on account of extraordinary weather conditions an embargo had been placed upon all live stock shipments. (A blizzard and snowy condition prevailed.) Plaintiff was notified of the embargo about 10 o'clock Monday morning, as soon as possible, and about 10 hours before the shipment was to commence. According to defendant's evidence, the hogs had not all arrived at the pens when plaintiff was notified. The hogs remained in the pens Monday night, and on Tuesday morning the agent informed plaintiff the embargo was off, but about 12 or 1 o'clock Tuesday, long before the time of the train plaintiff was intending to use, the station agent informed him that the embargo was on again, and plaintiff's hogs remained in the pens (fed and cared for by him) until Thursday evening, when, upon plaintiff signing a contract agreeing to ship subject to delay, the hogs were loaded into the car and the shipment to Kansas City began. They should have gotten to Kansas City about 6 o'clock Friday morning. A part of the evidence in plaintiff's behalf is to the effect that the shipment arrived in Kansas City Friday afternoon, too late for the market of that day, and was held over and sold on a lower market than that of Tuesday, on which market they would have been sold had the shipment been made Monday evening, as originally contemplated. The suit is for this loss, the shrinkage, and the extra feed required. Upon rebuttal, however, it was elicited from a witness for plaintiff, who had a shipment on the same train as plaintiff's hogs, and who accompanied his shipment, that the stock arrived in Kansas City about 6 o'clock Friday morning, but the hogs were not unloaded until in the afternoon, because the pens were full.

Although mention is made in the brief of general congested traffic conditions, on account of war conditions and government transportation of troops and war material, yet the only thing pleaded was a blockade of snow and weather conditions, whereby defendant was compelled to refuse to accept or carry shipments until plaintiff's was accepted, subject to delay on account of conditions, on Thursday, December 13, 1917. According to plaintiff's evidence, trains passed through Meadville going to Kansas City during the time of the claimed embargo, and carried other freight, but no live stock was moved. This and other evidence as to weather conditions made it a question for the jury as to whether an embargo was justified or not. Hence the claim that the demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained cannot be upheld.

Under the instructions given on both sides, the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $114, and appellant complains of error in the instructions given in plaintiff's behalf. Plaintiff's instruction No. 1 told the jury, among other things, that if, "previous to the time that the plaintiff or his agent * * * were notified or had any knowledge of an embargo on shipments of live stock, plaintiff delivered to the defendant the remainder of the hogs intended for shipment, then it became and was the duty of the defendant to exercise ordinary and reasonable care to transport and deliver such hogs at the stockyards * * * within a reasonable time, and if the jury find * * * that defendant failed to exercise reasonable and ordinary care to so transport and deliver said hogs after they were delivered to it, and that by reason of such failure," etc., plaintiff was compelled to feed said hogs, and they suffered a shrinkage, and plaintiff received on the market less for his hogs, then the verdict should be for plaintiff.

[1] If the embargo was justified, it was a defense if the shipper was promptly notified thereof, whether it was before or after the hogs were in the pens. 10 Corp. Juris, 290, 292; 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 256; Dillender v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 149 Mo. App. 881, 387, 180 S. W. 107; Weesen v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 175 Mo. App. 874, 162 S. W. 304; Dawson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 79 Mo. 296; Shoptaugh v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 147 Mo. App. 8, 17, 126 S. W. 752; Cronan v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 149 Mo. App. 384, 130 S. W. 437. Now, the above-quoted instruction did not submit the issue of the defense pleaded, but went upon the theory that, even if the embargo was lawful, yet if the hogs were in the pens at the time plaintiff was notified, the defendant would be liable if the hogs were not delivered within a reasonable time. Or, to state it another way, the jury were allowed to say the hogs were not delivered within a reasonable time by the exercise of ordinary care, even if conditions did justify an embargo, provided the hogs were in the pens at the time he was notified of the embargo.

[2] It is contended by plaintiff that the giving of defendant's instruction B cured all difficulty, if any there is, in plaintiff's instruction. We do not think so. It permitted and authorized the jury to find a verdict for plaintiff, without passing upon the existence of the conditions which would justify defendant in placing an embargo on shipments on account of weather conditions. If it can be said that their existence was in any way involved in said instruction No. 1, it could only be so in the shape of a legal question, which is never permissible in an instruction. The instruction also permitted a recovery for negligent delay occurring after the shipment started Thursday night; but in defendant's instruction A the jury were told there was no evidence of negligent delay after the transportation started. The two were in conflict. It is true plaintiff's instruction does not refer specifically to any delay in transit, but, under the instruction, the jury are permitted to allow for it.

Other complaints are made, but they need not be noticed. The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

All concur.

In a realty broker's action for commission, evidence held to justify finding that plaintiff's efforts were the procuring cause of sale.

8. Evidence §472(11)—Question to purchaser whether plaintiff's efforts induced him to buy properly excluded.

In a realty broker's action for commission earned by selling a property, the question asked of the purchaser whether plaintiff's efforts had anything to do with his buying held properly excluded as being a conclusion upon a question for the jury; purchaser being allowed to detail all facts and to tell what was done.

9. Brokers §88(2)—Existence of conditions to right to commission for jury.

In a broker's action for a sale commission, whether either or both of two conditions that he must sell to some one other than the actual purchaser and that he must sell for $9,500 were a part of the contract held for jury.

10. Trial §253(7)—Instructions directing verdict should not omit necessary issues.

Instructions which direct verdict should not omit any of the issues which are a necessary part of plaintiff's case.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pettis County; Hopkins B. Shaln, Judge.

Action by E. S. Shortridge against Chas. H. Raiffeisen in justice court. From judgment for plaintiff on a trial de novo on appeal to the circuit court, defendant appeals. Reversed, and cause remanded for new trial.

C. C. Kelly and Lamm, Bohling & Lamm, all of Sedalia, for appellant.

W. W. Blain and A. L. Shortridge, both of Sedalia, for respondent.

TRIMBLE, J. This action originated in a justice court, and is a suit by a real estate broker for his commission. The case was tried anew in the circuit court on appeal, and the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff. The defendant has appealed.

The statement filed with the justice, and upon which the case was tried, is, for the first time, attacked in this court as being insufficient. It reads as follows:

"Sedalia, Missouri, Jan. 4, 1919.

"Charles H. Raiffeisen to E. S. Shortridge, Dr. To commission of 2½ per cent. on real estate valued at $9,500 located at No. 1009 West Third St., Sedalia, Mo., $237.50."

[1-3] In view of the liberality of construction and requirement accorded pleadings in a justice court, we are unwilling to hold the above to be so defective as to state no cause of action at all. It gives the names of the debtor and the plaintiff or creditor, the amount of the debt claimed, the rate per cent. of the debt claimed as a commission, and designates the real estate on which the commission is claimed. Indeed, the words "sale of" after the word "on" and before the words "real estate" are all that is lacking to make the statement complete in every particular and free from the most technical criticism. We think the statement is sufficient to inform the defendant of the nature of the action and to bar recovery in another suit. When it meets these requirements, it will not be held to be fatally defective so as not to support the judgment. Jarrett v. Mohan, 142 Mo. App. 29, 33, 126 S. W. 212; Smith v. Truitt, 107 Mo. App. 1, 7, 80 S. W. 686. However, even if it be deemed defective, it could on a remand be amended. Rechnitzer v. Vogelsang, 117 Mo. App. 148, 152, 93 S. W. 326. And since the judgment will have to be reversed and the cause remanded for a reason hereinafter stated, the plaintiff can amend it by inserting the omitted words showing it was for a sale of the real estate.

The facts of this case make it somewhat unusual and a little out of the ordinary line of cases of this character. This is not a case where the broker finds a purchaser or introduces him to the owner, but is one where the owner and the purchaser to be have been negotiating with each other over a purchase of the property but their negotiations have not been successful, and the broker comes into the affair and exerts his efforts to accomplish or bring about a sale, and after he has exerted his efforts and has repeatedly gone back and forth between them, and finally, on the day the sale was made, telephones the purchaser to come into town on that day, and the purchaser in response to the telephone comes, but instead of going to the broker meets with the owner and closes the deal without him.

[4] Defendant insists that this was a special contract; that plaintiff was employed to effect a sale at a certain price in cash, and that as the sale was not made at that price or on the terms specified the plaintiff did not perform his contract, and hence is not entitled to recover; also that there is no evidence in the case tending to show that plaintiff's efforts were the procuring cause of the sale. With reference to this, it may not be amiss to observe that no demurrer to the evidence was interposed, and defendant joined with plaintiff in asking the court to instruct upon the issues, thereby admitting that there was evidence upon which to go to the jury. Kenefick Hammond Co. v. Norwich Ins. Society, 205 Mo. 294, 312, 103 S. W. 957; Hansen v. Boyd, 161 U. S. 397, 402, 16 Sup. Ct. 571, 40 L. Ed. 746; Hartford Ins. Co. v. Unsell, 144 U. S. 439, 451, 12 Sup. Ct. 671, 36 L. Ed. 496.

We are not in a position to say that conclusively plaintiff had only a limited contract, and therefore cannot recover because he did not perform the terms thereof. The evidence is that when plaintiff first spoke to defendant about selling the house for him he (plaintiff) told defendant that Denny was the man he had in view as a prospective purchaser. Defendant said: "There is nothing to him. He won't buy a house. He has been talking about buying a house for a long while and you can't sell him the house. You can't sell him any house." Plaintiff asserted that he could sell him a house and that Denny could be induced to buy defendant's. Whereupon defendant said: "Well, go ahead and sell it to him. Go ahead and sell it to him. I will pay you a commission." And plaintiff said: "All right, I will try him."

The price defendant had been holding his house at and the price he named to plaintiff was $10,000, but later the plaintiff informed him that Denny would buy the house if defendant could take a little less than that, and defendant promised to go over his bills to see what expense the house had been to him and he would then report. He did so and told plaintiff he would take $9,500, but could not take any less than that and pay a commission. Plaintiff saw Denny repeatedly about the matter, and the latter came several times to plaintiff's office about it, but Denny said he was not yet ready to make an offer, as he had matters on the farm to shape up, but that he would in about three weeks. In the meantime, at Denny's suggestion, plaintiff investigated the cost of the house and reported to Denny what he had learned from the contractor who built it. After seeing Denny three or four times, Denny proposed to put in a lot he owned as part pay on the house at a valuation of $2,000. This plaintiff communicated to defendant, who refused to take the lot. Plaintiff continued in his efforts to sell the house to Denny.

At some time during the transactions Denny made a deal whereby he thought he had purchased another house of one Cadle, but in some way this deal fell through. Defendant seems to think that the record conclusively shows that plaintiff did not come into the matter until after the Cadle deal fell through, but manifestly there is evidence from which it might be found that plaintiff was talking to Denny and trying to get him to make an offer on defendant's house before this. And plaintiff obtained a promise from Denny that if the Cadle deal did fall through he would make an offer on the defendant's house. Plaintiff kept track of the Cadle deal, and as soon as it was off he called Denny over the telephone and made an appointment with him to come in that day and make the deal for defendant's house. Denny did come in, but, although plaintiff waited for him at his office, Denny did not come to plaintiff but got with defendant and the two closed the deal; defendant taking the lot Denny had theretofore wanted to put in on a valuation of $2,000 at a valuation of $1,500 and paying $7,500 in cash. Thus the price was reduced from $9,500 to $9,000 only by treating Denny's lot as having a valuation of $1,500 instead of $2,000, and there was evidence that defendant testified in the justice court that the consideration for the house in the deal made was $9,500.

[5, 6] We cannot say as a matter of law that a special contract defeats plaintiff's cause of action. In the first place, according to the evidence in plaintiff's favor, there was no such limitation on plaintiff's right to a commission when the contract was made and plaintiff's efforts began. In the next place, no limit of time was placed on plaintiff to effect a sale, and he had a reasonable time in which to do so; and while he was in the final act of accomplishing a sale the defendant, without notice to plaintiff, got together with the purchaser and closed the deal. Holland v. Vinson, 124 Mo. App. 417, 101 S. W. 1131. There is other evidence in the record from which the jury could find that, even if defendant did tell plaintiff he would not pay a commission unless he sold the property for $9,500 cash, yet defendant allowed plaintiff to continue in his efforts to sell the property at less than those terms; and still other evidence that defendant listed the property with plaintiff under a general contract to pay a commission if he sold the property, though the defendant was under the impression that he would not legally be bound to pay any commission unless the property was sold for $9,500. In other words, it is a question for the jury to say whether the contract plaintiff had was a limited or general contract.

[7] With reference to the claim that there was no evidence from which the jury could say plaintiff's efforts were the procuring cause of the sale, we are of the opinion that there was. The jury could reasonably find that had it not been for plaintiff's efforts the sale would not have been effected, and that plaintiff's exertions were the procuring cause of the sale.

[8] The question asked of Denny whether the efforts of the broker "had anything to do with you buying the property" was, we think, properly excluded. He was allowed to detail all the facts and to tell what was done. The question whether the broker's efforts "had anything to do" with the sale left not only it to the witness to decide whether such efforts were effective in bringing about a sale, the question the jury was to pass upon, but also allowed the witness to draw the conclusion that if he did not rely on the broker's judgment in making the purchase the broker's efforts did not result in effecting the sale. The question allowed the witness to draw a conclusion in reference to the very question the jury were called to pass upon under the instructions of the court. It is not like showing the state of a man's mind prior to plaintiff's efforts by declarations made by such man at the time the state of mind was desired to be shown. Folks v. Burnett, 47 Mo. App. 564, 566.

[9] We think, however, that error calling for a reversal and a remanding of the cause for a new trial was committed in the way plaintiff's case was submitted in his instructions. As heretofore stated, it must be borne in mind that this is not the usual controversy of a broker and landowner over a commission for procuring or finding a purchaser. Here, the owner and purchaser to be had been "dickering" with one another for two years, and each knew the other's terms but would not agree thereon. In this situation plaintiff asked defendant to be allowed to take a hand. According to plaintiff's theory this was granted and he was given a general contract to sell the property, or, if it was limited as to price, it became unlimited thereafter and was so treated by them and that it was unlimited both as to price and as to purchaser. Defendant's evidence tends to show, however, that he refused to give plaintiff a contract to sell to Denny since he already had been on the string and could himself do better with him than any agent could; also that the contract he made with plaintiff was to pay a commission only in case plaintiff found a purchaser who would give $9,500 cash for the property. With reference to this last, plaintiff himself, in one place in his testimony, says defendant said: "I will take $9,500 for the house and pay a commission. I can't take any less than that and pay a commission." So that the evidence is clearly in such shape that plaintiff's right to recover was affected by two possible conditions; one that he must sell to some one other than Denny, and the other that he must sell for $9,500 or he would not be entitled to a commission. Whether either one or both of these conditions were a part of the contract was a question for the jury. It was not conceded that defendant knew plaintiff was still trying to sell to Denny and knowingly interfered and took the matter out of his hands. Now the error in plaintiff's instructions is that they assume that the contract was a general one as to price, and tell the jury plaintiff is entitled to recover and the finding will be for him if the defendant "employed plaintiff to sell the property" and if his efforts were "the procuring cause that resulted in the deal being made," unless the contract was the plaintiff was to sell to some one other than Denny; and they thus assume that the deal made was in accordance with the terms of the contract plaintiff had.

[10] But instructions which direct a verdict should not omit any of the issues which are a necessary part of plaintiff's case; and what was the contract plaintiff had and whether he had fully performed it or not were certainly questions which contain the very heart of his case. Westerman v. Peer Investment Co., 197 Mo. App. 278, 284, 195 S. W. 78; Young v. Cooperage Works, 259 Mo. 215, 168 S. W. 611; Jennings & Son v. Overholt, 186 Mo. App. 505, 511, 512, 172 S. W. 449. Plaintiff's instructions contained one of the conditions which had to be negatived before he could recover, but omitted all reference to the other, and that other had reference to the two vital and essential things to his recovery, namely, the nature of the contract he had and whether he had performed it.

The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

All concur.

YATES v. UNITED RYS. CO. OF ST. LOUIS. (No. 46116.)

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 8, 1920.)

1. Carriers \S 321(2) — Charge of general negligence proper in res ipsa loquitur case.

In a res ipsa loquitur case against a street railway for injuries to a passenger when the street car collided with a team of horses, a charge of general negligence is proper.

2. Carriers \S 316(6) — Proof of collision and injury to passenger makes prima facie case in her favor.

Plaintiff having been a passenger on defendant street railway's car and free from negligence, proof of happening of collision between car and a team of horses and injury to plaintiff raises a presumption of negligence against the railway, and makes a prima facie case for plaintiff, casting burden on railway to show freedom from negligence.

3. Appeal and error \S 1064(1) — Instruction in action against street railway by passenger held not reversible error.

In action against street railway for injuries to passenger when her car collided with team of horses, instruction that, though the jury should find that want of care of driver of team directly contributed to collision, yet if railway's motorman, had he exercised a high degree of care, etc., would have averted collision, plaintiff can recover, held not reversible error in view of circumstances.

4. Evidence \S 18 — Judicial notice taken of decreased purchasing power of money.

In passing on question of excessiveness of verdict for personal injuries, Court of Appeals may take judicial notice of the fact that the purchasing power of money has greatly decreased in recent years.

5. Damages \S 131(4) — $1,000 verdict in favor of female street car passenger not excessive.

$1,000 verdict awarded against street railway in favor of injured female passenger of 35, in good health before the accident and weighing about 208 pounds, who lost weight until at trial she weighed about 170 pounds, her injury having consisted of a sprained back, resulting in nervousness and insomnia, necessitating confinement to bed, held not excessive.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Kent K. Koerner, Judge.

"Not to be officially published."

Action by Mary Kate Yates against the United Railways Company of St. Louis.

From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles W. Bates, T. E. Francis, and Chauncey H. Clarke, all of St. Louis, for appellant.

Rassieur, Kammerer & Rassieur, of St. Louis, for respondent.

BIGGS, C. While plaintiff was a passenger on defendant's north-bound Broadway car it collided with a team of horses and wagon at the intersection of Biddle street. It is alleged that the jar, jolt, and sudden stop of the car as the collision occurred caused plaintiff to be thrown against the back of one of the seats of the car and against the side thereof, resulting in personal injuries, which form the basis of this action, and for which plaintiff recovered a judgment below for $1,000. The answer was a general denial.

[1, 2] The charge is general negligence, which is proper; this being a res ipsa loquitur case. The plaintiff being a passenger and concededly free from negligence, proof of the happening of the collision and the injury raises a presumption of negligence against the carrier and made a prima facie case, casting the burden upon defendant of showing that it was free from any act of negligence which caused the injury to plaintiff.

The errors specified are excessive verdict and the giving of the following instruction on behalf of plaintiff:

"Although the jury should find from the evidence in this case that Louis Staake, the driver of the wagon with which defendant's car collided, did not exercise ordinary care in driving said wagon, and although the jury should find from the evidence that such want of care (if there was such want of care) directly contributed to cause the collision by which plaintiff was injured, if you find she was injured, yet, if the jury should find from the evidence that defendant's motorman in charge of the car in which plaintiff was a passenger, if he had exercised a high degree of care such as would have been exercised by a prudent, careful, and skillful motorman, under the same or similar circumstances, would have averted said collision and injury, if any, then plaintiff is entitled to recover."

The objection to this instruction is that it is said to assume negligence on the part of the motorman by using the italicized words set forth in the instruction. The instruction is unhappily worded, and the criticism leveled against it is not unreasonable. However, it must be considered that the jury are reasonably intelligent men, and that they would not have returned this verdict against the defendant had they not believed that the motorman failed to exercise that high degree of care placed upon him by the law.

In the case of Olsen v. Citizens' Railway

Co., 152 Mo. 426, 54 S. W. 470, the Supreme Court approved an instruction in identically the same form as the instruction in the instant case. The facts in the Olsen Case cannot be distinguished from those in the case at bar. In that case plaintiff suffered injuries by reason of a collision between the street car and a fire department wagon. The instruction in the case at bar was evidently copied from the instruction in the Olsen Case. In passing upon a complaint made against the instruction in that case, Judge Gantt (loc. cit. 431 of 152 Mo., 54 S. W. 471) states that the instruction is in the form almost universally adopted.

[3] We do not deem the giving of this instruction, under the circumstances of the case, reversible error, and hence rule the point against the defendant.

[4] Is the size of this verdict, namely, $1,000, shocking to the judicial conscience and so excessive as to indicate that the jury was biased and prejudiced in its consideration of the cause? In passing upon the question we may take judicial notice of the fact that the purchasing power of money has greatly decreased in recent years, as was done by the Supreme Court in the case of Hurst v. Railroad (Sup.) 219 S. W. 566 (not yet officially reported).

The case as made tended to prove that the plaintiff's injuries consisted of a sprained back, resulting in nervousness and insomnia; that she was injured on January 26, 1916, and was thereafter confined to her bed for 4 weeks. After that, and until April following, she was able to sit up, but was not able to get around or attend to her household duties. Subsequent to April and throughout the summer she was at various times compelled to remain in bed a part of each week. At the time, the plaintiff was a woman 35 years of age and in good health, weighing before the accident 208 pounds. Since the accident she gradually lost weight, until at the time of the trial she weighed about 170 pounds. She testified that since she was injured she has continual headaches and has not been able to attend to her usual household duties. The trial took place on June 14, 1917, being about 18 months after the accident.

[5] We think, under the evidence, the jury was fully justified in making the award of $1,000. It is therefore recommended that the judgment be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of BIGGS, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

The judgment of the circuit court is accordingly affirmed.

REYNOLDS, P. J., and ALLEN and BECKER, JJ., concur.

O'BANNON v. MOERSCHEL et al.
(No. 13560.)

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
May 10, 1920. Rehearing Denied
May 17, 1920.)

1. Corporations ~~§~~429—Officer cannot use corporate moneys to pay individual debts; check of company being notice.

An officer of a corporation cannot lawfully use its money to pay his individual debts, and if he gives a check of the corporation per himself it is notice to his creditor, who may be compelled to repay it to the corporation.

2. Corporations ~~§~~429—Checks drawn by president having authority to draw, ordinarily legal payments of debt to drawee.

The fact that president of a corporation was such, with authority to draw checks for it, would ordinarily make his checks when cashed legal payments to the drawee, though not when drawee knows that president is putting his hands into the treasury of the corporation and misappropriating its funds.

3. Corporations ~~§~~404(1)—Use of assets to pay president's debt not within rule permitting solvent corporation to use assets for benefit of another.

Where directors consented to payment of president's debt with company funds under impression debt was that of company, and would not have given consent had they known company was paying president's debt as mere gratuity, case did not fall within rule that solvent corporation may use assets for individual benefit of another with consent of stockholders and directors.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cole County; John G. Slate, Judge.

Action by W. D. O'Bannon, trustee, against Jacob W. Moerschel and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Calfee & Westhues, of Jefferson City, for appellants.

Pope & Lohman, of Jefferson City, for respondent.

ELLISON, P. J. Plaintiff is trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of the corporation known as the Schultz Dry Goods, Carpet & Ready-to-Wear Company. Frank J. Linhof was president of that corporation, and owed Jacob F. Moerschel, in the latter's lifetime, a sum amounting to near $50,000 in interest-bearing notes given for borrowed money. Linhof paid the interest regularly by checks of the corporation signed by him as president, and Moerschel cashed these checks. The corporation was declared a bankrupt on the petition of Jacob W. Moerschel as one of its creditors, the corporation, through Linhof, admitting its insolvency. The corporation being insolvent, the District Court of the United States for the Western district of Missouri, sitting at Jefferson City, on proper request of creditors authorized plaintiff as trustee to recover back these interest payments. Moerschel having died, plaintiff instituted this action against his executors. A. M. Hough, Esq., of the Cole county bar, was appointed referee. Defendant objected that the case was not one for a referee, but, as this objection was not saved in the motion for new trial, we shall assume that he was properly appointed.

The referee heard the evidence, and made report to the trial court, wherein he allowed to plaintiff the various payments of interest aggregating $5,623.63. Each party filed exceptions to the report. They were overruled, and judgment rendered for plaintiff in the amount found by the referee. Plaintiff did not appeal.

It is proper to say as a part of the history of the case that the present corporation was preceded by the corporation known as the Schultz Dry Goods & Carpet Company and Linhof paid to Moerschel a number of payments by checks out of the funds of that corporation. But the latter became dissolved, and finally absorbed by the present bankrupt, the Schultz Dry Goods, Carpet & Ready-to-Wear Company. The referee refused to allow to plaintiff any of the money Linhof used out of the funds of the former corporation, on the ground that plaintiff did not represent that corporation, and that the five-year statute of limitation (section 1889, Rev. St. 1909) had run against the action. We should also state that Moerschel presented the notes for allowance against the estate of the corporation bankrupt as if they were the debt of the corporation, but the federal court held they were the individual indebtedness of Linhof, and disallowed them. In re Schultz Dry Goods, Carpet & Ready-to-Wear Co. (D. C.) 236 Fed. 425, and same case on appeal, 246 Fed. 887, 159 C. C. A. 159.

We therefore have only to determine whether the referee and the trial court are upheld in the law in holding Moerschel's estate liable to the plaintiff trustee in bankruptcy.

[1] The law is that an officer of a corporation cannot lawfully use the money of the corporation to pay his individual debts; and if he gives a check of the corporation, per himself, it is notice to his creditor, and the latter may be compelled to pay it back. Charcoal Co. v. Lewis, 154 Mo. App. 548, 136 S. W. 716; Napoleon Hill Cotton Co. v. Stix, 217 S. W. 323; Charcoal Co. v. Moore, 178 Mo. App. 692, 162 S. W. 745; McCullam v. Buckingham Hotel Co., 198 Mo. App. 107, 199 S. W. 417.

In 1917 the Legislature passed an act legalizing such payment unless it is shown that the payee of the check had actual knowledge that it was issued without the knowledge of the corporation. Laws 1917, p. 144. But that act does not affect this case, for the reason that it was passed since the facts herein transpired.

But defendant has cited us to an exhaustive opinion of the Supreme Court (Coleman v. Hagey, 252 Mo. 102, 136-143, 158 S. W. 829), wherein Judge Walker states the right of a solvent corporation to deal with its money or other assets as an individual would, and that generally only judgment creditors could attack a disposal of the debtor's property. To the same effect is Jorndt v. Hub & Spoke Co., 112 Mo. App. 341, 87 S. W. 29, decided by the St. Louis Court of Appeals through Judge Goode. But these cases have no application. In the case before us we have an officer of a corporation taking its funds bodily and using them (with the creditor's knowledge) to pay his private debt. The creditor thus becomes a party to the misappropriation, and can be forced to disgorge.

[2] To avoid the consideration we have just stated, defendant is driven to insist that it was not Linhof who paid the money to Moerschel, but that it was the corporation acting through Linhof. The fact that Linhof was president of the corporation with authority to draw checks for it would ordinarily make his checks, when cashed, legal payments to the drawee, but, of course, this could not be when the drawee knew the officer by giving the check was putting his hands into the treasury of the corporation and misappropriating its funds. Bank v. Edwards, 243 Mo. 553, 564-569, 147 S. W. 978.

[3] We do not overlook the law stated by our Supreme Court in Coleman v. Hagey, supra, 252 Mo. 143, 158 S. W. 829, and the St. Louis Court of Appeals in Jorndt v. Hub & Spoke Co., supra, 112 Mo. App. 341, 87 S. W. 29, that a solvent corporation may use its assets for the individual benefit of another with the consent of the stockholders and directors of the corporation. Defendant, doubtless to bring himself within the law thus stated, introduced evidence that the stockholders and directors of the Schultz Dry Goods, Carpet & Ready-to-Wear Company consented that Linhof might make the interest payments in suit out of the funds of the corporation. But we think there is good reason why that evidence cannot avail defendant. The directors each testified that they consented to this use of the corporation funds because it was the understanding had at the time they formed the corporation that the debt to Moerschel for the money used in buying the stock was to be paid by the corporation. The effect of their testimony was that they looked upon the debt as that of the corporation and not of Linhof; and in furtherance of that understanding Moerschel actually presented his notes to the trustee in bankruptcy, and endeavored to have them allowed as the debt of the corporation. The consummation of that idea was only prevented by the federal courts in the case In re Schultz Dry Goods, Carpet & Ready-to-Wear Co. (D. C.) 236 Fed. 425, and 246 Fed. 887, 159 O. C. A. 159, to which we have already referred. It seems plain from the testimony that the directors did not consider that Moerschel had a debt against Linhof personally and that their consent would not have been given if they had known the corporation, though not liable, was yet paying an individual debt out of its assets as a mere gratuity.

We think the judgment should be affirmed.
All concur.

UNDERWOOD et al. v. HINES, Director General of Railroads. (No. 13593.)

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. June 14, 1920.)

1. Carriers ¶207(2)—Oral contract for interstate shipment is not binding.

No verbal agreement for cattle cars for shipment in interstate commerce can be relied on under the Carmack Amendment (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa), which requires a written contract, nor can a preliminary oral agreement for a future interstate shipment.

2. Carriers ¶32(2)—Unconditional contract to furnish cars, irrespective of government needs or public service, is discriminatory, and violative of Commerce Act.

A station agent of a railroad operating under federal control has no authority to make an absolute and unconditional contract to have cattle cars ready at a certain place or date, irrespective of the government's needs or of general service to the public; such a contract being special and discriminatory, and violative of the Commerce Act.

3. Railroads ¶5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Federal control held to excuse failure to furnish cars to shipper.

Since the federal control of railroads was primarily to supply transportation needed for the Great War, and only secondarily to supply such transportation for the public, the fact that cars were needed for shipments of the government is a defense to an action for breach of contract by the carrier's station agent to have cars ready for plaintiff at a stated time and place.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Callaway County; David H. Harris, Judge.
"Not to be officially published."

Action by J. D. Underwood and El. R. Underwood, comprising the firm of Underwood & Sons, copartners, and another, against Walter D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Harris & Price, of Columbia, and J. W. Jamison, of St. Louis, for appellant.

TRIMBLE, J. This is an action for damages against the Director General of Railroads, based upon the violation of an oral contract made by the station agent of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company (in the hands of Receiver Schaft) at Tebbetts, Mo., with plaintiff, whereby said agent agreed to have three empty cattle cars at said station on April 2, 1918, ready for plaintiffs' use in the shipment of cattle from said station in Missouri to the National Stockyards in Illinois. Plaintiffs say that, relying upon the contract made on the 30th of March, 1918, to have said cars ready on the 2d of April, they delivered said cattle at said station; but, said cars not being furnished, they were required to keep and feed said cattle until a week later, when the cars were furnished on April 9, 1918. Wherefore they sue for $200, the bill for the extra feed and labor required to care for them during the week they were unable to ship. (It seems that, contrary to the usual events in such matters, the price of cattle rose, and was better on the day the cattle did get to market than it was on the day they would have gotten there, had the cars been furnished on the 2d of April. Consequently, no other loss was claimed, except the additional feed and labor during the week the cattle could not be shipped.) At the close of plaintiffs' case, and again at the close of the entire case, the defendant asked a demurrer to the evidence which the court refused to give. The jury returned a verdict of $150, upon which judgment was rendered, and the defendant has appealed.

[1] The shipment in contemplation, and for which the cars were to be used, was an interstate shipment; and no verbal agreement for shipment in interstate commerce can be relied upon under the Carmack Amendment (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa), which requires a written contract. Thee v. Wabash R. Co., 217 S. W. 566. However, if it can be said that the contract in question was separate from and merely preliminary to a contract for an interstate shipment which, when entered into, would be in writing, and that the breach relied on is not a breach of that contract, there is this further to be said:

[2] The sole purpose of the contract was, and is alleged to be, to enable a shipment in interstate commerce to be made. Again, a contract, absolute and unconditional, to have cars ready for plaintiffs' use at a certain place and date, irrespective of the government's needs or of the general service to the public, is one the station agent had no authority to make, and his lack of such authority was known to plaintiffs. Such a contract is special, and, if upheld, would give the shipper to whom it is made an unusual service different from that accorded to others. When such is the case, it is discriminatory, and violates the provisions of the Commerce Act (24 Stat. 379). Chicago & Alton R. Co. v. Kirby, 225 U. S. 155, 32 Sup. Ct. 648, 56 L. Ed. 1083, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 501; State ex rel. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 52 Fla. 646, 41 South. 705, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 506.

[3] The railroad was in the hands of the United States government, primarily for the supply of its need in the Great War in which it was engaged, and secondarily for the transportation of commerce for the public. The reason that no cars were obtainable until the date they were obtained was because of governmental war needs and the imperative duty to give precedence to shipments of the government, and therefore it was impossible to have cars on hand for plaintiffs' use on date specified. These facts appearing in the case without controversy, the demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained. Edwards v. American Express Co., 216 S. W. 781.

The judgment is reversed.

FANNING v. HINES, Director General of Railroads. (No. 2579.)

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 5, 1920.)

1. Master and servant §286(2)—Negligence in directing inexperienced servant to operate drill held question for jury.

In an action by an inexperienced workman, injured while using a drill operated by compressed air, negligence in directing him to use it held, under the evidence, a question for the jury.

2. Trial §194(19)—Instruction held equivalent to declaration that master is negligent as matter of law.

In an action by railroad employé injured by using a drill operated by compressed air, an instruction that if the employé was directed to use the machine, that he was known to be inexperienced, and was unaware of the danger, that he was informed by the foreman that he could operate the drill with safety, and that while exercising reasonable care for his own safety the servant was injured, verdict should be for him, was tantamount to a charge that the master was negligent as a matter of law.

3. Negligence §136(9)—When case for jury.

It is only where the facts are such that all reasonable men must draw the same conclusion that the question of negligence is for the court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greene County; Orin Patterson, Judge.

Action by John E. Fanning against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads.

From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. F. Evans, of St. Louis, and Mann, Todd & Mann, of Springfield, for appellant.

Alfred Page, of Springfield, for respondent.

FARRINGTON, J. [1] The plaintiff instituted suit and recovered a judgment against defendant for the sum of $150, on account of personal injuries sustained by him while working as an employé of the defendant in the yards known as the "New Shops," in the city of Springfield, Mo. He was injured while operating a drill used for the purpose of boring holes in steel beams, and the power operating the machine known as the drill was compressed air. Plaintiff was the only witness used in the case. Briefly, the facts show that he was a man 37 years of age, and that he had worked some around the yards for defendant; had observed several times these drills while being operated by other employés of the company. He was then put on as a helper with a drillman, and assisted him in drilling holes for part of two days. At no time, however, prior to the time of his injury, was he ever given the management or operation of the drill; that is, the man under whom he was working turned on and off the power and actually operated the machine, the plaintiff gaining only such information as he could by helping and observing. The power is turned on in operating this machine by turning a handle, described in the record as similar to the handle on a motorcycle. If turned one way the power goes on, and if turned the other it goes off. It appears that in running this machine at times the drill will get caught, and when that takes place, unless the power is properly handled, the machine will begin to jump and is likely to get away from the operator and injure him. On the day plaintiff started out by himself with this machine, he was told to go and drill some holes under a car. He protested to the man under whom he had been working and also the foreman, stating that he did not understand how to operate the machine and did not want to do it; but was told by one of his superiors having charge of the work that he would never learn how to operate it any younger than he was, and to go ahead. That he could make it all right. He drilled one hole and was drilling on his second hole when something got wrong with the drill. It hung, and he did something in turning on or off the power that made it jump, knocking him down and injuring him.

When the plaintiff's evidence was in the defendant demurred and stood on the demurrer. We think that there was a sufficient case to go to a jury on the question of defendant's negligence. The evidence clearly showed that plaintiff was an employé of the defendant; that he was directed to use this air motor; that the operation of such an instrument was dangerous in the hands of an inexperienced workman; that the defendant's foreman knew of this danger and that plaintiff was inexperienced; that plaintiff was aware that the machine was dangerous, but he was not practiced, experienced, or skilled in handling it when in its operation it became hung and began to jump. The evidence further shows that he was assured by his foreman that he could operate it safely, and that he was injured while operating it. There was sufficient evidence from which it could be inferred that it was the lack of his knowledge and experience in handling the machine that caused it to injure him. In our opinion it, therefore, becomes a question of fact for a jury to say whether, under all these facts and circumstances, a reasonable and prudent master would have put this machine in the hands of this man to operate under these conditions.

In the briefs of counsel they both speak of the handling of an automobile, illustrating their arguments as to plaintiff's experience and knowledge and notice of danger. We believe it would at least be a debatable question of due care in the owner of an automobile taking out for several days one who had never operated such a vehicle, and permitting him to observe how the machine was handled, controlled, and run, then, without the owner of the machine ever having had such person take hold of the wheel and handled the brake, the clutch, spark, and the gas under his observation, suggestion, and control, to place the machine in his hands without any of this experience, and tell him that he could safely run it by himself. It would seem that due care would require that he give the prospective operator some opportunity to personally run the car under his observation, so that in the ordinary running of the same, when there was something to be done to start or stop the car, he could be there to advise the prospective operator what to do. So with the drilling machine by which the plaintiff was hurt. He had observed how some one else operated it, but he had never had the personal experience of knowing how much air to turn off, or what to do when the drill hung and the machine became unmanageable and dangerous.

We think that it was clearly a case for the jury to say whether this defendant acted within reasonable care in placing this machine which did become dangerous if the drill hung, in the hands of this man, who had never had the actual experience of operating and controlling it, with no one there to suggest and direct, and by the very presence give some confidence to the operator in his new undertaking. The court correctly overruled the demurrer to the evidence.

[2, 3] Objection is made to plaintiff's principal instruction, which was given by the court, which instruction is as follows:

"You are further instructed that if you find and believe from the evidence in this case that at and prior to the 26th day of September, 1918, plaintiff was employed as a workman by the agents and employes of the said William G. McAdoo, in charge of and operating the plant of the St. Louis-San Francisco Railway Company known as the New Shops, and that plaintiff was by direction of his employer working on freight cars in the process of construction and repair, and shall further find that on said 26th day of September, 1918, he was directed by the foreman of his employer to use a machine known as an air motor, and if you further find that said machine was dangerous when used and operated by an inexperienced workman, and that this was known to plaintiff's foreman who directed him to operate said machine, and shall further find that plaintiff was inexperienced in the operation of said machine, and that this inexperience was known to his foreman, and if you further find that plaintiff was unaware of the danger attending the operation of said machine, and shall further find that plaintiff was informed by his foreman that he, the plaintiff, could operate said machine with safety, and shall further find that while plaintiff was operating said machine, and while exercising reasonable care for his own safety on account of his inexperience in the operation of said machine, he lost control thereof, and shall further find that, on account of the great force of the compressed air by which said machine was operated, said machine was caused to be thrown with great force and violence against and upon plaintiff, and that plaintiff was thereby injured, then you will find the issues in favor of the plaintiff."

Appellant raises the point, and we think it is well taken, that this instruction does not leave it for the jury to say whether the defendant's conduct with reference to this plaintiff was that of a reasonably prudent and careful master. The instruction tells the jury that if they find the facts therein detailed and about which there was no dispute in evidence, then they will find for the plaintiff. This is as much as saying to the jury, if you find these undisputed facts, then you will find the defendant is guilty of negligence and the plaintiff must recover. There are some cases where the acts of a master are so negligent that a court can and should declare his conduct as negligence per se, but ordinarily some inference of negligence is to be drawn by the trier of the fact. This statement of law is so well established that we will not burden this opinion with authorities declaring it.

We do not believe that we can say, as a matter of law, the defendant was guilty of negligence in this case under the conceded facts or under the facts which the jury evidently found to be true. The necessary element, however, which must be found before the plaintiff can recover in this suit against the defendant, is that the conduct, or the doing of the things which they found defendant did, was not the conduct of a reasonable and prudent master. It is only where the facts are such that all reasonable men must draw the same conclusion that the question of negligence is for the court. Combs v. Kirksville, 134 Mo. App. 645, 114 S. W. 1153; Schwyhart v. Barrett, 145 Mo. App. 332, 180 S. W. 388. Darks v. Grocer Co., 146 Mo. App. 246, 180 S. W. 480. Oborn v. Nelson, 141 Mo. App. 428, 126 S. W. 178.

On a retrial the instruction should also require a finding that it was the negligence, if they find such conduct of defendant was negligent, that caused plaintiff's injury.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

TAYLOR v. DOLLINS (KITTRIDGE, Garnishee). (No. 2725.)

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 5, 1920.)

1. Garnishment \S 158—Denial of garnishee's answer should state cause of action, and a reply should be served.

The denial of garnishee's answer being in law the first pleading, should state facts constituting judgment creditor's cause of action, and a mere statement that garnishee owes execution defendant, or did when process was served, is too general, and a reply which corresponds to the answer in ordinary cases should have been filed (Rev. St. 1909, \S 2431).

2. Garnishment \S 132—Interplea statute directory only, and garnishee may defend that fund belongs to the third party.

Rev. St. 1909, \S 2439, providing that garnishee may cause an interplea for his own protection where the fund is claimed by more than one party, is directory and not mandatory, and he may take on himself the defense that the fund rightly belongs to the third party.

3. Appeal and error \S 171(3)—Appellant not permitted to change theory of cause as shown by pleadings.

While garnishee's reply should have stated facts relative to defendant's order assigning fund to one other than execution creditor, yet where neither party observed the rules of good pleading, and the garnishee was allowed to prove that the fund in his hands was not the property of execution defendant by showing without objection that it had been previously assigned, it is too late to question such evidence and thus change the theory of the case on appeal.

4. Garnishment \S 51—Where garnishment debtor could not countermand assignment, assignee's rights were superior to execution debtor's.

Where an execution debtor delivered to a bank an order on a county which was served on the county's overseer, under whom debtor was working, and who did not formally accept in writing, but kept the order, intending paying the bank, the order was valid and enforceable against the defendant, who could not countermand; and, since the garnishment plaintiff has no better right than the execution defendant, the bank's rights are superior to plaintiff's.

5. Assignments \S 58—Garnishment \S 51—Creditor cannot assign part of fund without debtor's consent but plaintiff in garnishment cannot raise objection.

A creditor cannot assign a part of fund due him without the debtor's consent, although he can assign the whole, but such question can be raised only by the debtor or holder of the fund, and not by plaintiff in action against garnishee.

6. Assignments \S 49—Order treated as assignment need not be accepted in writing.

An order upon the county given by execution creditor to a bank, served upon the county's agent, held an assignment of funds in drawee's hands and not a bill of exchange, under Rev. St. 1909, $\S\S$ 10096, 10099, so that the drawee was not required to accept in writing; the order having lost its character as a negotiable instrument on being declared and treated as assignment.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Butler County; Almon Ing, Judge.

Action by F. G. Taylor against John Dollins. Judgment for plaintiff, and on execution W. H. Kittridge was made garnishee. Judgment for garnishee, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. G. Taylor and E. R. Lentz, of Poplar Bluff, for appellant.

David W. Hill and Abington & Abington, all of Poplar Bluff, for respondent.

STURGIS, P. J. [1] Garnishment on execution. Plaintiff's judgment, obtained in the circuit court of Butler county, is for $452.02. In endeavoring to collect this, the sheriff having the execution summoned W. H. Kittridge as garnishee. In the garnishee's answer to the interrogatories he denied that he was indebted to the execution defendant in any sum, or that he had in his possession or control any property or effects of such defendant. The denial of the garnishee's answer, which in law is the first pleading and should state the facts constituting plaintiff's cause of action (Kiernan v. Robertson, 116 Mo. App. 56, 60, 92 S. W. 138), is no more than a denial of the garnishee's answer and an assertion "that the garnishee is indebted to the defendant herein, or was so indebted at the time when the said garnishee process was served upon him." No reply seems to have been filed, though the reply corresponds to the answer in ordinary pleadings. Section 2431, R. S. 1909; Dodge v. Knapp, 112 Mo. App. 513, 87 S. W. 47; Brown & Hamm v. Gummersell, 30 Mo. App. 341, 345. No objection, however, was made by either party to the pleadings, and the case went to trial, resulting in a judgment for the garnishee. The plaintiff appeals.

[2] There is little or no dispute as to the facts, and the questions raised are matter of law. The garnishee was overseer of certain drainage ditches in Butler county, employing persons, including defendant, to do work thereon in keeping same open and serviceable. The county paid to the garnishee the amount due for such work, and he thus had in his hands the sum of $187.50 due or belonging to defendant for work and labor performed on such drainage ditches. It is conceded that defendant was also indebted to the Bank of Neelyville in the sum of $200, and a few days prior to the service of the garnishment herein that bank obtained and presented to this garnishee the following order, the genuineness of which was not contested:

"Neelyville, Mo., August 8, 1919.

"Mr. W. H. Kittridge, Poplar Bluff, Mo.—Dear Sir: This is an order for you to pay to the State Bank of Neelyville, of Neelyville, Mo., $200 from money due me from Butler county, Mo., for cleaning ditch in district No. 7. This money is to be allowed by the county court at their September meeting. John Dollins.

"Sworn and subscribed to before me this 8th day of August, 1919.

"My commission expires June 25, 1922.

"[L. S.] Arthur Moore, Notary Public."

The garnishee made no formal acceptance of this order, but retained the same, "accepted it in his own mind," and was not only willing but considered himself obligated to pay same to the extent of funds coming to his hands belonging to defendant, Dollins. The case was tried by the court and no declarations of law were asked or given. All the evidence offered by either party was admitted without objection.

The defense which the garnishee relied on is that the order in question acted as an assignment by the defendant of the funds in his hands to the Bank of Neelyville, and, since same came to his hands and he assented to the assignment prior to the service of garnishment, he had no funds in his hands at such time subject to garnishment as belonging to or due to the defendant Dollins.

The point is made by plaintiff that the garnishee should have stood neutral as to this fund and, after disclosing his information as to the claimed assignment of same to the Bank of Neelyville, have caused such claimant to appear and join issue with this plaintiff in an interplea. While a third party claiming property or funds seized by garnishment on execution has no right of his own motion to interplead for such funds (Schawacker v. Dempsey, 83 Mo. App. 342, 352; Straus v. Rothan, 41 Mo. App. 602, 610), yet section 2439, R. S. 1909, provides that the garnishee may cause such an interplea for his own protection. This statutory provision however is directory only, is for the protection of the garnishee, and is not mandatory. The garnishee may take on himself the defense that the funds in his hands alleged to belong to or be owned by defendant rightly belong to some third party and not to defendant. Thus in Shelton v. Cooksey, 138 Mo. App. 389, 390, 391, 122 S. W. 331, 332:

"The garnishee answered that the fund did not belong to the defendant Vincent Cooksey, but that it was the property of George Cooksey. The cause was tried on the issues raised by the answer of the garnishee, the alleged claimant George Cooksey not having been made a party to the cause."

And at page 395 of 138 Mo. App., at page 334 of 122 S. W., speaking of the right of the court to adjudicate the ownership of the garnished fund as between the execution defendant and a third party, without following the method provided by this statute for bringing such claimant into court, the court said:

"This statute is held to be directory only, and the court had the right under the pleadings to pronounce upon them, in the absence of the claimant, as neither party had demanded that he should be brought before the court." McKittick v. Clemens, 52 Mo. loc. cit. 163; Swartz v. Riner, 66 Mo. App. 476; and Lindsay v. Brooks, 82 Mo. App. 301."

In Lindsay v. Brooks, 82 Mo. App. 301, 304, this is said:

"It was conceded at the hearing that none of the alleged principals of Brooks had prior to the garnishment or since made any claim or demand for the money in question. Counsel for Lindsay argues that, in the absence of such demand or notification, it was not permissible for the bank to interpose the rights of the alleged owners of the fund in defense of the garnishment. Whatever may be the rule elsewhere, and whatever may be our individual opinions on the subject, the question has been otherwise determined both by the Supreme Court (McKittrick v. Clemens, 52 Mo. 163), and by this court (Brown v. Gummersell, 30 Mo. App. 341)."

[8] It is also true, as claimed by plaintiff, that under the rules of good pleading the garnishee should by his reply have stated the facts relative to the order by defendant assigning this fund to the Bank of Neelyville. Neither party, as we have seen, have observed the rules of good pleading in garnishment cases, nor did plaintiff in any manner raise this point in the trial court, except perhaps in an indefinite way in the motion for new trial. No objection was made to the introduction in evidence of the order given by defendant on the garnishee directing him to pay this fund to the Bank of Neelyville, nor to any of the evidence tending to show a valid assignment of this fund to the Bank of Neelyville prior to the service of the garnishment. The parties evidently regarded the garnishee's answer to the interrogatories as part of the pleadings, and such answer avers that this fund was not the property of the execution defendant at the time such answer was filed. The garnishee was allowed to prove this by showing without objection that such fund had been previously assigned to the Bank of Neelyville by the written order in question. It is too late to raise this question after plaintiff tried his case on the theory that this was the one issue to be settled. Plaintiff could not be allowed to join battle on issues known to be vital to the case, and after losing be allowed to obtain a new trial on more or less technical grounds not considered of importance till after the battle was lost. See Hamra Bros. v. Herrell, 200 S. W. 776, 780; Brown v. Gummersell, 30 Mo. App. 341, 345.

[4, 5] The merits of this case depend on the solution of the question whether the garnishment proceedings in favor of the judgment creditor should prevail over the prior order given by the judgment debtor on the garnishee in favor of another creditor, the Bank of Neelyville. The plaintiff says the garnishment should prevail because the order in question was not accepted by the garnishee, and that acceptance of the order is essential to its validity. The evidence shows that the garnishee did not accept this order in favor of the bank, either verbally or in writing, in a legal sense, so as to make the same a binding obligation on him. 4 Elliott, Contracts, § 3411. The garnishee did, however, have full notice of the same, since it was delivered to and retained by him and, as he says, he "accepted it in his own mind," that is, assented to the terms, waived all objections as to form and that its effect might be a partial assignment of the money coming to his hands belonging to the drawer of the order. The garnishee says he considered the order binding on him and an assignment to the bank of the funds coming to his hands. The acceptance of an order like the acceptance of a bill of exchange creates an obligation, and an action may be based on such acceptance. 4 Elliott on Contracts, § 3418; Kimball v. Donald, 20 Mo. 577, 581, 64 Am. Dec. 209. That, however, is not the question here presented. An assignment creates no new obligation, but merely transfers from one person to another an existing debt or chose in action. In Kimball v. Donald, supra, the court stated the law thus:

"It is true that anything amounting to a present transfer of a specific fund for value is a valid assignment in equity which changes the property as against the assignor, and cuts off subsequent attaching creditors. No form is required; it is sufficient that the transaction is, in the contemplation of the parties, a present sale of the subject-matter assigned, vesting a present interest in the assignee, and not resting merely in agreement to be executed thereafter. In a word, anything that shows an intention on the one side to make a present irrevocable transfer of the fund, and from which an assent to receive it may be inferred from the other, will operate in equity as an assignment, if supported by a sufficient consideration. Upon this principle, courts allow an order payable out of a particular fund belonging to the drawer, and which has been delivered to the payee for value, to take effect as a present transfer of the debt; and Lord Chancellor Truro, in a recent case, 1852 (Rodeck v. Gandell, 15 Eng. Law and Eq. 30), stated it as the result of all the cases that 'an agreement between a debtor and a creditor that the debt owing should be paid out of a specific fund coming to the debtor, or an order given by a debtor to his creditor, upon a person owing money or holding funds belonging to the giver of the order, directing such person to pay such funds to the creditor, will create a valid, equitable charge upon such fund; in other words will operate as an equitable assignment of the debt or fund to which the order refers.'"

To the same effect is Bank of Commerce v. Bogy, 44 Mo. 13, 18 (100 Am. Dec. 247), where it is said:

"It has always been held that an order founded upon a good consideration, given for a specific debt or fund owing by or in the hands of a third person, operates as, or rather is evidence of, an equitable assignment of the demand to the holder, so that he may sue and recover the debt or the fund whether the order be accepted or not."

The law is that a creditor cannot assign a part of a fund due him from a third party without the consent of the debtor. To be valid in such case the assignment must be of the whole fund or debt. Rice v. Dudley, 34 Mo. App. 383; Fourth Nat. Bank v. Noonan, 88 Mo. 372; Burnett v. Crandall, 63 Mo. 410. This, however, is a question which can be raised only by the debtor, and if the debtor or holder of the fund assents to the partial assignment of the fund and is willing, as the garnishee here is, to recognize the partial assignment and pay same, then it stands on the same footing as an assignment of the whole fund. No acceptance is necessary. Boyer v. Hamilton, 21 Mo. App. 520, 524; Bank v. Noonan, 88 Mo. 372. In a case similar to this (Whiteside v. Tall, 88 Mo. App. 168, 171), the court said:

"Nor does it matter, on this issue between the garnishee and attaching plaintiff, that the assignment for the benefit of Mrs. Llewellyn was of only a portion of Lyons' indebtedness; no one but Lyons can raise that objection. Johnson County v. Bryson, 27 Mo. App. 341."

Hendrickson v. Bank, 81 Mo. App. 332, was a garnishment on execution in which a prior order had been given by the execution defendant on the garnishee to pay to a certain bank an amount greater than the fund held by such garnishee. Such garnishee had not accepted such order. The similarity of facts is apparent. Since the garnishee made no objection that the order was for more than he held, the court held that it acted as an assignment of such fund and would prevail over the subsequent garnishment.

It is said in all such cases that the garnishment plaintiff secures no better right than the execution defendant has—that he merely steps into his shoes—and where the assignment is valid as between the parties thereto, the garnishee and execution defendant, it is valid as to the garnishing plaintiff. Hendrickson v. Bank, 31 Mo. App. 332, 336; Smith v. Sterritt, 24 Mo. 260, 263. It cannot be doubted that the order in question, after being signed by defendant and delivered to the bank in payment of or to secure a valid indebtedness, was valid and enforceable as against defendant. He could not have countermanded the same or used the fund in violation of the terms of the order and the bank's rights thereunder.

[6] Plaintiff argues that the order here in question is in the nature of a bill of exchange, and does not of itself operate as an assignment of the funds in the drawee's hands (sections 10096, 10099); that the drawee of such instrument is not liable unless and until he has accepted the same, and such acceptance must be in writing (sections 10097 and 10102, R. S. 1909). This, however, is not a suit by the payee of the order, the Bank of Neelyville, against the drawee, this garnishee. The liability of such drawee is not in question, for the drawee is not resisting such liability. The cases of Nelson v. Nelson Bennett Co., 31 Wash. 116, 71 Pac. 749, and Ewing v. National Bank, 162 Ky. 551, 172 S. W. 955, are not in point, for they are cases based on the liability of the drawee of a bill of exchange arising from his contract of acceptance of same. A suit based on an assignment of a cause of action and one based on the new contract arising from accepting the order, check, or bill of exchange are radically different. That an order, or even a bill of exchange, may be shown to be and have the effect of an assignment is the settled law (Boyer v. Hamilton, 21 Mo. App. 520; Kimball v. Donald, 20 Mo. 577, 64 Am. Dec. 200), and when such instrument is declared on and treated as an assignment, then it loses its distinctive features as a negotiable instrument, and the rights of the parties thereunder are not influenced by the negotiable instruments law.

The judgment rendered is for the right party, and is affirmed.

✓ A state, in adopting a statute of another state, adopts the construction given it by the courts of the other state. ✓

2. Municipal corporations §159(1)—Meaning of "voters' register" within the recall statute stated.

✓ A "voters' register," within Laws 1913, p. 528, § 19, requiring petitioners for recall to be qualified voters as shown by the "voters' register," in so far as applicable to cities of the third class, means the record of voters at the last city election for mayor required to be kept by Const. art. 8, § 3; there being no provision for registration in city elections for such cities. ✓

3. Mandamus §76—Writ not issued to compel city clerk to certify recall petition unless refusal fraudulent or arbitrary.

✓ Writ of mandamus will not be issued to compel city clerk to certify a petition for recall under Laws 1913, p. 528, § 19, in absence of showing that his refusal to do so is fraudulent or arbitrary; his duties with reference to such a petition being quasi judicial. ✓

4. Mandamus §187(4)—Objections to form of denials cannot be raised for first time on appeal.

Relator, having treated the issue of fact as made up, and having accepted respondent's return to alternative writ as putting the facts at issue in the trial court, and having tried the case without objecting to the evidence, cannot object for first time on appeal to the form of the denials in respondent's return.

5. Mandamus §187(4)—Failure to state facts to sustain application can be raised for first time on appeal.

Relator's failure to state facts to sustain application for writ is not waived by failure of respondent to raise objection in lower court; the defect being available on appeal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Adair County; James A. Cooley, Judge.

Mandamus by the State, on the relation of W. I. Crow, against J. O. Carothers. Peremptory writ issued, and respondent appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 214 S. W. 857.

A. Doneghy, of Kirksville, for appellant.
W. F. Frank, of Kirksville, for respondent.

ELLISON, P. J. This is a proceeding in mandamus, wherein relator seeks to compel respondent, who is city clerk, to certify to the common council of the city of Kirksville a certain petition for an election to elect a successor to one O. M. Hutchinson as one of the councilmen for said city. After a hearing, a peremptory writ was ordered by the trial court.

Kirksville is a city of the third class, and this proceeding is founded upon section 19, Laws 1913, p. 528, known as the "recall" statute, which reads as follows:

"The procedure to effect the removal of an incumbent of an elective office shall be as follows: A petition signed by electors entitled to vote for a successor to the incumbent sought to be removed, equal in number to at least twenty-five per centum of the entire vote for all candidates for the office of mayor at the last preceding general municipal election, demanding an election of a successor of the person sought to be removed shall be filed with the city clerk, which petition shall contain a general statement of the grounds for which the removal is sought. * * * One of the signers of each such paper shall make oath before an officer competent to administer oaths that the statements therein made are true as he believes and that each signature to the paper appended is the genuine signature of the person whose name it purports to be. Within ten days from the date of filing such petition the city clerk shall examine and from the voters' register ascertain whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors, and if necessary, the council shall allow him extra help for that purpose; and he shall attach to said petition his certificate, showing the result of said examination. If by the clerk's certificate the petition is shown to be insufficient, it may be amended within ten days from the date of said certificate. The clerk shall, within ten days after such amendment, make like examination of the amended petition, and if his certificate shall show the same to be insufficient, it shall be returned to the person filing the same, without prejudice, however, to the filing of a new petition to the same effect."

The respondent clerk claims that the application and alternative writ fail to state a case or ground of complaint against him under this statute. It will be noticed that the statute requires the city clerk, within 10 days from the date of the filing of the petition, to "examine and from the voters' register ascertain whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors," and he shall attach to the petition his certificate, showing the result of his examination. Neither the application nor the alternative writ contains an averment that the persons signing the petition for "recall" as qualified voters were shown to be such by the "voters' register," which the statute requires as a necessary requisite to make them qualified petitioners for recall.

[1] Our law is a copy of the statute of Oklahoma, and in adopting it we adopted the construction given to it by the courts of that state. State ex rel. v. Miles, 210 Mo. 127, 109 S. W. 595; Knight v. Rawlings, 205 Mo. 412, 433, 104 S. W. 38, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 212, 12 Ann. Cas. 325. The Supreme Court of that state construed the statute as meaning that the alleged qualified voter, signing as a petitioner, must appear on the registration books. The court's language is that—

"The registration books will disclose to him [the clerk] whether the names appearing upon the petition are qualified electors as shown thereby. His rule for determining the qualifications of the electors to sign the petition is limited by the act to the names appearing on the registration books. The election returns disclose to him the number of electors participating in the last preceding vote cast for the candidates, and enable him to ascertain whether the number signing the petition was equal in amount to 25 per cent. thereof. * * * The ordinance under which the clerk is required to act was drawn with the purpose in view of making his duties as simple as they could be made. The evidence given by the registration books established a certain and ready foundation as a basis, and was doubtless deemed to be the best and the simplest which could be secured. To permit all to sign such a petition, without reference to previous registration in the city, might result in the petition being signed wholly or to a great extent by parties who never before participated in any election, and of whose qualification there would be no reliable and easily available evidence, and of whom the clerk might be unable to determine whether they were or were not qualified electors. Under these circumstances, as we view it, the trial court was in error in holding as qualified petitioners those who had signed the petitions and whose names were not upon the registration rolls." Chesney v. Jones, 31 Okl. 363, 366, 126 Pac. 715, 716.

This case is approved in Dunham, City Clerk, v. Ardery, 43 Okl. 619, 630, 143 Pac. 331, 335 (L. R. A. 1915B, 233, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 1148) where it was said that "it was, no doubt, intended that the names signed to the petition should not be considered, unless they should be upon the voters' register," and where, at page 632 of 43 Okl., at page 335 of 143 Pac. (L. R. A. 1915B, 233 Ann. Cas. 1916A, 1148), Chesney v. Jones is quoted from at length.

[2] Our statute uses the term "voters' register" as the place where the city clerk looks to ascertain whether the petitioners possess that requisite to a right to petition. We have no book by that name in our election laws pertaining to elections in cities of the third class. Nor have we any provision for registration in city elections for such cities. The statute ought not to fail for the lack of a record known by that specific name. The expression, the entire section considered, undoubtedly means a record of the voters at the last municipal election for mayor. In point of fact, section 3 of article 8 of our Constitution requires a voters' register to be kept in all elections. It reads that:

"All elections by the people shall be by ballot; every ballot voted shall be numbered in the order in which it shall be received, and the number recorded by the election officers on the list of voters, opposite the name of the voter who presents the ballot."

A previous registration is not required for municipal elections in cities of the third class, but a list of the voters is set down and kept, commonly called "poll books." We are confident that the Legislature meant such a list of voters, thus required to be kept, when it used the expression "voters' register." The same question was presented in the two cases we have cited above from the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, and the views herein expressed are in harmony with what was there decided.

[3] Another reason why the judgment awarding this writ cannot stand is that the duties devolved upon the respondent clerk with reference to a petition for recall of an incumbent are quasi judicial, and, being so, mandamus will not lie to coerce his judgment, unless he has acted fraudulently or arbitrarily. State ex rel. v. State Board, 103 Mo. 22, 28, 15 S. W. 322; State ex rel. v. Cramer, 96 Mo. 75, 84, 8 S. W. 788; Dunham v. Ardery, 43 Okl. 619, 632, 143 Pac. 331, L. R. A. 1915B, 233, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 1148; 2 Spelling on Extraordinary Remedies, §§ 1434-1437. We have examined the evidence preserved by the abstract of appellant and the additional abstract furnished by the relator, but in neither do we find any evidence of fraud or arbitrariness. The appellant appears to have endeavored to perform his duty under the law in all respects. Relator makes no effort to show fraud, and neither fraud nor arbitrary conduct appears in any finding of the court or in the judgment rendered. The only reason given in the finding and judgment is that the "said respondent hath not shown any just cause why a peremptory writ of mandamus should not issue."

[4] Relator has made the point in this court that respondent's return to the alternative writ does not specifically and separately deny each of the allegations in such writ, but contented himself with a general denial. Relator's reply contains the same fault. But we think that, after treating the issues of fact as made up, and accepting the pleading as putting the facts at issue in the trial court and trying the case without objection to evidence, it is too late to make an objection to the form of denial for the first time in this court.

[5] This rule does not apply to respondent's point as to failure to state facts to sustain the application for the writ, or, as it may be said, to sustain a cause of action; for that is a defect not waived, and an objection on that head may be brought forward for the first time in the appellate court.

There were many other points made against the judgment, which, in view of our conclusion, it will not be necessary to notice.

Reversed.

ONCKEN v. EHRLER. (No. 16003.)

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 8, 1920.)

1. Corporations ⇨175—Whether stockholder received notice of assessments held for jury.

Whether holder of stock of California corporation, which was sold for holder's failure to pay assessments on stock, was given notice of the assessments, held for jury.

2. New trial ⇨97—That evidence on retrial differed from that of first trial, to the surprise of a party, cannot be urged for first time in motion for new trial.

Where evidence was introduced during retrial different from that testified to on first trial, adverse party, after having neither filed any affidavit, nor asked for any postponement to secure a copy of the testimony on the first trial, nor called court's attention to fact that he was surprised thereby, cannot complain for the first time on appeal.

3. New trial ⇨98—Refusal to grant new trial for surprise by evidence differing from that on first trial held no abuse of discretion.

Where defendant did not complain of being surprised by plaintiff's testimony, differing from that given on first trial, and did not ask for postponement to secure copy of testimony given at first trial, and where three juries had given verdicts for plaintiff, refusal to grant new trial therefor held no abuse of discretion.

4. Corporations ⇨120—Agreement by seller of stock to repurchase held based on a good consideration.

Where seller of stock agreed to give buyer his money back within a year, if buyer wanted it, a new contract, entered into at the end of the year, whereby seller agreed to repurchase stock within specified period of time after demand after four years, held based on a good consideration; buyer's forbearance to enforce old contract being sufficient.

Action by Frank C. Oncken against E. H. Ehrler. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Conway Elder, of St. Louis, for appellant.
John J. O'Connor, of St. Louis, for respondent.

NIPPER, O. This action originated before a justice of the peace, and is based upon a contract or agreement in writing, whereby appellant agreed to purchase 500 shares of mining stock from respondent. A copy of the contract, which was attached to the petition, and which we here set out, is as follows:

"Contract.

"St. Louis, Mo., June 16, 1910.

"In consideration of the purchase from me of five hundred shares of the capital stock of the Reiner Mining Company by Frank H. Oncken, I hereby agree to purchase the said stock from Frank H. Oncken within 60 days after demand at any time after four (4) years, and before the expiration of fifty-two (52) months, for the sum of five hundred ($500.00) dollars, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from this date, less any dividends paid upon said stock.

"In witness whereof, I hereunto set my hand and seal at the city of St. Louis, Missouri, this 16th day of June, A. D. 1910.

"E. H. Ehrler. [Seal.]

"Issued in duplicate."

Plaintiff recovered in the justice court. Defendant appealed to the circuit court, where plaintiff again recovered. The trial court sustained defendant's motion for new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. On the second trial in the circuit court, plaintiff again recovered. The trial court overruled defendant's motion for new trial, and he brings the case here by appeal.

Both appellant and respondent are residents of the city of St. Louis. At the time of the execution of the original contract, plaintiff was introduced to defendant by a Mr. Schwankhaus. Plaintiff testified that Mr. Schwankhaus was a salesman for a woodenware company, that he introduced him to Ehrler, at which time he was shown nuggets and gold dust, and was told that they came from a good mine out in California. Plaintiff stated that Ehrler insisted on him taking some of this stock at $1 a share, and wrote out this contract or agreement; that he (Ehrler) was drawing $10,000 a year, and had plenty of money to stand back of that; that plaintiff paid defendant $500 for this stock, and defendant promised to give him his money back inside of a year if he wanted it; that at the expiration of the year he went back and asked for his money; that Ehrler told him everything was going fine, and in six months the stock ought to be worth $5 a share, and renewed the contract for another year; that at the end of the second year he went back again, and had his stock with him, and met with the same results; that when the last time was up he went back, and had this stock in his pocket, or had the stock in his hand. We here quote from his testimony:

"Q. What did you say to him? A. I told him I would like to have my money, that I had the stock here; and he said he didn't have the money, and he was willing to give me stock in the other company.

"Q. Did he at that time say he would take back the stock and pay you? A. He said he didn't have any money that time.

"Q. Did you then and there offer to deliver him the stocks, if he would pay you? A. Yes, sir; I had the stock right there."

Defendant testified that plaintiff was always willing to renew the contract on each occasion a new contract was given for an old one; that he kept plaintiff informed continually of the condition of the company; that there was an assessment of 5 cents per share levied on said stock in October, 1913; that he mailed plaintiff copy of the notice. Plaintiff, however, denied ever having received any notice of this assessment under which this stock was sold. Without detailing all this evidence, it seems that the life of the Reiner Mining Company was short. Plaintiff's stock was sold upon his failure to pay the assessment levied, of which he claims to have had no notice. It was bought by the president of the company for 5 cents per share, plus about 2 cents cost.

Schwankhaus, testifying for defendant, said that he had discussed the affairs of the mining company with plaintiff, and that they had talked about this assessment; that he himself owned some stock in this company, and that, in discussing this assessment with plaintiff, he told plaintiff he was going to pay his assessment, and that plaintiff stated he felt the same way about it, but that his wife would not let him; that this conversation took place in 1913, after he had received his notice of assessment.

Plaintiff, in rebuttal, denied ever having had any conversation with Schwankhaus about any assessment.

At the close of respondent's case, various sections of the Civil Code of California relative to the levying of assessments on the capital stock of corporations, and the giving of notice thereof, as well as notice of sale of delinquent stock, and the manner of conducting same, were introduced in evidence.

Appellant insists: (1) That the evidence of the levying of the assessment and the giving of notice to the respondent was not rebutted, and the jury should have found for him; (2) that the court erred in not granting defendant a new trial; (3) that there was nothing given of value as a consideration for the renewal contract.

[1] As to the first proposition urged here, appellant testified that he mailed the proper notice to plaintiff and paid the postage thereon, and that such notice would have been returned if respondent had not received it. Respondent states positively that he did not receive such notice. The jury heard this evidence, and had an opportunity to observe the conduct and demeanor of the witnesses while testifying, and we cannot say, from this record, that the jury did not have some facts and circumstances before it from which it may not reasonably infer that no notice was given. Appellant says that he mailed this notice. Respondent says he did not receive it; and whether appellant would have been relieved of his obligation, if respondent had received such notice, it is not necessary to decide, but the jury could have inferred from this record that no notice was given.

[2, 3] We now come to the second point urged by appellant, namely, that the court erred in not granting him a new trial on account of surprise in plaintiff's testimony, where it was shown by the stenographer's affidavit, who took the testimony of plaintiff at the first trial in the circuit court, that plaintiff at that trial admitted having received notice of assessments. Respondent, at the second trial in the circuit court, denied having received any notice of assessments, when it is shown by the affidavit of the stenographer, who took the testimony at the first trial in the circuit court, that he admitted having received such notice. When respondent at the second trial denied receiving such notice, appellant may have been surprised; but he neither filed any affidavit nor asked for any postponement of the trial in order to secure a copy of the testimony given at the first trial, but proceeded to offer his evidence in rebuttal, without calling the trial court's attention to the fact that he was surprised, and took chances rather on securing a favorable verdict from the jury with the evidence he had. Under such circumstances it is too late to complain for the first time in his motion for a new trial. Three juries have given a verdict for plaintiff, and we do not think the trial court erred or abused its discretion in overruling appellant's motion for a new trial on this ground. Plumbing Company v. Hugonin, 156 Mo. App. 68, 135 S. W. 967; Miller v. Rankin, 155 Mo. App. 394, 137 S. W. 15; Thiele v. Railway Co., 140 Mo. 319, 41 S. W. 800; Bragg v. City of Moberly, 17 Mo. App. 221; Byrd v. Vanderburgh, 168 Mo. App. 112, 151 S. W. 184.

[4] As to the next reason urged in granting a new trial, or reversing the case, because there was no consideration for the agreement sued on, this court has heretofore passed upon this proposition in the case of Grassmuck v. Ehrler, 207 S. W. 287, loc. cit. 290, wherein it is stated:

"Mrs. Grassmuck thereby canceled the original agreements and accepted in lieu thereof new ones under which her right to demand the repurchase of her stock by defendant was deferred for a definite period of time. Such a contract to forbear is a sufficient consideration for the new promise of the defendant to repurchase. Gate City Nat. Bank v. Elliott (Sup.) 181 S. W. 25; Glasscock v. Glasscock, 66 Mo. loc. cit. 630."

The instructions given in this case are as favorable to appellant as he could possibly ask or expect, and the jury found against him.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the Commissioner recommends that the judgment be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of NIPPER, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

The judgment of the circuit court is accordingly affirmed.

Action by Emma E. Scott against the American Insurance Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. A. Fyke, of Kansas City, E. L. Snider, of Chicago, Ill., and Fenton Hume, of Kansas City, for appellant.

Noyes & Heath, of Kansas City, for respondent.

TRIMBLE, J. This is an action on a policy of fire insurance consisting of $500 on goods consisting of hardware, jewelry, and furniture, $100 on store furniture, and $200 on household furniture, all while contained in a certain building in Kansas City. There were two trials, in each of which there was a verdict for plaintiff, but for some reason not disclosed by the record a new trial was granted after the first verdict. It is stated in one of the briefs that it was because of informality in the verdict returned. However, we are concerned only with the second verdict, since it is from the judgment rendered thereon that defendant has appealed. The verdict was for plaintiff for the full amount of the policy with 10 per cent. damages and $80 attorney's fees for vexatious refusal to pay.

The first contention is that plaintiff is not entitled to recover because her proofs of loss were signed and sworn to by her agent, and not by herself personally.

The goods were kept in Kansas City. The plaintiff lived in California. At her request her father in Kansas City applied for the policy. It was issued and sent by defendant to plaintiff where she lived. When the fire occurred, she, upon hearing of it, had an attorney out West to notify the company. It paid no attention to the notice. She then requested her father to employ an attorney to take the necessary steps to collect the insurance. The father made 25 or 30 calls on the adjuster to get an adjustment and made 8 or 10 appointments with him to go out and look over the loss. Finally the adjuster came out and hastily looked over the scene of the loss. The father was compelled to go north, and left only the attorney to look after the matter of collecting the insurance. The adjuster informed the attorney that no formal proof would be required, that the company would either offer a settlement or deny liability. Nothing being done, the attorney, having waited as long as he thought he should, made out a proof of loss, signing and swearing to it himself, upon a blank obtained from the adjuster. Objections were made to the signing of the proofs by an agent, and not by plaintiff herself. Whereupon the attorney went to the adjuster and asked for the proofs of loss, so that he might send them to the plaintiff for her signature and affidavit. The adjuster refused to let him have it. He, the attorney, then asked for a blank on which to make out a new proof and offered to furnish the kind of proof desired, but the adjuster refused saying they were going to deny liability on the policy and were not going to pay anything. It seems, however, that each side selected an appraiser, and they selected a third, and the three met, but only two of them agreed upon the amount due, but the company did not pay that. So suit was brought.

[1, 2] Under the above and foregoing circumstances, the company cannot defeat the insurance on the ground that the plaintiff herself did not sign the proofs of loss. Hicks v. Empire Ins. Co., 6 Mo. App. 254; German Fire Ins. Co. v. Grunert, 112 Ill. 68, 1 N. E. 113; Lumbermen's Mutual Ins. Co. v. Bell, Extrix., 106 Ill. 400, 4 N. E. 130, 57 Am. St. Rep. 140. There was a waiver of proofs of loss. Keeton v. National Union, 178 Mo. App. 301, 308, 165 S. W. 1107; Wicecarver v. Mercantile Town Mut. Ins. Co., 137 Mo. App. 247, 258, 260, 117 S. W. 698. And it is not necessary to plead waiver in order to show and rely thereon in insurance cases. Andrus v. Fidelity Mut. Life Ins. Co., 168 Mo. 151, 67 S. W. 582.

[3] There was no error in reading the testimony of Stanley Lyons as contained in the transcript of his testimony given at the former trial. It was conceded to be a correct transcript, and the evidence shows he was, at the time of the trial, beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and the plaintiff had made unavailing efforts to locate him. Miller v. Geeser, 193 Mo. App. 1, 180 S. W. 3; Showen v. Metropolitan St. Ry., 164 Mo. App. 41, 148 S. W. 135; Augusta Wine Co. v. Weipert, 14 Mo. App. 483; Davis v. Kline, 96 Mo. 401, 407, 9 S. W. 724, 2 L. R. A. 78.

[4] There was evidence tending to show the property was worth at the time of the fire more than twice the amount of the insurance, and that the fire caused practically a total loss. The goods were not subject to fluctuation or change, as they were not being sold or used in trade, but were stored, and there was no evidence of any depreciation. The policy fixed the value of the property at the time of the insurance. Hilburn v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 140 Mo. App. 355, 124 S. W. 63.

[5] There was evidence from which the jury could find a vexatious refusal to pay, and we would not be warranted in setting aside their verdict in that regard.

The point that error was committed in plaintiff's instruction 1 is answered by what has been said regarding the proof of loss.

The judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

STATE ex rel. CHORN, Superintendent, et al. v. HUDSON. (No. 13394.)

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
June 14, 1920.)

1. Trial \S 150—Failure to read exhibits to jury not ground for demurrer to the evidence.

Where record showed that exhibits were regularly introduced in evidence, and many of the facts shown in the exhibits were admitted in the trial, and witnesses were examined with reference to the matters contained in them, held, that there was no sufficient reason for sustaining a demurrer to the evidence on the ground that they were not formally read to the jury.

2. Insurance \S 141(1)—Policy recognized by insurer and insured not void, although not properly countersigned.

Where a policy of insurance was recognized by the insurer and the insured as a valid obligation, neither could rely on any claim that it was void because not countersigned by the local agent.

3. Bills and notes \S 443(3)—Defendant could not complain that note was held as collateral by one of plaintiffs.

In an action on a note, defendant cannot complain that the note is held as collateral, where both the payee and the one alleged to be holding it collaterally are parties plaintiff and are agreeing as to their respective interests.

4. Insurance \S 197(2) — Contract providing that note covering premiums for six years should become due on failure to pay an assessment valid.

Agreement that the entire amount of a premium note covering six years should become due on failure to pay assessments levied after notice was valid, and insured, having failed to pay an assessment within the time provided, could not escape payment of the entire amount, where he had not canceled his insurance, merely because the insurance was suspended in accordance with the contract, or the company afterwards became insolvent.

5. Insurance \S 226—Cancellation only on consent, except on strict compliance with conditions provided for cancellation.

A contract of insurance having become effective, neither the insurer nor the insured could cancel or terminate it without the other's consent, except on strict compliance with the conditions provided in the policy for cancellation.

6. Insurance \S 197(5)—Whether notice of assessment was mailed held for jury.

In an action on a premium note, which became due on failure to pay an assessment on notice, where defendant did not admit that notice of assessment was mailed, or that he received it, held for the jury to say whether plaintiff's oral evidence that notice of the assessment was mailed to defendant was true or not.

7. Insurance \S 197(5)—Whether insured requested cancellation of policy held for jury.

In an action on a premium note given to cover six years' premiums, the entire note becoming due on failure to pay an assessment after notice, whether insured requested a cancellation, as he had a right to do under the policy, held for the jury.

8. Evidence \S 441(13)—Right of cancellation to be determined from terms of contract, and not from oral promises.

The right of an insured to cancel a fire policy should be determined from the terms of the contract, and not from any oral promises made by any officers of the company at the time the contract was entered into.

TRIMBLE, J. This is an action upon an insurance premium note dated October 2, 1915, given by the defendant to the Farmers' Town Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Mexico, Mo., for $216, in payment of the premium for a period of six years on an insurance policy, issued concurrently with the execution of the note, and covering defendant's mercantile stock, with insurance to an amount not exceeding $1,200. At the close of all the evidence defendant's demurrer thereto was sustained, and a verdict for defendant was directed. The verdict being returned, judgment was entered thereon, and plaintiffs have appealed.

The suit is by the receiver of the insurance company, and also the North Missouri Trust Company, a banking corporation, the latter having a special property interest in the note by reason of the fact that the insurance company had turned over the note in question to it, along with a number of other notes, as collateral security for a loan to the insurance company. The execution and delivery of the note as an insurance premium note is admitted by the answer. The defenses relied upon therein will be stated as they are respectively passed upon herein.

The note provided that the $216 should be paid "in such portions and at such times as the directors of said company shall demand for payment of losses and expenses, as required and provided for by charter, by-laws, and rules of said company." It further provided that the note, "or such part thereof as shall remain unpaid at the expiration or termination of said policy, shall be returned to the maker, provided all assessments on this note and all liabilities of the maker to said company have been paid"; that, "if default is made in payment of this note as above provided, then the whole of this note shall become immediately due and payable." The by-laws provided that 15 per cent. of the note should be paid in cash at the time of its execution and the issuance of the policy, and that the remainder of said note should be payable at any time and in part or in whole upon an assessment made whenever deemed necessary to pay losses, expenses, or other liabilities of the company. This initial payment of $32.40 was paid at the time of the note's execution and delivery, and was credited on said note. By the terms of the policy, the insured, upon acceptance thereof, becomes a member of the mutual insurance company, and is governed by its articles of association and by-laws which become a part of the contract.

Under section 4, article 3, of the by-laws, the amounts assessed upon each note shall be due and payable within 30 days after notice to the maker has been deposited in the post office, postage prepaid, or delivered to him in person. Section 5, article 3, of the by-laws provides that, if the maker of any note neglects or refuses to pay the sum so assessed upon him for 30 days after the mailing or delivery of said notice, the directors of said company may sue for and recover the whole amount of his premium note held by the company with costs of suit. It further provided that the party so in default should lose all benefits and advantages of his insurance during the term of such default and nonpayment, and notwithstanding shall be liable and obliged to pay all assessments that may be made during the continuance of his policy of insurance, provided the full amount has not been recovered by suit. But no person should be liable for a greater amount than the face of his note. Section 4 of article 4 of the by-laws provided that the—"insurance may be terminated by request of insured or by the company, on given notice to that effect, but such cancellation shall not impair the right of this company to recover any existing claims on the note."

The policy provided that it should—

"be canceled at any time at the request of the insured, or by the company by giving five days notice of such cancellation. If this policy shall be canceled as hereinbefore provided, * * * the premium having been actually paid, the unearned portion shall be returned on surrender of this policy * * * this company retaining the customary short rate."

As heretofore stated, the note was dated, and the policy was issued and accepted by insured, and 15 per cent. or $32.40 of the amount of the note was paid and credited thereon, on October 2, 1915. On July 15, 1916, the directors of said company made an assessment of 25 per cent. on said note, amounting to $45.90, and the plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that notice of such assessment was duly mailed. On September 5, 1916, the insurance company wrote defendant, calling his attention to the assessment of $45.90 levied on July 15, 1916, and saying they were calling his attention for the third time to the assessment past due and unpaid, and demanding its payment in five days; otherwise, they would be obliged to enforce collection of the assessment.

Upon a report made by the company to the superintendent of insurance on September 9, 1916, the latter, deeming that the company had become insolvent, applied to the circuit court of Audrain county for the appointment of a receiver, and one was appointed on September 16, 1916, and the company was enjoined from doing further business. On September 25, 1917, the court, upon a proper hearing and finding, ordered a levy of 100 cents on the dollar of all unpaid balances on assessment premium notes of the company, and directed the receiver to collect same. Thereafter defendant was notified that the balance on said note, $183.60, was due, and payment thereof demanded. According to defendant's evidence, he wrote in answer to this demand, asking what they would take for the note.

It will be observed that under the terms of the note, and the contract made by the by-laws and policy, and the acceptance of the latter by defendant, the assessments were to become due in 30 days after notice thereof, and if default were made in the payment of said assessments the whole note should become due, and the note could be collected, with costs of suit. The 25 per cent. assessment was made by the directors on July 15, 1916, and the 30 days were up on August 15, 1916. So that it is plaintiffs' contention the whole note became due when the defendant failed to pay the assessment by August 15, 1916, and that when the court, in control of the receiver, made a levy of 100 cents on the dollar on the assessment notes, and authorized the receiver to sue therefor, the obligation of the defendant to pay the balance on said note, to wit, $183.60, became complete.

The defendant, however, claims that on September 7, 1916, he sent to the insurance company a check for $45.90 in payment of the 25 per cent. assessment levied on the notes by the directors July 15, 1916, and that he wrote the company a letter, saying he did not want the insurance longer, and asked the company to cancel the insurance. No such letter was introduced, nor do plaintiffs concede that such was written. The only evidence of the letter is the oral evidence of defendant to that effect. Defendant admits he did not demand the return of his premium note, nor did he return the policy to the company. Defendant introduced in evidence his check for $45.90, drawn on the Bank of Hartsburg, payable to the insurance company, and the evidence tends to show that it did not go through clearing house or banking circles from Mexico to Hartsburg, but was presented by some one at the bank and there cashed on September 19, 1916. This was four days after the insurance company had been placed in the hands of the receiver. It purported to bear the indorsement of the insurance company by Roy J. Maybee, but there was no indorsement of the receiver thereon.

[1] Defendant makes the point that the demurrer to the evidence can be sustained on the ground that the exhibits which the record shows were introduced in evidence, were not formally read to the jury. But this we regard as untenable. The execution of the note and the policy of insurance, and its acceptance by the defendant, were admitted in the answer, and many of the facts shown in the exhibits were also admitted in the trial, and witnesses were examined in reference to matters contained in them. The record shows they were regularly introduced in evidence. Each side made a statement to the jury of its side of the case, and the trial was conducted in such way as to render unjustifiable any such theory that the mere failure to read the exhibits (which to a large degree contained only legal matters for the court) was a sufficient reason for sustaining the demurrer.

[2] The defendant attempts to justify the giving of the demurrer upon the ground that the policy was void ab initio, and no consideration, in the way of insurance, ever existed, because it was not countersigned by the local agent at Claysville and was not otherwise properly signed; but the policy was recognized by both parties as an obligation, and neither could rely on any claim that it was void.

[3] Neither can the demurrer be sustained on the ground that the note was held as collateral by the North Missouri Trust Company. Both of these are parties plaintiff to the suit, and the petition states the capacity in which each is suing. If the trust company has a special interest in the note, that can make no difference to defendant as to whether he should be compelled to pay it in this suit, since both are parties plaintiff and are agreeing as to their respective interests therein.

[4, 5] Unless defendant paid the assessment of $45.90 levied by the directors within the time provided by the terms of the note and contract, then the whole note became due and payable; and unless the defendant canceled his insurance, he cannot escape the payment thereof merely because the insurance was suspended or the company afterwards became insolvent. Contracts of the character herein dealt with are valid, and the rights of the parties are to be determined according to the terms thereof. Sherman v. Frasier, 112 Iowa, 236, 83 N. W. 886; Garlick v. Mississippi Valley Ins. Co., 44 Iowa, 553; Continental Ins. Co. v. Phipps, 190 S. W. 994; Carlock v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 138 Ill. 210, 28 N. E. 53. The fact that the contract provides for a suspension of the insurance during the default does not release the defendant from the obligation to pay the note when the contract so provides. Home Ins. Co. v. Hamilton, 143 Mo. App. 237, 128 S. W. 273; Continental Ins. Co. v. Phipps, 190 S. W. 994; American Ins. Co. v. Klink, 65 Mo. 78; Continental Ins. Co. v. Burks, 207 S. W. 847; Minnesota Farmers' etc., Ins. Ass'n. v. Olson, 43 Minn. 21, 44 N. W. 672. The suspension of the policy, brought about by the failure of the party defending to perform some condition of the policy, cannot be relied upon, because to permit that would be to allow one to take advantage of his own wrong and default. Huntley v. Perry, 38 Barb. (N. Y.) 569; American Ins. Co. v. Klink, supra; St. Paul, etc., Ins. Co. v. Neidecken, 6 Dak. 494, 43 N. W. 696. The contract of insurance having become effective, neither could cancel or terminate it without the other's consent, except upon strict compliance with the conditions provided in the policy for cancellation. Home Ins. Co. v. Hamilton, 143 Mo. App. 237, 242, 128 S. W. 273.

[6] The defendant does not admit that notice of the 25 per cent. assessment levied by the directors on July 15, 1916, amounting to $45.90, was mailed to him at the time of its levy, nor does he admit receiving said notice, and plaintiffs' proof that such notice was mailed consisted of oral testimony to that effect. Hence, even if the whole of the note did become due and payable, owing to the default in not paying said assessment by August 15, 1916, and even if on account thereof plaintiffs would be entitled to recover, still plaintiffs were not entitled to a directed verdict in their favor, since it would be a question for the jury to say whether plaintiffs' oral evidence that notice of the assessment was mailed to defendant was true or not.

[7] It will be observed, however, that, although the note says, if default is made in the payment of an assessment, the whole of the note shall become immediately due and payable, yet the insurance company did not elect to treat the note as being fully due, but, long after the default, wrote asking only for the payment of the assessment; and in this connection the by-laws say the directors "may" sue, and the petition alleges that the directors "might" sue, for the whole. Consequently, even if by the terms of the note a failure to pay an assessment does render the whole note due, it may be a question whether the company, by failing to insist upon the whole note being due and asking only for the assessment, did not elect to treat the note as not being wholly due, thereby leaving insured with the right, upon paying all that was then demanded of him, to cancel the policy the same as if he had promptly paid the assessment. On the other hand, the company's waiver of the right to treat the whole note as becoming due could well be deemed to be made on the condition that the insured continued, instead of terminating, his policy. And if, as defendant claims, he did request a termination thereof, there is no evidence of any consent on the company's part to such termination after insured's default had occurred. Besides, there is an intimation in the record that other losses had occurred in the meantime which the company was unable to pay, and it may be a question whether the mere failure to insist upon the note being wholly due then would permit the defendant to pay the assessment that was then long past due and escape the payment of the whole note by requesting a termination of his insurance.

These matters, while perhaps suggested, are not dealt with in the briefs, and we do not pass upon them. For, even if the note was not treated as wholly due upon the default in the payment of the July assessment, yet, if defendant did not terminate his insurance, the levy of 100 cents on the dollar by the court in the receivership would entitle the plaintiffs to a recovery of whatever was yet due on the note. And whether defendant ever requested a termination thereof was a question of fact depending for its establishment on the oral testimony of defendant. The testimony on behalf of plaintiffs tends to show that no such request for cancellation and that no check or communication of any kind was received from defendant. Hence the question of whether the defendant ever requested a cancellation (if a mere request be sufficient to effect a cancellation) was a matter for the jury to determine, and not for the trial court to decide on a demurrer to the evidence. A peremptory instruction, therefore, could not be given under the circumstances of this case. Gannon v. Laclede Gaslight Co., 145 Mo. 502, 516, 517, 46 S. W. 968, 47 S. W. 907, 43 L. R. A. 505; Seehorn v. American National Bank, 148 Mo. 256, 265, 49 S. W. 886; Vincent v. Means, 184 Mo. 327, 341, 82 S. W. 96; Printz v. Miller, 233 Mo. 47, 49, 135 S. W. 19; Milliken v. Thyson Com. Co., 202 Mo. 637, 655, 100 S. W. 604; Wolff, Adm'r v. Campbell, 110 Mo. 114, 19 S. W. 622.

[8] In addition to this there is evidence in the case from which the jury could find that defendant himself regarded the note as being an existing obligation against him after he claims to have canceled the insurance. As to this right of cancellation, it should be observed that it should be determined from the terms of the contract, and not from any oral promises made by any officers of the company at the time the contract was entered into. Hence evidence of such oral promises should not have been admitted. And as to the $45.90 which defendant claims to have paid, if it did get into the hands of the company before the receiver was appointed or if the receiver got the benefit of it, this would not defeat recovery, if there was no cancellation, but the $45.90 would then be credited on the note, and judgment would go for the balance.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

All concur.

F. W. WOOLWORTH CO. v. CONNORS.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee. May 17, 1920.)

1. Malicious prosecution §19 — "Probable cause" defined.

The existence of "probable cause," which is the existence of such facts and circumstances as would excite in a reasonable mind the belief that the person charged was guilty of crime, is a complete defense, though the person is innocent.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Probable Cause.]

2. Malicious prosecution §18(5) — Probable cause for prosecution for theft held to have existed.

Where braid was taken from a counter of defendant's store, and the manager was informed by two trusted employes that plaintiff, a stranger, who attempted to leave the store, took the braid, which was found at another counter, there was probable cause for institution of a prosecution against plaintiff for theft.

3. Malicious prosecution §71(2) — Probable cause a mixed question of law and fact.

The question of probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact, and whether the circumstances alleged to show it are true and existed is a matter of fact; but whether, supposing them to be true, they amount to a probable cause, is a question of law.

4. Appeal and error §301—Judgment reversed, without remand, though motion for new trial did not specify error in refusing peremptory instruction.

In an action for malicious prosecution, where defendant moved for peremptory instructions, the appellate court may reverse a judgment for plaintiff, without remand, where the facts established that there was probable cause, though the motion for new trial did not allege error in refusing the peremptory instructions, where it did assert that probable cause was established, and there was no evidence to support verdict.

5. New trial §164—Judgment may be rendered for defendant on motion for new trial, defense being established.

Where there was no evidence to support a verdict for plaintiff, and a defense was established by the uncontradicted facts, it is proper, on motion for new trial, for the court to render judgment for defendant.

6. Appeal and error §301—Refusal of peremptory instruction must be assigned in motion for new trial.

For the appellate court to review the refusal of a peremptory instruction, it should be assigned as error in motion for new trial, for the purpose of giving the lower court an opportunity to correct the error.

Certiorari to Court of Civil Appeals.

Action by Gustine Connors against the F. W. Woolworth Company. A judgment for plaintiff was remanded by the Court of Civil Appeals, and defendant brings certiorari. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and action dismissed.

M. S. Ross and Cherry & Steger, all of Nashville, for plaintiff in error.

O. H. Rutherford and John W. Hildrop, both of Nashville, for defendant in error.

McKINNEY, J. This is an action for malicious prosecution.

The defendant in error was prosecuted by the plaintiff in error in the city court of Nashville for the theft of some braid, but was acquitted. This suit immediately followed.

One of the defenses interposed to this action by the plaintiff in error was that of probable cause.

A very brief outline of the facts upon which the prosecution was predicated is as follows: As Mr. Hanchett, manager of the plaintiff in error's store in Nashville, was about to leave the building one afternoon, he was called by Miss Kimbro, one of the clerks in said store, and told that the defendant in error had taken some braid from counter No. 7 without paying for same, and had started to leave the store, when she apprehended her and took from under her arm a package, to which were attached two packages of braid, and she exhibited the said package, with the braid attached, to Mr. Hanchett. About the time that Mr. Hanchett came over to where Miss Kimbro and the defendant in error were standing, near the north door of said building, he heard another clerk, Miss Clardy, call to Miss Kimbro and state that the plaintiff in error had laid some of the packages of braid on the post card counter, and five packages of braid were observed lying upon said table. Mr. Hanchett, on this information, had the defendant in error arrested, and prosecuted her in the city court, as above stated.

After the defendant in error was acquitted in the city court, she was indicted in the criminal court of Davidson county for the theft of said braid, and on a trial of the case a verdict of not guilty was reported by the jury, and she was discharged. That case, however, is in no sense connected with the case we are now considering, as the indictment in that case was had subsequent to the time at which this suit was instituted.

[1] In considering the defense of probable cause the question of the guilt or innocence of the defendant in error is not necessarily involved. She may have been entirely innocent, and still the plaintiff in error could have relied upon this defense, if properly made out.

On this point the Court of Civil Appeals very properly says:

"As to the first point, the law as to reasonable or probable cause is defined to be such a state of facts in the mind of the prosecutor as would lead a person of ordinary caution and prudence to believe, or entertain an honest or strong suspicion, that the person is guilty. It does not depend on the actual state of the case in point of fact, but upon the honest and reasonable belief of the party commencing the prosecution. In order to maintain an action for malicious prosecution, it is very clear that the plaintiff must aver and prove that the suit complained of was commenced and prosecuted without reasonable or probable cause, and that it was malicious. The warrantlessness of the suit may, in many instances, be so obvious as that malice may be inferred from it. The question of probable cause applies to the nature of the suit, and the point of inquiry is whether the defendant had probable cause to maintain the particular suit upon the existing facts known to him." Newell on Malicious Prosecution, 252.

In Kelton v. Bevins, Cooke, 90, 5 Am. Dec. 670, Judge Overton said:

"The public interest is concerned that offenses should not go unpunished. It is a test of the impropriety of such prosecutions that defendants are acquitted. The true and legal principle is, Had the prosecutor ground to think that a felony had been committed, with the information he possessed at the time of the commencement of the prosecution? If he had, he ought not to be subject to damages in this action. * * *

"To sustain an action for a malicious prosecution, there must not only be malice, but a want of probable cause. In the absence of either of these requisites, the action falls to the ground. Hence the want of probable cause for a prosecution is the test of this action. Though malice exists, if in the estimation of a rational and dispassionate mind there be probable cause for prosecution, the action cannot be sustained. With the information that Kelton possessed, he had reasonable ground to believe that a felony had been committed. He ought not, in justice and sound policy, to be mulct in damages and costs for endeavoring to detect and punish such offenses."

In the case of Raulston v. Jackson, 1 Sneed, 128, the court said:

"The law on this point is, and should have been so charged by the judge, that if the jury found from the proof that the defendant, at the time he instituted the prosecution, acted upon such a state of facts known to him, or derived from reliable information, as would induce a belief in the mind of a prudent, discreet man that the crime had been committed and by the person he was about to prosecute, he was not liable.

"The question is not whether the defendant is really guilty, but was there good and reasonable grounds for the prosecutor to believe he was. * * *

"Instead of requiring direct evidence of the fact of the crime, it may certainly often happen that no crime was in fact committed, and yet the prosecutor justifiable, because of the existence of probable or reasonable grounds to believe the criminal act had been done, and by the accused. If men were not allowed to act upon such grounds, crimes would often go unpunished for want of prosecutors. This action is only intended to apply to cases where a criminal accusation is made against an innocent man through malice, and in the absence of even a fair and reasonable probability of its truth."

In the case of Hall v. Hawkins, 5 Humph. 357, the court said:

"Probable cause is the existence of such facts and circumstances as would excite in a reasonable mind the belief that the person charged was guilty of the crime for which he was prosecuted; that is, acting upon the facts within the knowledge of the prosecutor, if a reasonable man would believe the party guilty of the crime charged, there would exist probable cause for the prosecution."

The foregoing quotations from our authorities give, in the main, the definition as to what constitutes probable cause under the holding of this court, and, with this rule of interpretation, it is but necessary to apply same to the facts of this case in order to determine whether this defense has been properly made out.

[2, 3] The uncontroverted facts upon which the plaintiff in error relies in support of its defense of probable cause are as follows:

First. The taking of the braid.

Second. The information given by Miss Kimbro and Miss Clardy that the defendant in error was the person who took the braid.

Third. That these two ladies were trusted employes, in whom Mr. Hanchett had confidence, and whose statements he relied upon and believed.

Fourth. The exhibition of the two packages of braid attached to the package of tablets, and five packages of braid lying on the post card counter.

Fifth. The attempt of the defendant in error to get out of the store.

Sixth. The defendant in error was a stranger to Mr. Hanchett, Miss Kimbro, and Miss Clardy, neither of whom entertained towards her any ill will or unkind feeling.

The Court of Civil Appeals, in its opinion, states that the defendant in error introduced proof to disprove the evidence introduced by the plaintiff in error on the question of probable cause, but does not state what said proof consists of, and after a careful reading of the record we have been unable to find any contradictory evidence on these propositions.

Counsel for the defendant in error met this by saying that the witnesses for the plaintiff in error have contradicted themselves in their testimony, so as to destroy their evidence; but we are unable to find any contradictions on material matters.

As to the facts set forth above, constituting probable cause, as contended for by the plaintiff in error, the defendant in error in no sense undertakes to contradict them, but directs her proof to the question of her innocence, which, as previously stated, is not necessarily involved in this inquiry.

In Cooper v. Flemming, 114 Tenn. 40, 84 S. W. 801, 68 L. R. A. 849, this court said:

"The question of probable cause is a mixed question of law and fact. Whether the circumstances alleged to show it are true and existed is a matter of fact, but whether, supposing them to be true, they amount to a probable cause, is a question of law."

As previously stated, the facts relied upon by the plaintiff in error to constitute probable cause are not in dispute, and it only remained for the court to apply the law to the uncontroverted facts, and say whether they constituted probable cause. We find nothing in the record to negative the idea that Mr. Hanchett was acting in good faith, based on substantial information.

We are of the opinion that they do make a case of probable cause. After reviewing our decisions on this question, we find several cases where this defense was sustained, where the facts were not as strong as they are in the present case. This being true, the trial judge should have sustained the motion of the plaintiff in error for a directed verdict.

[4-6] It is insisted that this court cannot dismiss the suit, but will have to remand it, for the reason that, in its motion for a new trial, the plaintiff in error did not assign as one of the grounds therefor that the court erred in not granting its motion for peremptory instructions.

It appears that the plaintiff in error, at the conclusion of all the evidence, moved for peremptory instructions on three grounds, as follows:

"(1) That there is no evidence on which to base a verdict.

"(2) That there was probable cause as a matter of law for the prosecution of Mrs. Connors, as alleged in this case.

"(3) That the defendant, F. W. Woolworth Company, or its agent, C. W. Hanchett, acted upon the advice of counsel in the prosecution of Mrs. Connors, particularly that there was probable cause, which is a matter for the court to determine."

This motion for peremptory instructions was denied by the court.

On motion for a new trial, among the many grounds assigned, were the two following:

(1) "There is no evidence to support the verdict."

(2) "The uncontroverted testimony, and all the testimony in the case taken together, shows that C. W. Hanchett, manager of the defendant, F. W. Woolworth Company as a matter of law, had probable cause for causing the detention and arrest of the plaintiff, Gustine Connors."

It will thus be seen that the grounds for peremptory instructions and the motion for a new trial are substantially the same. It is true that it was not alleged in the motion for a new trial that the court was in error in not granting the motion for peremptory instructions; but it called the court's attention to the errors committed by him, which were the basis for the peremptory instructions asked for, and, if the court had corrected the errors on the motion for a new trial, it would have followed, under our practice, that he would have rendered a judgment for the plaintiff in error. Barnes v. Noel, 131 Tenn. 130, 174 S. W. 276.

The reason for the rule, requiring that a motion for peremptory instructions must be assigned as error in the motion for a new trial, is to give the trial court an opportunity to correct the error previously made, and to avoid burdening the higher courts with the work of correcting errors which the trial court could have corrected. The error committed by the trial court was in not holding that, as a matter of law, the defense of probable cause had been made out, and directing a verdict for the plaintiff in error.

On the motion for a new trial plaintiff in error again insisted that the court should have held, as a matter of law, that the defense of probable cause had been shown, and thus the court was given an opportunity to correct the error previously made.

We think this was, in effect, challenging the action of the court in not sustaining the motion for peremptory instructions, upon the ground that there was no evidence upon which to base a judgment in favor of the defendant in error and upon the further ground that the undisputed evidence made out a case of probable cause.

In Southern Railway Co. v. Lewis & Adcock Co., 139 Tenn. 44, 201 S. W. 133, L. R. A. 1918C, 976, this court said:

"An assignment to the effect that the trial court erred in not peremptorily instructing the jury is equivalent to an assignment of error that there was no evidence to support the verdict, since under our practice there could be no peremptory instructions, unless there was no evidence to the contrary."

We think the converse of this would be true.

It results, therefore, that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals, remanding the case, will be reversed, and an order will be entered here dismissing the suit.

WALTON v. COMMISSIONERS OF LIGHT IMPROVEMENT DIST. NO. 1 OF CITY OF BENTON. (No. 12.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 24, 1920.
On Rehearing, June 28, 1920.)

1. Electricity $\Leftrightarrow 1/2$ —On question whether petitioners for improvement district are majority in value, railroad property considered.

In determining whether the requisite majority in value has been obtained by those who petition for the establishment of an improvement district for the purchase of an electric lighting plant, under Kirby's Dig. § 5717, the value of railroad property must be taken into account in view of Acts 1911, p. 244, § 14, relating to the assessment of railroads for general taxation purposes.

On Rehearing.

2. Electricity $\Leftrightarrow 1/2$ —Presumption that corporate officers had authority to sign petition for improvement district held overcome by evidence.

Where a petition for the establishment of an improvement district for the purchase of an electric lighting plant, under Kirby's Dig. § 5717, disclosed that certain corporations had signed the petition by their secretary and treasurer, the presumption that they were authorized to do so was overcome by undisputed testimony of such officers themselves that they had no authority to sign.

3. Electricity $\Leftrightarrow 1/2$ —Presumption of ownership by signers of improvement petition from possession of lands or payment of taxes is prima facie only.

In determining whether a requisite majority in value has been obtained for petition for the establishment of an improvement district for the purchase of an electric lighting plant, under Kirby's Dig. § 5717, the presumption of ownership must be indulged in favor of persons in possession of or who paid taxes on lands to which they have no title of record; but such presumption is prima facie only, and may be overcome by evidence.

4. Electricity $\Leftrightarrow 1/2$ —Evidence held to overcome prima facie presumption of ownership of signers of improvement petition who were in possession or paid taxes.

In determining whether a petition for the establishment of an improvement district to purchase an electric lighting plant, under Kirby's Dig. § 5717, contained a majority in value, evidence held sufficient to destroy the prima facie presumption of ownership of signers who were in possession of lands or who paid taxes thereon.

Appeal from Saline Chancery Court; J. P. Henderson, Chancellor.

Suit by J. W. Walton against the Commissioners of Light Improvement District No. 1 of city of Benton. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Mehaffy, Donham & Mehaffy, of Little Rock, for appellant.

N. A. McDaniel, of Benton, for appellees.

SMITH, J. [1] This suit questions the validity of an improvement district in the city of Benton organized for the purpose of purchasing an electric light plant from a company which had allowed its franchise, obtained from that city, to forfeit. Several questions are raised which we find it unnecessary to decide, as, in our opinion, the petition of the property owners does not contain a majority in value as required by the Constitution.

The court below found otherwise and prepared an elaborate opinion discussing the various issues raised in the case. But in this opinion the court held that the value of the railroad property lying in the city should be excluded. But, in connection with this finding, the court also found that, if it was in error in excluding the railroad property, the petition did not have a majority in value; and there appears to be no doubt that such is the case.

The statute provides that—

"In ascertaining whether the petition for improvement of any land is signed by a majority of the owners in value of the real property in the district adjoining the property to be affected, the council shall take and be governed by the valuation placed upon the property as shown by the last county assessment on file in the county clerk's office. Women, married or single, may sign the petition; guardians may sign for their wards, and executors or administrators may sign for the estates represented by them." Section 5717, Kirby's Digest.

In regard to the assessment of railroads for general taxation purposes, the statute provides that—

"The buildings and side tracks of railroads shall be assessed as real estate, and each building or side track shall be assessed in the incorporated town or district where located. Main track shall also be assessed as real estate, and it shall be apportioned for assessment and taxation between the several towns and school districts through which the railroads run according to the actual mileage in each town and district" (section 14, Act 251, Acts 1911, p. 244), and that rolling stock, materials, and stores shall be assessed as personal property, and that assessment distributed in the same manner.

This assessment of railroad property is made by the state tax commission, and was properly made for the year in question, and the official certificate of the commission showing the railroad assessment in the city of Benton was furnished to and filed with the clerk of the county court. In extending this assessment on the tax books the clerk did not separate the real estate from the personal property, but extended the entire assessment on the personal tax book. He stated, however, that the assessment roll sent him by the tax commission did show the length of the main track and the value thereof, the length of the side tracks and the value thereof, and the value of the buildings, in the city of Benton, and his explanation of his failure to extend these assessments properly was that he did not know what part of the assessment to extend as personal property nor what part as real estate, and he had therefore extended it all as personal property on the personal tax book. But, as appears from the statute quoted, the buildings, main track, and side tracks are assessed as real estate, and the clerk's lack of knowledge of this provision of the statute did not alter the character of the property. The case presented is not one where there has been a failure to assess the railroad property, for it was assessed, and properly so; and it will be observed that the statute does not require the determination of the question of the value of the property in the proposed district to be made from an inspection of the tax books, but the statute is that "the council shall take and be governed by the valuation placed upon the property as shown by the last county assessment on file in the county clerk's office."

The assessment of the railroad properties was on file in the clerk's office, and the railroad was no doubt required to pay the taxes levied on that assessment.

Had the railroad company desired this improvement and, by proper authorization, had signed the petition for it, we think, without question, it would have been proper for the value of its property, as shown by the last county assessment on file in the county clerk's office, to be taken into account, because, within the meaning of the statute, the assessment made by the tax commission is a part of the county assessment. And if this be true, it must also be true that the value of the railroad property should be taken into account in determining whether the requisite majority in value had been obtained by those who petitioned for the establishment of the improvement district.

It follows therefore that the necessary majority has not been obtained, and the decree of the court will therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enjoin the commissioners of the proposed district from further proceeding as prayed in the complaint.

On Rehearing.

Upon the petition for rehearing it is urged that the petition for the organization of the improvement district contained a majority in value of the property even though the railroad assessment is included. Such appears to be the case, if we include in the sum total of the assessed values of the petitioners the property of certain petitioners who had no record title to the property assessed to them, and also the property of certain corporations. If either is excluded, the petition does not contain the necessary majority; if both are included, the petition does contain the necessary majority.

The general manager, who was also secretary and treasurer, of the Owosso Manufacturing Company, testified that he signed the name of that corporation to the petition, but that there had been no resolution or other action of the board of directors authorizing him to do so. The secretaries of two other corporations, who had signed the names of the corporation to the petition, gave substantially the same testimony.

[2] The names of these corporations were signed by the officers who would have signed the petition had authority in fact existed for that action. In such case it is proper to presume that authority for such signatures had been conferred, for, as we said in the case of City of Malvern v. Nunn, 127 Ark. 418, 192 S. W. 909, the board of directors possesses the authority to authorize the signing of the corporate name to such petitions, and the secretary is one of the executive officers who might perform that function. But that presumption is overcome here by the affirmative and undisputed testimony of these officers themselves that no authority to sign had been conferred upon them.

[3] A presumption of ownership is also to be indulged in favor of persons in possession of or who pay taxes on lands to which they have no title of record; and it is urged that this presumption should be treated as conclusive, inasmuch as they might be owners under a will or by descent cast, and this court has held in the case of City of Malvern v. Nunn, supra, that such owners have the right to petition for the creation of improvement districts.

[4] We think, however, that this presumption is only prima facie. And we are also of opinion that this prima facie presumption has been overcome by the testimony on the subject. Judge W. H. Evans testified that he had been a resident of Benton for many years, and had been judge of the circuit court for 12 years; that prior to that service he had been clerk of the circuit court and ex officio recorder for 6 years, and that he owned a set of abstract books, and had been engaged in the abstract business. He testified that he checked over the petition and spent from 2 to 3 hours per day for 8 or 10 days in a diligent search to ascertain the source of title of the petitioners now under consideration, and that the petitioners had no deeds of record to the lands assessed to them. Many landowners negligently fail to have their deeds recorded, and such, no doubt, is the case here, but in the case of City of Malvern v. Nunn, supra, we said:

"Deeds of record in the recorder's office in the county, at the time the council passes on the question, are the criterion in so far as the property represented by instruments subject to record is concerned."

Under the showing made, the names of these petitioners were properly excluded.

The petition for rehearing will be overruled, as, upon a reconsideration of the record in the case, it appears that a majority in value of the property owners have not petitioned for the improvement.

ELLIS v. STATE. (No. 62.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 21, 1920.)

1. Witnesses \S 388(5)—Cross-examination to impeach defendant not erroneous as introduction of confession without proof of voluntary character.

Where court did not permit any testimony in nature of a confession to go to jury, there was no error on any theory state was permitted on cross-examination to introduce confession, without first proving it was voluntary; purpose of defendant's cross-examination as to statements made by him on examining trial being merely to lay foundation for impeachment.

2. Criminal law \S 517(2)—Statements on examining trial in nature of confessions admissible.

Statements made by defendant, accused of receiving stolen goods, on the examining trial, in the nature of confessions of guilt, having been made in open court voluntarily, are admissible.

3. Criminal law \S 883—Verdict not specifying offense defined by instructions not defective.

Verdict, "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty and leave the punishment to the court," held not fatally defective on account of its form; the court having fully and correctly instructed as to the essentials of the crime charged, that of receiving stolen property.

4. Criminal law \S 798½—Charge as to form of verdict proper.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen property, a charge as to form of verdict held proper.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County; John W. Wade, Judge.

Will Ellis was convicted of receiving stolen goods, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Troy W. Lewis, of Little Rock, for appellant.

Jno. D. Arbuckle, Atty. Gen., and Silas W. Rogers, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WOOD, J. Appellant was indicted, under section 1830 of Kirby's Digest, for the crime of receiving stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, with intent to deprive the true owner thereof. He was convicted, and appeals from a judgment sentencing him to 18 months' imprisonment in the state penitentiary.

There was testimony on behalf of the state tending to prove that in January, 1920, articles of clothing were stolen from several persons in Little Rock, Pulaski county, Ark., of the aggregate value of more than $300. Two boys confessed to stealing the property, and they told the police officers where the articles could be found. They were under a dwelling house at 315 Gaines street, up near the front. Appellant, after he was arrested, also told the officers where they could find the stolen goods. On cross-examination, one of the officers was asked if he knew whether or not appellant was whipped at police headquarters. He answered that he did not know anything about it. After this, the question was repeated, and objected to by the state. The court, at this juncture, sustained the objection, reserving a final ruling until appellant showed that he was subjected to a whipping for the purpose of extorting statements from him. The boys who stole the property stated that they deposited the same at Nineteenth and Commerce. One of these stated that, at appellant's request, witness and one Davis "went out there, and got out the stuff, and carried it down to the house" where appellant resided; that appellant stated he would put it where it could not be found. The witness testified that the appellant knew that the articles were stolen. Witness stated that he so informed the appellant.

The testimony of the appellant was to the effect that he did not have any conversation with the parties who stole the goods. He was informed by one Davis, after the parties were arrested, that the goods were taken to appellant's house. Appellant looked for the things, and could not find them. The officers arrested appellant and took him to the city hall, where they asked him about the suit cases containing the articles. Appellant testified that the officers beat him up, so he did not know what he was talking about. They whipped him "on his naked meat," broke the skin, and brought blood from him. One of the officers put his foot on his head and was holding him down on the floor. This officer hit appellant over the head three times with a black-jack. After beating him, they gave him salve for his wounds. They injured his back, and he passed blood in his urine. They tried to make him confess that he stole the two grips. At this juncture the appellant was asked the following question:

"Q. Did you confess it?"

"A. No."

Among other instructions the court gave the following:

"If you find the defendant guilty, you will say, 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of receiving stolen property, as charged in the indictment, and fix his punishment at' a term of years in the penitentiary not less than one, or no more than five years. If you find the defendant guilty, and cannot agree upon the punishment, you will leave that to the court, and in that event the court will fix the punishment."

The appellant duly excepted to the ruling of the court in giving this instruction. The jury returned a verdict as follows:

"We, the jury, find the defendant guilty, and leave the punishment to the court."

There was no objection by the appellant, at the time the verdict was rendered, to the form of the verdict.

[1] The appellant contends that the court erred in permitting the state to introduce the confession of appellant, without first proving that the confession was free and voluntary. The record does not bear out counsel for appellant in his contention that the state, over the objection of appellant, introduced a confession by appellant in order to establish his guilt. Although appellant testified that he was severely beaten by the officers for the purpose of making him confess, nevertheless he denied that he made any confession. The proof introduced on behalf of the state did not tend to prove any confession on the part of appellant. True, the prosecuting attorney propounded certain questions in his cross-examination of appellant concerning alleged statements made by appellant when a witness on the examining trial before the municipal court. The appellant answered these questions by saying that he did not know, or by categorically denying that he made the statements attributed to him. It is manifest that the purpose of this examination was not to introduce any alleged statement of the appellant in order to show a confession, but for the purpose of laying the foundation for the impeachment of appellant as a witness.

[2] The record, as abstracted by appellant's counsel, does not show that the court permitted any testimony in the nature of a confession to go to the jury. Moreover, if any of the statements made by appellant on the examining trial were susceptible of being construed as in the nature of confessions of guilt, such statements were made in open court, and besides were entirely voluntary. See Iverson v. State, 99 Ark. 453, 138 S. W. 958. It was proved that the appellant was anxious to testify before the examining court. There was no prejudicial error in the rulings of the court in admitting or excluding testimony.

[3, 4] The appellant did not object to the form of the verdict at the time same was rendered. Furthermore, the verdict was not fatally defective on account of its form. The court had fully and correctly instructed the jury as to the essentials of the crime of which appellant was accused. When the verdict is taken in connection with the instructions, there can be no doubt that the jury intended to find appellant guilty of receiving stolen property, knowing at the time he received it that same was stolen. The court had instructed the jury, that, before they could find the defendant guilty, they "must find that, at the time he received it, he did so receive it with the knowledge that it was stolen, and that he had the intent, in so receiving it, to deprive the true owner of the property." There was no error in the instruction as to the form of the verdict.

The indictment charged that appellant "did unlawfully and feloniously receive and have, with the felonious intent to deprive the true owners thereof, he then and there well knowing that the property had been so feloniously stolen," etc. When the jury found the appellant guilty as charged in the indictment, they necessarily found that he received the goods, knowing at the time that they were stolen.

There is no error. Affirmed.

AMERICAN RY. EXPRESS CO. v. COLLINS. (No. 63.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 21, 1920.)

1. Carriers ⇨134—Evidence held to show identity of shipment by express.

In action against express company for loss of plaintiff's son's effects, delivered to company by Navy Department for transmission to plaintiff, evidence held to warrant finding that the articles contained on the list of son's effects given plaintiff by Navy Department were those delivered by the department to express company.

2. Carriers ⇨136—Whether express company delivered same package received by it held for jury.

In an action against an express company for loss of the effects of plaintiff's son, delivered to it by the Navy Department for transmission to plaintiff, whether or not the department delivered to the express company the personal effects that belonged to plaintiff's son, and whether the company tendered to plaintiff the same package, held for the jury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Yell County; A. B. Priddy, Judge.

Action by J. K. Collins against the American Railway Express Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Bohlinger, of Dardanelle, for appellant.

WOOD, J. Jerry Collins died on the United States hospital ship Mercy. The Navy Department furnished J. K. Collins, his father, hereafter called appellee, a list of his son's personal effects. Appellee instructed the Navy Department to forward by express his son's belongings to him at Ola, Ark. June 15, 1919, the agent of the American Railway Express Company, hereafter called appellant, attempted to deliver to appellee a bundle of clothing which it had received from Norfolk, Va. Upon examination of the package appellee became satisfied that it did not contain the property of his son. It did not contain all the items on the list of his son's property which had been sent the appellee by the Navy Department. Some of the items were marked "R. Collins." Appellee thought the package delivered weighed more than the weight given of the package containing his son's property. The Navy Department sent to the appellee a bill of lading November 1, 1918. He turned the bill of lading over to the telegraph operator at Ola and requested him to trace the goods, which the operator afterwards told him that he could not locate. Appellee made several inquiries of appellant's agent at Ola, and upon being unable to locate the goods appellee brought this action against the appellant August 12, 1919, to recover damages for the loss of the articles, which he valued at the sum of $85. The bill of lading and the list of articles furnished appellee by the Navy Department were without objection introduced in evidence. Appellee testified to the items which were included in the list sent him by the Navy Department and which were not contained in the package tendered him by the appellant. On cross-examination appellee stated that he could not swear that the items claimed as missing had ever been delivered to appellant, and that he could not swear that the items claimed by him were the items listed under the heading of personal effects on the blank furnished by the Navy Department; but he further stated on redirect examination that the list of his son's personal effects offered in evidence had been forwarded to him by the Navy Department through the mail. He could not swear that the appellant issued the bill of lading which was sent him.

The court instructed the jury, among other things, that the burden was upon the appellee to make out his case by a preponderance of the evidence, and that unless the goods of appellee's son were delivered to the appellant it would not be liable; that if appellant tendered to appellee the goods that were delivered to it by the Navy Department for shipment to appellee the appellant would not be liable. The appellant asked the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict in its favor. The court refused to grant appellant's prayer. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the appellee in the sum of $55. From the judgment in that sum is this appeal.

Appellant contends that there is no testimony to show that the items listed by the Navy Department, which list was sent by the Navy Department through the mail to appellee, were ever delivered to the appellant; that there is no testimony to show that the package which appellant tendered to appellee was not the identical package which it received from the Navy Department for shipment to the appellee.

[1, 2] This contention of appellant is untenable. Although appellee was unable to identify the articles contained on the list sent by the Navy Department as the ones delivered by the Navy Department to appellant for shipment to the appellee, and although no other witness testified that they were the same articles delivered to appellant for shipment to the appellee, yet the jury were warranted in finding that such were the facts from the list sent by the Navy Department through the mail to the appellee and the direction given by the appellee to the Navy Department to ship the articles contained on the list to him, and the further fact that the Navy Department sent in its letter to appellee the bill of lading showing that the Navy Department had delivered to appellant a package to be transported to the appellee. This fact made it an issue for the jury to say whether or not the Navy Department delivered to appellant the personal effects that belonged to appellee's son, and whether appellant tendered to appellee this same package.

The court did not err in submitting this issue to the jury. Appellant does not complain that the issue was submitted under erroneous instructions. Appellant only contends that there was no substantial evidence to take that issue to the jury. We are convinced that there was such evidence.

The judgment is correct, and therefore affirmed.

COLE v. STATE. (No. 68.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 21, 1920.
Rehearing Denied July 12, 1920.)

1. Intoxicating liquors §20—Statute providing for summary seizure and destruction valid.

The statute providing for the summary seizure and destruction of intoxicating liquors kept in a prohibited district to be sold contrary to law is valid.

2. Jury §19(15)—Jury trial in proceeding to condemn intoxicating liquors not contemplated.

The statute providing for the summary seizure and destruction of intoxicating liquors kept in a prohibited district to be sold contrary to law does not contemplate jury trial in a proceeding for the condemnation of such liquors.

3. Intoxicating Liquors \S 250.—Defendant complaining of condemnation of liquor must show he was not negligent in failing to attend hearing.

It is the duty of a litigant to keep himself informed of the progress of his case, and one charged with illegal sale of intoxicants, seeking relief against a collateral judgment for their condemnation on the ground of unavoidable casualty in not attending the hearing, must show that he himself was not guilty of negligence in failing to be present, a requirement not satisfied by testimony of himself and his attorney that they understood the case was set for a later hour than recited in the bill of exceptions.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Sebastian County; John Brizzolara, Judge.

W. H. Cole was prosecuted for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, and acquitted, and from a collateral judgment that the alcohol in possession of the sheriff and claimed by defendant be publicly destroyed, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This appeal involves the validity of a judgment of the circuit court adjudging that ten gallons of alcohol in the possession of the sheriff of Sebastian county, Ark., and claimed by W. H. Cole, be publicly destroyed by the sheriff.

It appears from the transcript that the cause was specially set for hearing in the circuit court at 8:30 a. m. on November 17, 1919, and that the defendant was notified of the setting of the case for that time. When the case came on to be heard, the defendant and his counsel were separately called, but neither one made any appearance in the proceeding. The prosecuting attorney on behalf of the state introduced evidence tending to show that the ten gallons of alcohol had been taken by the sheriff from the possession of W. H. Cole, and that said Cole kept alcohol to be sold contrary to law. The alcohol was destroyed by the sheriff in compliance with the order of the circuit court.

Subsequently, at the same term of the court, the defendant filed a motion for a new trial, in which he set up that he had been charged with the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, and had been acquitted of the charge, that the alcohol had been seized by the sheriff, and that the case, in so far as the seizure of the alcohol was concerned, had been continued several times at the instance of the prosecuting attorney, and at each time the case had been set for 1 o'clock p. m.; that the case had been finally set for November 17, 1919, and that both Cole and his attorney understood that it was set for 9 o'clock a. m.; that the attorney of Cole resided near the courthouse, and came there at 8:40 o'clock a. m. on the morning in question for the purpose of appearing for Cole in the case; that when he arrived the case had been disposed of and the alcohol ordered destroyed; that the sheriff complied with the order of the circuit court as soon as it was made, and immediately publicly destroyed the alcohol; that both Cole and his attorney understood the proceeding to be set for trial in the circuit court at 9 o'clock a. m. on the day of November 17, 1919. The case is here on appeal.

J. E. London, of Van Buren, and T. S. Osborne, of Ft. Smith, for appellant.

Jno. D. Arbuckle, Atty. Gen., and Silas W. Rogers, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] It may be stated at the outset that the court has held valid our statute providing for the summary seizure and destruction of intoxicating liquors kept in a prohibited district to be sold contrary to law, and that the act does not contemplate a trial by jury in a proceeding to condemn and destroy such liquors. Kirkland v. State, 72 Ark. 171, 78 S. W. 770, 65 L. R. A. 76, 105 Am. St. Rep. 25, 2 Ann. Cas. 242.

It appears from the bill of exceptions that the case was specially set for 8:30 a. m. on November 17, 1919, and that it was heard and determined at that time. It is true that according to the affidavits of Cole and his attorney they understood that the case was set at a different hour on that day, but these affidavits were not sufficient to conclusively overcome the recital in the bill of exceptions that the case had been specially set for 8:30 a. m.

[3] The court overruled Cole's motion for a new trial because it did not state the facts, and it cannot be said that the finding of the court in this respect is without evidence to support it. The case was brought regularly on for trial and was regularly submitted for decision. It is the duty of a litigant to keep himself informed of the progress of his case, and the party seeking relief against a judgment on the ground of unavoidable casualty must show that he himself is not guilty of negligence. Trumbull v. Harris, 114 Ark. 493, 170 S. W. 222.

As above stated, the testimony of Cole and his attorney to the effect merely that they understood the case was set for a later hour does not conclusively overcome the recital in the bill of exceptions that the case was specially set for trial at 8:30 a. m.; and it cannot be said, therefore, that the judgment of the court in overruling Cole's motion for a new trial is not without evidence to support it.

Therefore the judgment will be affirmed.

HUMPHREYS, J., not participating.

SMITH v. J. M. TAYLOR & CO. (No. 74.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 21, 1920.
Rehearing Denied July 12, 1920.)

1. Payment \S 65(6)—One asserting payment of an obligation has burden of proof.

Where defendant asserted payment of a duebill given plaintiff, defendant had the burden of proof on that issue.

2. Payment \S 74(1)—Evidence held to show payment of duebill.

In suit for an accounting brought by a negro farmer against a merchant, evidence held to warrant finding in favor of the merchant that a duebill given the negro had been paid; it appearing the negro had executed a receipt.

3. Appeal and error \S 907(5)—Presumption that books of account not brought into record supported decree.

In a suit for an accounting, where the decree recited that on presentation of defendant's books in open court, it was adjudged that a certain amount was due, and the books were not brought into the record by bill of exceptions, or otherwise, it will be presumed by the appellate court that they sustained the findings and decree.

4. Frauds, statute of \S 23(3)—Recital of mortgages took transaction out of statute.

Where mortgages recited that they were given to secure advancements, and provided that defendant storekeeper should furnish supplies to plaintiff and his hands, the recitals constituted the undertakings original obligations without the statute, and so there might be a recovery, though the supplies, instead of being charged to plaintiff, were charged to his hands.

Appeal from Cross Chancery Court; A. L. Hutchins, Chancellor.

Suit by Walter Smith against J. M. Taylor & Co. which cross-complained. From a decree for defendant on its cross-complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. R. Bond and Killough, Lines & Killough, all of Wynne, for appellant.

J. C. Brookfield, of Wynne, for appellee.

HUMPHREYS, J. Appellant, a negro farmer, instituted suit against appellee, a supply merchant, for an accounting growing out of transactions between them for the years 1916, 1917, and 1918, and for judgment in the sum of $1,400. Appellee filed answer, denying any indebtedness on account of transactions between them, and, by way of cross-complaint, alleging that appellant was indebted to his supply store in the sum of $590.60, with interest thereon from October 25, 1918, after giving appellant credit for all amounts paid in cash or cotton; that, to secure advances made to appellant and his hands in 1917 and 1918, appellant executed two notes, secured by mortgages upon certain chattels and crops being raised by appellant, the first note and mortgage being executed on June 30, 1917, and due November 15, 1917, and the second note and mortgage upon May 25, 1918, due and payable in six months thereafter, both notes bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from their respective dates. The cross-bill contained a prayer for foreclosure in the total sum of $590.60, the alleged balance due on open account for advances made by appellee to appellant and his hands. Appellant pleaded the statute of frauds as a defense to appellee's claim for merchandise furnished his hands. The cause was submitted upon the pleadings, evidence, and exhibits thereto, from which the court found that appellant was indebted to appellee in the sum of $590.60, and upon which finding a judgment and decree of foreclosure against the property were rendered. From the judgment and decree, an appeal has been duly prosecuted to this court.

Appellant contends that in stating the account the trial court erred: First, in disallowing him $400 and interest on alleged loan; second, in allowing appellee a large sum in excess of $127 for merchandise in 1917; third, in allowing appellee $317.90 and interest on account of merchandise furnished R. H. Murray, and $51.95 and interest for merchandise furnished A. C. Chapman.

[1, 2] 1. Appellant testified: That he loaned appellee $400 on December 19, 1916, for a short time, and took the following duebill as evidence of the indebtedness:

"Parkin, Ark.

"In Account with J. M. Taylor Co.

"I have borrowed $400 from Walter Smith for two weeks.

"J. M. Taylor. 12/19/16."

That he gave appellee a check on the Parkin Home Bank for the amount. That he deposited the duebill with the bank in order for appellee to pay it if he desired to do so, as well as for safe-keeping, where it remained, without being presented for payment, until February or March, 1919, at which time it was returned to him on request. That appellee never repaid, and still owes, the amount to him. On the 20th day of December, 1916, appellant's account with the bank was charged with $400.

Appellee testified that he bought some cotton from appellant and owed him $400; that, on account of the bank being closed, appellant did not want a check, and asked for a duebill, which he gave him; that he paid the duebill and took a receipt, as appellant did not have it with him at the time he paid it; that he wrote the receipt, and appellant signed it. The receipt is as follows:

"Received of J. M. Taylor for duebill dated 12/19/16 paid in full. 12/28/16. Walter Smith."

Appellant testified that he signed the receipt when he signed the first note and mortgage, without knowing its contents or that he was signing a receipt.

The point of difference as to whether the duebill evidenced money loaned or cotton sold is really immaterial further than to show who had the better memory. Both testified that it represented a bona fide indebtedness. The all-important question is whether it was paid. The burden, of course, was upon appellee to establish the payment. The receipt strongly corroborates the testimony of appellee on this point, unless obtained through deceit or fraud. There is nothing in the evidence to indicate fraud or deceit. Appellant could read, and was negligent unless he did so. The other papers signed by him did not bear the same date of the receipt. Neither he nor the bank, with whom the duebill was left, ever presented it for payment. We think appellee met the burden. The testimony preponderates in favor of payment.

[3] 2. Appellant testified positively that he only purchased merchandise to the amount of $127 from appellee in 1917; that the items in excess of that amount were items purchased in 1916, for which he had settled.

Appellee testified to the correctness of the items from a statement made up from the books, and agreed to produce the books in open court for the inspection of the court and parties, including the book in which the running account for 1916 was entered, so that it might appear whether the items charged in 1916 and paid for were carried into the 1917 account. Appellee admitted that appellant had paid the running account of 1916 in full.

The contention of appellant on this point is that, had the book of 1916 been produced, it would have disclosed that items purchased in 1916, and paid for, had been carried forward and entered as purchases in 1917. This contention is met and fully answered by the recital in the decree that—

"Upon presentation of defendant's books in open court, it is found and adjudged that the amount due, secured by said mortgages and notes, is the sum of $590.60."

The books not having been brought into the record by bill of exceptions or otherwise, and this evidence not being before us, we must presume that it sustained the finding and decree of the court.

[4] 3. The evidence disclosed that R. H. Murray and A. C. Chapman were appellant's hands; that, during the year 1917, R. H. Murray obtained merchandise of the value of $317.90, and A. C. Chapman of the value of $51.95, from appellee, which accounts were carried on the books as accounts against R. H. Murray and A. C. Chapman; that the mortgages, which were given to secure advancements, contained the stipulation that appellee was to furnish supplies to appellant and his hands. These clauses in the mortgages constituted the undertakings original obligations, and therefore not within the statute of frauds.

No error appearing, the decree is affirmed.

HOME LIFE & ACCIDENT CO. v. COMPTON. (No. 75.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 21, 1920.)

Insurance — §136(2)—Delivery of policy to insured's wife held compliance with "delivery" clause.

Delivery of life policy by insurer to wife of insured in keeping with his instructions held a delivery within meaning of delivery clause, test of delivery not being whether policy was deposited with insured, but whether it passed intentionally out of insurer's control into that of insured.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Delivery.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Independence County; Dene H. Coleman, Judge.

Suit by Susie Compton against the Home Life & Accident Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. D. Wynne, of Fordyce, for appellant.
S. M. Bone, of Batesville, for appellee.

HUMPHREYS, J. Appellee instituted suit against appellant in the Independence circuit court to recover $2,000, as beneficiary of a policy of life insurance issued by appellant on the life of her husband, Thos. S. Compton, Jr.

Appellee filed answer, pleading nonliability on the alleged ground that the policy was not delivered to the insured during his lifetime and while in good health, and, for that reason, under the terms of the policy, was an incomplete contract.

The cause was heard upon the pleadings and evidence, at the conclusion of which each party requested a peremptory instruction in his favor. The court refused the request of appellant and granted the request of appellee. In response to the peremptory instruction in favor of appellee, the jury returned a verdict against appellant in the sum of $2,000. The court thereupon assessed a penalty of 12 per cent. on the face of the judgment, $250 attorney's fee, and rendered judgment against appellant for $2,480, from which judgment an appeal has been duly prosecuted to this court.

The facts necessary to a determination of the only question presented by this appeal are as follows: In the month of August, 1918, Thos. S. Compton, Jr., the then husband of appellee, applied for two life insurance policies of $2,500 each in appellant's life insurance company. On account of having entered the military service during the war between the United States and Germany, appellant company issued a policy for only $2,000 and mailed same, on the 4th day of October, 1918, to its agent, R. M. Carter, at Batesville, Ark., for delivery and collection of the first premium. The policy contained the following clause:

"This policy shall not take effect until the first premium shall have been actually paid and the policy actually delivered to the insured during the lifetime and good health of the insured."

In the interim between the application and the issuance of the policy the insured, Thos. S. Compton, Jr., directed the agent to deliver the policy, when it came, to his wife, the beneficiary therein, for him. When the policy arrived, the insured was at Camp Mayberry, Austin, Tex. The policy was received by the agent on the 5th day of October, 1918, and on the same day, delivered by him to Susie Compton, wife of the said Thos. S. Compton, Jr. At the time the agent delivered the policy, he collected the first year's premium and accounted to appellant company for the amount due it. The insured, Thos. S. Compton, Jr., was in good health at the time the policy was delivered, but on the 13th of the month died of influenza at said camp. His body was shipped back to Batesville and interred. Proof of his death was made to appellant company in accordance with the requirement of the policy, and payment was refused on the ground that the policy was not delivered in person to the insured in his lifetime.

Appellant contends that the contract was incomplete and not binding on it, because the policy was not actually delivered to the insured; in other words, the contention is made that the delivery of the policy to the wife of Thos. S. Compton, Jr., in keeping with his instruction so to do was not a delivery to him within the meaning of the delivery clause in the policy. The test of an actual delivery of an insurance policy by the insurer, or its agent, to the insured, is not whether it was deposited with the insured, but whether it passed intentionally out of the control or dominion of the insurer, or its agents, into the control or dominion of the insured. It is not an essential to actual delivery that there be a manual delivery to the insured. A delivery to a third person, designated by the insured, is to all intents and purposes a delivery to the insured. 14 R. C. L. 898; National Life Ass'n v. Speer, 111 Ark. 173, 163 S. W. 1188; Mo. State Life Ins. Co. v. Burton, 129 Ark. 137, 195 S. W. 371. In the two Arkansas cases supra the court held, under the facts of each, there had been no delivery of the policies. In those cases the companies and their agents had not parted with the control or dominion over the policies; but the doctrine was clearly announced in the case of National Life Ass'n v. Speer, and clearly inferable in Mo. State Life Ins. Co. v. Burton, Adm'r, that, if an insurance company had intentionally parted with the control of and dominion over the policies, such act would amount to a delivery of the policies within the meaning of clauses similar to the delivery clause in the policy involved in the instant case.

No error appearing, the judgment is affirmed.

PEARMAN v. PEARMAN et al. (No. 67.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 21, 1920.)

1. Quieting title \S 12(4)—Plaintiff must be in possession unless title be merely equitable.

The equity jurisdiction to quiet title independent of statute can only be invoked by a plaintiff in possession, unless his title be merely an equitable one, since where the title is legal and some one else in possession, the remedy at law is plain, adequate, and complete.

2. Taxation \S 793—Tax title cannot be confirmed where another is in adverse possession of premises.

Where plaintiff in a suit to confirm a tax title had previously given permission to his son to occupy the premises rent free, and it appeared that after the son's death his widow claimed that the land was a gift to the son, and was in actual adverse possession, it was error to confirm the tax title in view of Kirby's Dig. \S 665, providing that there shall be no confirmation of the sale of any lands that are in actual possession of any person claiming title adverse to petitioner.

Appeal from Arkansas Chancery Court; John M. Elliott, Chancellor.

Suit by G. W. Pearman and others against Anna Pearman to confirm a tax title. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

G. W. Pearman brought this suit in equity under that part of chapter 25 of Kirby's Digest relating to the confirmation of tax titles.

Anna Pearman was allowed to file exceptions to the petition on the ground that she resided on the property and was in actual adverse possession of it. G. W. Pearman filed a response, in which he denied that Anna Pearman was in legal possession of the property, or had been for several years last past.

G. W. Pearman was a witness for himself. According to his testimony, he was the owner of three lots in the town of De Witt, Ark., and had owned them since December, 1898. The lots in controversy were sold at a tax sale in 1896 for the taxes of 1895. On June 14, 1898, the clerk executed a tax deed to J. A. Gibson, the purchaser at the tax sale. On June 25, 1898, J. A. Gibson, by a quit-claim deed conveyed the lots to L. C. Smith, and in December, 1898, L. C. Smith conveyed the lots to G. W. Pearman. G. W. Pearman has paid the taxes on the lots every year since he purchased them. He gave his son, Arthur Pearman, permission to build a house on the lots. He furnished to his son part of the lumber, and his son, who was a carpenter by trade, furnished the balance of the lumber and material, and himself erected the house. Pearman allowed his son to live on the place rent free, and intended that in case he died first that his son should have the lots as a part of his portion of the father's estate. The son became sick, and went West for his health. On his return he resided with his father, but was allowed to receive the rents from the property. The son rented out the property, and his tenant was in possession of it at the time he died. A few days before the son's death, G. W. Pearman told him that he intended to deed the property to the son's infant child as soon as he could quiet the title to the property.

Anna Pearman is the widow of Arthur Pearman, who was the son of G. W. Pearman. She and Arthur Pearman were married on the 2d day of October, 1915, and lived together as husband and wife until the husband died. A child was born unto them on November 4, 1916, and it died just three months after the death of its father. Arthur Pearman and Anna Pearman, his wife, moved into the house which had been built by him on the lots in controversy, as soon as they were married, and lived there until Arthur Pearman went West for his health. They then rented the property, and Arthur Pearman collected the rents as long as he lived. After Arthur Pearman died, Anna Pearman did not collect the rents for two months, but after their baby died she again began collecting the rents. Subsequently she moved into the house, and requested G. W. Pearman to make her a deed to the property, claiming that he had given the lots to his son before the latter erected the dwelling house on them. G. W. Pearman refused to make her a deed, and she continued to reside on the lots, claiming title to them and claiming to hold them adversely to G. W. Pearman. This all occurred before G. W. Pearman brought suit under the statute to confirm his title in the lots. During the pendency of the proceedings, G. W. Pearman died, and the proceedings were revived in the name of his two sons, who were his sole heirs at law.

The chancellor found the issues in their favor, and the title to the lots was quieted in them against the claims of all persons whomsoever. Anna Pearman has appealed.

R. D. Rasco, of De Witt, for appellant.
Lee & Moore, of Clarendon, for appellees.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The equity jurisdiction to quiet title, independent of statute, can only be invoked by a plaintiff in possession, unless his title be merely an equitable one. The reason is that where the title is a purely legal one and some one else is in possession, the remedy at law is plain, adequate, and complete, and an action of ejectment cannot be maintained under the guise of a bill in chancery. In such case the adverse party has a constitutional right to a trial by a jury. Mathews v. Marks, 44 Ark. 436; Ashley v. Little Rock, 56 Ark. 391, 19 S. W. 1058; Burke v. St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 72 Ark. 256, 50 S. W. 275, and St. Louis Refrigerator & Wooden Gutter Co. v. Thornton, 74 Ark. 383, 86 S. W. 852.

The action has been greatly extended by statute, and in many states is the ordinary mode of trying disputed titles. Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (3d Ed.) vol. 4, § 1896. Such is not the case in this state, however.

Section 665 of Kirby's Digest, which is a part of the chapter relating to the method of procedure in confirming tax titles, provides that there shall be no confirmation of the sale of any lands that are in actual possession of any person claiming title adverse to the petitioner. At the time the proceedings in the case at bar were brought by G. W. Pearman, Anna Pearman was in the actual possession of the lots in controversy, claiming title thereto adverse to the petitioner. She claimed that G. W. Pearman had given the lots to his son, who was her husband, and that she and her husband had resided on the lots until they went West, and afterwards collected the rents on the same until his death. He left surviving him his widow and an infant child. The child died in about three months after the father and the widow went into possession of the lots after her child's death, and she claimed to hold adversely to G. W. Pearman at the time he brought the proceedings to confirm his tax title in the lots.

[2] Anna Pearman did not seek to quiet her own title to the lots, and thereby give the court jurisdiction of the entire controversy, as was the case in Goodrum v. Ayers, 56 Ark. 93, 19 S. W. 97. She was content to file exceptions to the right of G. W. Pearman to have his tax title confirmed, and did not seek affirmative relief on her own account. She was in adverse possession of the lots at the time G. W. Pearman filed his petition to confirm his tax title, and the court erred in granting the relief prayed for.

It follows that the decree must be reversed, and the cause will be remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the principles of equity and not inconsistent with this opinion.

HETTLE et al. v. STATE. (No. 76.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 21, 1920.)

1. Indictment and Information \S 114—Indictment held insufficient to sustain conviction of second offense of illegal cohabitation.

Since under Kirby's Dig. \S 1810, the offense of illegal cohabitation is a graded crime, and the fact of whether it is a first, second, or third offense is an element in the punishment thereof, an indictment for illegal cohabitation, failing to charge a second offense, was insufficient to sustain a conviction for a second offense.

2. Indictment and Information \S 81(1)—Indictment held not defective as not charging an offense by persons named in caption.

An indictment for illegal cohabitation was not defective in that no one was charged in the body of the indictment with having committed the offense, where the two accused persons were properly named in the caption of the indictment, and were charged in the indictment with having committed the offense, by reference to their names set out in the caption, and in the latter part of the indictment were specifically named as the parties against whom the indictment was preferred.

3. Criminal law \S 369(1), 1169(11)—Admitting evidence of illegal cohabitation prior to former conviction held prejudicial.

In prosecution for illegal cohabitation, the admission of evidence, over defendants' objection, that they dwelt together in like manner as husband and wife prior to a previous conviction for the same offense was error, and such error was prejudicial; the evidence being undisputed that after the former conviction defendants never slept in the same house.

4. Criminal law \S 369(1)—Evidence of like offenses before former conviction admissible only in corroboration.

In prosecution for illegal cohabitation, had the evidence tended to show that defendants committed such offense after their former conviction therefor, it would have been proper to admit evidence of like offenses occurring before their former conviction in corroboration, but for such purpose only.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Clay County;
R. E. L. Johnson, Judge.

Alford Hettle and another were convicted of illegal cohabitation, and appeal. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

J. M. Burrow, of Mammoth Spring, for appellants.

Jno. D. Arbuckle, Atty. Gen., and Silas W. Rogers, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HUMPHREYS, J. Appellants were indicted in the Clay county circuit court, Western district, for the crime of illegal cohabitation, in the following form:

"State of Arkansas v. Alford Hettle and Alpha Hall. No. 1223. Western District of Clay County, June Term, 1919.

"The grand jury in and for the district, county, and state aforesaid, in the name and by the authority of the state of Arkansas, accuse the persons named in the caption hereof as defendants of the crime of illegal cohabitation, committed as follows, to wit:

"On the 1st day of May, 1919, in the district, county and state aforesaid, the persons named in the caption hereof did unlawfully, knowingly, and willfully live and cohabit together as husband and wife, without being married to each other, he, the said Alf Hettle, being a male person, and she, said Alpha Hall, being a female person over the age of 16 years, against the peace and dignity of the state of Arkansas. T. W. Davis, Prosecuting Attorney for the Second Judicial District.

"Indictment No. 8."

The sufficiency of the indictment was attacked by demurrer upon the following grounds:

(1) That the said indictment does not state facts sufficient to constitute an offense.

(2) That said indictment does not charge any one in the body of the indictment of having committed an offense.

Over the objection and exception of appellants, the demurrer was overruled, and the cause was submitted to a jury upon the instructions of the court and evidence adduced. The jury returned the following verdicts:

"We, the jury, find the defendant Alpha Hall, guilty of first offense and fix her punishment at a fine of $20.

"We, the jury, find the defendant Alford Hettle guilty of second offense and fix his punishment at a fine of $100 and at imprisonment in the county jail for a period of six months."

Judgments were rendered in accordance with the verdicts, from which judgments, an appeal has been duly prosecuted to this court under proper proceedings.

[1] It is insisted that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the indictment, because it failed to charge a second offense. Under section 1810 of Kirby's Digest, the punishment for illegal cohabitation is graded, according to first, second, and third offenses. For the first offense, offenders may be fined in a sum not less than $20 nor more than $100; for a second offense not less than $100 and imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding twelve months; and for a third offense, or any subsequent offense, by imprisonment in the penitentiary for any time for not less than one nor more than three years. Appellants were tried for a second offense under the indictment, which did not specifically charge a second offense. The contention is made by the state's attorney that the essential elements of each offense are the same, and that therefore the allegations could be no different from a first, second, or third offense. We think the learned attorney in error in this contention. Under section 1810 of Kirby's Digest, the offense of illegal cohabitation is a graded crime, and the fact of whether it was a first, second, or third offense is an element in the punishment thereof. This court said in the case of Kightlinger v. State, 105 Ark. 172, 150 S. W. 690, that—

"Every indictment, for whatever offense, must set out all the facts which in law may influence the punishment for the commission thereof."

In support of that rule, citation was made to 1 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 1003; Bishop on Stat. Crimes, § 427; 2 Bishop's New Criminal Procedure, § 48, which last citation is as follows:

"If the punishment to be inflicted is greater or less, according to the value of the property, the value must be stated in the indictment, because every indictment, for whatever offense, must set out every fact which the law makes an element in the punishment thereof."

The rule is also supported by the following authorities: Neece v. State, 82 Tex. Cr. R. 378, 137 S. W. 919; State v. Paisley, 36 Mont. 237, 92 Pac. 566; Shiffett v. Com., 114 Va. 880, 77 S. E. 608. The indictment, under the rules stated, was insufficient to sustain a conviction for a second offense.

[2] The contention is also made by appellants that the indictment is fatally defective because no one was charged in the body of the indictment with having committed the offense. Appellants are properly named in the caption of the indictment and are charged in the indictment with having committed the offense, by reference to their names set out in the caption, and in the latter part of the indictment are specifically named as the parties against whom the indictment is preferred. We think appellants are properly and sufficiently charged in the indictment with having committed a first offense.

[3] Appellants were convicted in a magistrate's court, on the 28th day of April, 1919, of the crime of illegal cohabitation. The indictment in the instant case was returned on June 12 following, charging them with having committed the same offense on May 1, 1919. Upon the trial, under the indictment, evidence was admitted, over the objection and exception of appellants, to the effect that they dwelt together in like manner as husband and wife prior and up to April 28, 1919. The evidence tended to show that, after the former conviction, appellant Alford Hettle engaged and occupied a room at night in a neighbor's home, a mile or more from his dwelling, and came back each day to work on his farm. In fact, the undisputed evidence showed that, after the former conviction they never slept in the same house.

Over the objection and exception of appellants, the court instructed the jury as follows:

"Therefore, if you find from the evidence in this case beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants, Alf Hettle and Alpha Hall, he being a male person and she being a female person over the age of 16 years, did on the 1st day of May, 1919, or at any time within 12 months next before the 12th day of June, 1919, unlawfully and willfully live and cohabit as husband and wife, without being married to each other, and in the Western district of Clay county, Ark., then it will be your duty to convict them."

[4] This was prejudicial error, so confessed by the Attorney General; for under it the jury was authorized to convict appellants for the crime of illegal cohabitation committed prior to their former conviction. Had the evidence tended to show that appellants committed the offense of illegal cohabitation after their former conviction, it would have been proper to admit evidence of like offenses occurring before their former conviction in corroboration, but for such purpose only. Adams v. State, 78 Ark. 16, 92 S. W. 1123.

For the error in giving the aforesaid instruction and in refusing to give the converse thereof, requested by appellants, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

SOUTHERN MUT. LIFE INS. CO. v. PERRY. (No. 64.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 21, 1920.)

1. Insurance \S 646(1)—Burden on plaintiff to show right to recover.

The burden was on plaintiff to prove that she was entitled to recover under a policy of insurance.

2. Insurance \S 665(1)—Evidence held to show plaintiff paid premiums on policy of cousin.

In an action on a policy of insurance, evidence held to show that plaintiff paid the premiums on the policy in controversy, and that she was the cousin of insured.

3. Insurance \S 119—Policy on life of cousin on whom plaintiff not dependent void as wagering contract.

Plaintiff's policy on the life of her cousin, upon whom she was not dependent, while she was without reasonable grounds to expect that the cousin would support or aid her in any way, was void as a wagering contract.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County; Guy Fulk, Judge.

Action by Ida Perry against the Southern Mutual Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and cause dismissed.

C. P. Harnwell, of Little Rock, for appellant.

S. A. Jones and Carmichael & Brooks, all of Little Rock, for appellee.

WOOD, J. This action was brought by the appellee against appellant on a policy of insurance issued by the appellant to one Sally Cox. The appellee was named as beneficiary in the policy.

Appellee testified that Sally Cox carried a policy with appellant. She identified the policy and same was introduced in evidence. Appellee testified on direct examination that Sally Cox died in November, 1915; that all of the dues had been paid promptly. On cross examination she testified that she (appellee) had receipts at the time Sally Cox died for all the premiums. Appellant would send appellee the receipts; would send her a notice a few days before the premiums were due; she (appellee) would send the money back to appellant and it would receipt her on a card. Sally Cox was her cousin.

At this juncture the witness was excused, and another witness was examined touching the proof of death, after which appellee was recalled for further direct examination. Her counsel asked, among others, the following questions:

"Q. They collected from her regularly, did they? A. They did collect from her regularly.

"Q. Did you know anything about the policy having been issued at the time it was issued? A. I knew nothing about it at the time it was issued.

"Q. Did you not secure it yourself? A. Did not, was not present."

On further cross-examination appellee testified that one day the agent came to her house and told her that the policy was made to her, and that Sally Cox had no change, and asked witness to pay that particular premium, and witness paid it. She could not remember the date.

Further testimony was developed, but from the conclusion we have reached on the above testimony it is unnecessary to set forth the other testimony.

Appellant prayed the court to direct the jury to return a verdict in its favor, which prayer the court refused. The trial resulted in a judgment in favor of the appellee, from which is this appeal.

[1] The court erred in refusing appellant's prayer for a directed verdict. The undisputed testimony of the appellee shows that the appellee and Sally Cox were cousins. The burden was upon the appellee to prove that she was entitled to recover under the contract of insurance.

The only conclusion that any reasonable mind could reach from the testimony of appellee is that she paid the premiums on the policy issued by appellant to Sally Cox. If there had been no peremptory instruction, the only verdict that the jury could have returned under appellee's testimony would have been to the effect that the premiums were paid by the appellee; for that is the only possible way that the jury could have reconciled her testimony, which would have been its duty to do.

When appellee was first examined she swore positively that the appellant would send her the notice before the premiums were due, and that she would send the money back to appellant, and appellant would receipt her. The only possible way that this testimony can be reconciled with her subsequent statement that the appellant collected from Sally Cox regularly is to say that appellee furnished Sally Cox the money with which to pay the premiums. Any other view would be a stultification of the testimony of the witness, and on its face would put same beyond the pale of competent testimony. For a party who is also a witness will not be allowed to declare in one breath a certain state of facts and in the next, without explanation, declare the opposite. Under such conditions the two statements would neutralize and nullify each other, and, in legal effect, same would be tantamount to no testimony. The positions assumed by the party would be wholly inconsistent.

[2] We conclude, therefore, that the undisputed evidence shows that the appellee paid the premiums on the policy in controversy, and that she was the cousin of Sally Cox. There is no testimony tending to show that appellee was dependent upon Sally Cox, and no testimony to furnish appellee reasonable grounds to expect that Sally Cox would support or aid her in any way.

In McRae v. Warmack, 98 Ark. 56, 135 S. W. 809, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 949, we said:

"The principle upon which life insurance is based is that one who has a reasonable expectation of benefits and advantages growing out of the continuance of the life of the assured has such an interest in his life that he may insure the same. But where one is not thus interested in the life of the assured, but by insuring such life is rather interested in his early death, the contract of insurance is a mere wager, and against a sound public policy. Such contracts, it has been thought, would, if upheld, result in a mere traffic in human life, and would lend a great incentive to one thus disinterested in the life, but interested in the death of the assured to shorten that life. It is therefore well settled that the issue of a policy to one who has no insurable interest in the life of the insured, but who pays the premiums for the chance of collecting the policy, is invalid because it is a wagering contract and against a sound public policy."

[3] For the error in refusing to direct a verdict in favor of the appellant the judgment is reversed, and the cause is dismissed.

ROUNDTREE v. MEADORS et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 18, 1920.)

1. Judgment \Leftrightarrow 375—Fraud justifying vacation must be practiced prior to judgment.

The only fraud justifying vacation of a judgment after the term, under Civ. Code Prac. § 518, is that practiced by the successful party in the obtainment of the judgment, and fraud of the successful party in disposing of evidence necessary to the losing party on appeal is not such fraud.

2. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1202—Affirmance on appeal conclusive on trial court.

Affirmance of a judgment on appeal is conclusive on a subsequent petition in the trial court to vacate the judgment and for a new trial, where the facts contained in the petition are the same as those stated in a petition on appeal for a rehearing which was denied.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Whitley County.

Action by Mary Roundtree against H. C. Meadors and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 183 Ky. 47, 209 S. W. 505.

Stephens & Steely, of Williamsburg, for appellant.

Rose & Pope, of Williamsburg, for appellees.

QUIN, J. This appeal involves the sufficiency of a petition for a new trial filed in the court below by the appellant, and in which it was alleged that in November, 1914, plaintiff and her husband instituted an action against the defendants seeking a rescission of a contract executed in July, 1914, and upon a trial of said action judgment was entered in favor of defendants; from said judgment an appeal was taken to this court to perfect which a schedule was filed with the circuit clerk directing that he copy the entire record for transmission to the appellate court. The clerk copied the entire record, with the exception of four depositions taken in rebuttal by defendant, and which depositions were before the court at the time it directed that a judgment be prepared. For the purpose of drafting the judgment the papers were taken to the office of defendants' counsel, since which time it has been impossible to locate the depositions referred to. Defendants, as appellees on the former appeal, made a motion to dismiss said appeal because the record was incomplete. Appellant thereupon filed a motion to continue the case until such time as the depositions could be supplied, filing affidavits in support of the motion, and asked for an original process from this court directing that the depositions be supplied for reasons set forth in the petition, but which we deem unnecessary to state. At the same time a notice was served of a motion to be made in the circuit court to reinstate the case upon the docket for the purpose of supplying said depositions. The circuit judge had been one of the attorneys for defendants, and, being thus disqualified from passing upon that motion, a request was made of the Governor for the appointment of a special judge to hear same and try other cases in which the presiding judge had been interested. Three terms of the court were held before a special judge was appointed. In the meantime this court affirmed the judgment in favor of defendants. Roundtree v. Meadors, 183 Ky. 47, 209 S. W. 505. It was further alleged that a petition for rehearing was filed, setting up the facts as stated in the petition for a new trial, but this was overruled; that defendant Meadors was present at the trial and had access to the papers, including the depositions aforesaid, and, whether the depositions were misplaced by fraud or design, defendants and their counsel were responsible for same being missing from the record, and the conduct of the defendants and their counsel was such as entitled plaintiff to an order setting aside the judgment and granting her a new trial. A demurrer was sustained to this petition; hence the present appeal.

[1, 2] We have been unable to find in the record on the former appeal wherein plaintiff made a motion to continue the case until such time as the depositions could be supplied, as alleged in the petition for a new trial. Plaintiff did make a motion "for all orders and processes necessary to supply certain rebuttal depositions which were lost or mislaid from the record"; but this was overruled, first because it asked no specific action by the court and was in reality not a motion, and, second, because the record could be supplied only in the circuit court. The omission from the record of a portion of the evidence necessitated an affirmance of the former appeal. Had plaintiff made the motion she evidently thought had been made, doubtless a different result would have followed. Additional time within which to supply the record would probably have been given had it been requested, but the court acted upon the only motion made. While not stated in either the petition or the brief that this action was filed pursuant to the provision of section 518 of the Civil Code, it is manifest that if the relief sought is grantable at all authority therefor must be found in section 518 and kindred sections. We are convinced plaintiff has not stated a case recognizable under the provisions of said sections. There is no allegation of fraud, except inferentially; however, the only fraud justifying a modification or vacation of a judgment after the term is that practiced by the successful party in the obtainment of the judgment. Here the acts complained of took place at a time subsequent to the rendition of the judgment, and therefore had the charge of fraud been direct the provision of the sections supra would not apply. The appeal does not involve the rights of any person under disability; no unavoidable casualty or misfortune is alleged. Appellant does not claim to come under the provision of said sections. The brief is but a reargument of the grounds set forth in the petition for rehearing on the former appeal. The petition alleges the facts therein contained are the same as stated in the petition for rehearing. Not only is the opinion on the former appeal conclusive of the relief sought, but appellant has shown no ground entitling her to a new trial.

The lower court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the petition. The judgment is affirmed.

RAU et al. v. ROWE.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 15, 1920.)

Executors and administrators §514—Widow who mistakenly failed to claim exemption and expenditure entitled to allowance in later account.

A widow without children, who, through mistake and inadvertence of herself and attorney in presenting pleadings, did not assert, in her first settlement of her husband's estate, claim under Kentucky Sts. § 1403, for $750 exemption as widow and $282 expended for a monument, is entitled, nevertheless, to present a claim and have it allowed out of moneys which she has collected as rents.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fayette County.

Petition for settlement of the estate of her deceased husband by Nellie B. Rowe against Sophie Rau and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

G. C. Webb, of Lexington, for appellants.

R. L. Northcutt and R. J. Colbert, both of Lexington, for appellee.

SAMPSON, J. This litigation originated in March, 1914, when Mrs. Rowe filed her petition for a settlement of the estate of her deceased husband, making the appellants, Sophie Rau, etc., parties defendant. After judgment the case came to this court on appeal. See opinion in 168 Ky. 704, 182 S. W. 846. The judgment was reversed, with directions to enter a judgment giving Sophie Rau, etc., additional credits. This was done when the case went back to the lower court. A second opinion was decided on another branch of the case. Rau et al. v. Rowe, 184 Ky. 841, 213 S. W. 226.

After the death of Rowe and during this litigation his wife, the appellee, collected $1,237.50 in rents from real estate which belonged to his estate. As widow, there being no children, she was entitled to an exemption, under section 1403, Kentucky Statutes, of $750. This she did not claim in her first settlement. She expended $282 for a monument which she caused to be erected over the grave of her husband, but she had not made claim for this sum.

It is insisted that Mrs. Rowe is not entitled to assert her claim for $750 exemption as widow and $282 expended for a monument, because she did not include these items in her first settlement, nor until all moneys except the rents of the estate had been disbursed. In response to this she pleads that through mistake and inadvertence of herself and attorney in preparing the pleadings these two items were omitted. This being so, she is, as a matter of common justice and right, entitled to now present the claim and have it allowed and paid out of the $1,237.50 which she collected as rents. This the circuit court did, and we find no error in the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

PITTSBURGH, C. & ST. L. RY. CO. v. CARMODY.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 18, 1920.)

1. Master and servant §100(2) — Contract that railway employee's acceptance of benefits of relief department should bar action against railroad valid.

While Const. § 126, declaring that no common carrier shall be permitted to contract for relief from its common-law liability, will preclude a railroad company from contracting against liability to employees for future negligence, it does not preclude a railroad company from making settlement with an employee for injuries already sustained; consequently, an agreement between an employee and a voluntary relief department, providing for relief for injuries, etc., that acceptance of benefits will bar an action against the railroad company, is valid where the employee, after the accident, had an option to accept the benefits or reject the same and assert company's liability.

2. Master and servant §100(2)—Contract giving injured employee option to accept benefit in lieu of asserting employer's liability is not against public policy.

An agreement between a railway employee and a relief department that acceptance of benefits would preclude recovery for injuries resulting from the company's negligence is not contrary to public policy, for, as the employee was given an option to refuse the benefits, the contract amounted to no more than settlement.

3. Contracts §110—Freedom of contract will not be restricted because contract is not advantageous.

If the subject of the contract is lawful and the parties are sui juris, the right to contract cannot be restricted because the contract is to the disadvantage of one of the parties making it.

4. Contracts ¶10(1)—Contract between employé and railway relief department for release on acceptance of benefits not bad for want of mutuality.

Where the contract between a voluntary relief department of a railway company and employés who made small monthly payments, which, after providing for varying benefits regardless of the company's liability, stipulated that the acceptance of benefits should release the company from liability for its negligence, it is not bad for want of mutuality where the company administered the funds and agreed to make good deficiencies.

5. Release ¶39—Election to accept benefits held to bar servant's action against master, though all benefits had not been received.

Where an agreement between railway employés and a relief department provided that the acceptance of benefits for injuries should release railway company from liability, etc., and an injured employé, having an election, accepted the benefits, such election is a defense to an action against the railway company, though benefits were still to be paid; this being particularly true where the employé asserted the benefits were to accrue during the remainder of his life.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County.

Action by Thomas Carmody against the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Trabue, Doolan & Crawford and Chas. W. Milner, all of Louisville, for appellant.

Elmer C. Underwood, J. L. Richardson, and S. L. Trusty, all of Louisville, for appellee.

HURT, J. The appellee, Thomas Carmody, was an employé of the appellant, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway Company, for the performance of the duties of a switchman in the yards of the appellant company in Louisville, and upon its moving trains from its yards in Louisville to other yards and tracts of appellant near Jeffersonville, Ind. The appellant was a common carrier. Carmody instituted this action against the railway company and one of its employés, alleging that on November 24, 1905, as the result of the negligence of the defendants, he was severely and permanently injured, and sought a recovery of damages as compensation for his injuries. The appellant company by the first paragraph of its answer denied the alleged negligence, and by a second paragraph of its answer, an amended answer, and answer to an amendment petition, pleaded as a bar to the prosecution of the action, in substance, that during a long time it in conjunction with its employés had been maintaining, in connection with its organization and conduct of its business as a common carrier, a department which was known as the Voluntary Relief Department of the Pennsylvania Lines West of Pittsburgh; that the department was an organization for the purpose of providing indemnity for the employés of appellant in the event of injury, sickness, or death, and that the indemnity was due and payable to the employés when injured, whether the injury was the result of the negligence of the railway company or of the employé himself, or whether there was negligence on the part of any one; that the department was maintained by contributions of the employés who were members thereof at fixed rates and stated intervals, and by contributions of the appellant, it having agreed upon its part, and as a part of the contract of the organization of the department, that it would pay the expenses and costs of the operation and maintaining of the department and pay any deficit that might result from the sums paid in by the employé members being insufficient to pay the indemnities or benefits to which sick or injured employés were entitled, or pay death benefits under and in accordance with the rules and regulations of the department; that at the time and before the injuries suffered by the appellee he had, upon his application, become a member of the Voluntary Relief Department, and was a member thereof in good standing at the time of his injuries, and was entitled to the benefits of the organization in accordance with its rules and regulations, and entitled to receive the benefits allowed by the department from its relief fund for injury, sickness, or death; that in becoming a member of the department the appellee had agreed to and with the department and appellant that if he should accept benefits from the relief funds of the department for injuries suffered by him or death such acceptance would work a release of any claim for damages against the appellant arising from the injury or death; that when he received the injury complained of by him the appellee was at liberty either to accept the benefits provided by the Voluntary Relief Department or to assert a claim for compensation against the appellant by way of action for damages; that after he sustained the injury the appellee voluntarily elected to accept the benefits provided by the department from its relief funds, and that such benefits were paid to him thereafter until April 30, 1906, when he had received in benefits the sum of $225, and at that time, under the terms and conditions of his membership, his right to receive further benefits ceased; that by his election to receive the benefits provided under the rules and regulations of the relief department and his acceptance of them he had thereby released any claim for damages which he had against appellant growing out of his injury; and that he had thereafter instituted this action without having returned or offered to return the funds which he had received from the relief department, and which he would not have received but for his election to accept same and to waive any claim which he had against appellant. A copy of the appellee's application for membership in the department and a copy of the regulations of the Voluntary Relief Department were filed with the answer as a part thereof. The answer and amended answer contained the averment that the application of appellee to become a member of the Voluntary Relief Department which appellee had subscribed and agreed to contained the following stipulation:

"I agree that the acceptance of benefits from said relief fund for injury or death shall operate as a release from all claims for damages against said company (the appellant), arising from such injury or death, which could be made by or through me, and that I or my legal representatives will execute such further instrument as may be necessary formally to evidence such acquittance."

The regulations of the Voluntary Relief Department were alleged to contain the above-quoted stipulation and in addition thereto the following:

"Should a member or his legal representative bring suit against either of the companies now associated in administration of the relief department, or that may hereafter be so associated, for damages on account of injury or death of such member, payment of benefits from the relief fund on account of the same shall not be made until such suit is discontinued. If prosecuted to judgment or compromised, any payment of judgment or amount in compromise shall preclude any claim upon the relief fund for such injury or death."

To the above plea in bar of the action a demurrer was sustained, it being the opinion of the learned trial judge that the facts stated did not constitute an estoppel to or other valid defense to the action. A trial of the action resulted in a verdict and judgment for the appellee, and the railway company appeals, and relies solely for a reversal of the judgment upon its contention that the court was in error in sustaining the demurrer to the recited plea in bar and denying it a defense founded upon the facts therein alleged.

The appellee earnestly insists that the plea is insufficient in law for three principal reasons: First. The contract alleged by appellant to have existed between it and the appellee and the Voluntary Relief Department was prohibited by section 196 of the Constitution, and was void as against the public policy of the state. Second. The contract was not mutual, nor supported by any consideration coming from the appellant, and therefore was not binding. Third. The regulations of the Voluntary Relief Department, together with the admissions of the answers as amended, show that the appellee was entitled to receive benefits from the relief fund of the department during his entire life, and that it ceased to pay the benefits after having paid $225 on April 30, 1906, after which the action was instituted.

[1-3] (a) Section 196 of the Constitution renders void any contract which is prohibited by its provisions. The portion of section 196 which is relied upon as prohibitive of the contract alleged is as follows: "No common carrier shall be permitted to contract for relief from its common-law liability." The common-law liability of a railroad company to one of its employes for an injury sustained by the employe and resulting from the negligence of the railroad company was to compensate the employe for the damages sustained by him by reason of the injury. It may be conceded that a contract entered into between a railroad company and one of its employes, by the terms of which it is contracted that the company shall not be liable for damages because of an injury which may be thereafter suffered by the employe on account of the negligence of the company, is void as against public policy, as well as contravening the provisions of the Constitution, supra; but to deny to a railroad company and one of its employes the power to agree upon a binding settlement of the amount of the damages to which the employe is entitled for an injury suffered by him on account of the negligent act of the company, and to deny to the company the right to pay the employe the damages which the latter is willing to receive in settlement of his claim, and to the employe the power and right to contract for such settlement and to receive payment, would compel all such adjustment to be made at the end of litigation and by the judgment of a court, which is contrary to the public policy of this and every other state. It is evident that it is the liability for a future injury which the railroad company is prohibited from contracting against, and not a liability for an injury from negligence which has already occurred. Several states have constitutional provisions and statutes with provisions similar to section 196, supra, and in no one of them has the provision been so construed as to prevent an accord and satisfaction between the carrier and one of its employes for the claim of the employe for an injury which has already been suffered. In the contract which appellant relied upon, as embraced in its answers and in the regulations of the Voluntary Relief Department, which were presented as a part of the answer, there was no attempt by the appellant to contract for relief against its common-law liability, or any liability to which it was subject, or to limit such liability. The contract provided a means of indemnity for the employé when disabled from sickness or injury, and so whether the injury arose from his own negligence or that of another, or from unavoidable accident, without fault of any one; but when the injury suffered was attributable to the negligence of appellant it did not affect any cause of action which the employé had against appellant for damages on account of the injury, until by his own voluntary action the employé elected to receive the benefits provided by the Voluntary Relief Department as compensation for the injury, and when he did so in consideration of the benefits to be received he contracted to release his claim against appellant. The contract in no way limited the liability of appellant, nor was it released from liability to an action for damages for an injury to the employé from negligence; but it was the acceptance of the benefits of the relief department as a satisfaction of the claim for damages against appellant which worked the release, and this had to occur, according to the contract, after the injury had been sustained. It is a contract to settle the past and not one providing for the future. A contract to be against public policy must be such a one as has a mischievous tendency and in some way militates against the public welfare and the rights of the public. It cannot be successfully asserted that the contract under consideration has any such effect. A contract which has the effect of enabling an employé to receive indemnity for injuries from sickness and accident, and does not take any right of action for negligent injury away from him, except by his own election and after the injury has occurred, when he is free to sue for his injury or to settle the claim by contract, does not appear to carry with it any tendency to mischief nor contravene any public right in any discernible way. The right to contract is a right vouchsafed to every citizen by the law of the land, if the subject of the contract is a lawful one and the person making same is sui juris, and the exercise of the right does no injury to the public. Because a man makes a contract which is bad, and not the best one which he might make under the circumstances, is no reason for taking away from him the right to contract about his own affairs, nor is such a reason sufficient to set aside a contract understandingly made with all the facts before him. Contracts similar to the one relied upon by appellant have been under consideration by the courts in various jurisdictions, in some of which were constitutional and statutory provisions similar to that embraced in section 196 of our Constitution, and where it was violative of the public policy to permit a common carrier to contract for relief against its common-law liability; and, while all of the courts have not agreed, the great weight of authority is to the effect that such a contract does not contravene a sound public policy.

The trend of authority may be ascertained from the following decisions: Johnson v. Railway Co., 58 S. C. 488, 36 S. E. 851; Petty v. Brunswick & Western Ry. Co., 109 Ga. 666, 35 S. [4] (b) The contract is not unenforceable for want of mutuality and consideration. While the appellee and other employes of the various railroads which jointly administered the affairs of the Voluntary Relief Department each contributed to the funds of the department a small sum from his wages each month, yet they received the entire benefits of the fund. The amount of the benefits when paid to an employé was not controlled by the sum paid in by him nor the state of the treasury of the department. The appellant, together with the other railroads who were interested in administering the department, paid all the expenses of the administration of the department, supplied at its expense the necessary facilities for conducting its business, held the funds of the department and was responsible for their safe-keeping, and agreed to pay into its treasury the sums necessary to cover any deficits which might arise therein from the contributions of the employes at any time not being sufficient to meet the demands of the treasury, in paying the benefits to which the members were entitled on account of disablement from sickness, accident, or injury of any kind, under the regulations of the department. The agreement made by the company and the employes was concurrent and obligatory upon both, and each agreed to pay in consideration of the promises and payments by the others. Discussing a contract not exactly like the one under consideration here, but containing the same essential features, it was said in Petty v. Brunswick & Western Ry. Co., supra:

"That such a contract secured to an employe substantial benefits, and that the master contributed to the fund for the payment thereof, constituted a valuable consideration as to the employe; and this is true though he himself made a small monthly contribution to that fund. A contract of this kind is not wanting in mutuality."

In Railway Co. v. Cox, 55 Ohio St. 516, 45 N. E. 645, 35 L. R. A. 507, touching a similar contract, the court said:

"The promises are concurrent and obligatory upon both; both promise and both pay in consideration of promises and payments by the other; and the fact that third persons are interested does not impair the force of the obligation. If these stipulations do not supply consideration it would be difficult to frame such as would; and there being express assent to the terms of the contract by both parties, the element of mutuality is not wanting."

The same views as the above are expressed in Judy v. Louderman, 48 Ohio St. 562, 29 N. E. 181; Lease v. Penna. Co., 10 Ind. App. 47, 37 N. E. 423, and Otis v. Penna. Co., supra.

[5] (c) It is insisted for appellee that the pleadings admit that his injury was such that by reason of the rules and regulations of the relief department he was entitled to receive benefits for a greater length of time than same were paid to him, and that at the time of the institution of this action he was still entitled to receive benefits, although the relief department had then ceased to pay them to him. It is urged that the plea in bar is insufficient, in that it does not aver that the appellee had received all the benefits which under the contract he was entitled to receive; the allegation upon that subject being a conclusion and not an averment of facts which show a complete satisfaction, treating the acceptance of the relief department contract as an accord of the claim of appellee for damages for his injuries. This contention would be correct if the contract which constitutes the accord provided that the accord should be satisfied in full before it should be a binding settlement and obligatory upon the appellee. There can be no dispute of the common-law principle that where an accord is based upon a contract or agreement which provides for the performance of certain acts in satisfaction of the cause of action to be released the satisfaction and release is not effected until a full performance has occurred. Where, however, the accord consists of a promise or of the making of a contract to be performed in the future, and this promise or contract is accepted in satisfaction of the cause of action, the cause of action is released, and the party releasing the cause of action which he had and accepting the promise in satisfaction of it must thereafter look to the promise, and not his original cause of action. 1 R. C. L. 199, 200; B. & W. Ry. Co. v. Clem, 80 Ga. 539, 7 S. E. 84. It is evident in the instant case, and the averments of the answer and its amendments substantially alleged, that the appellee after receiving his injury accepted the benefits provided by the relief department and thereby elected to release the appellant from his cause of action, and as an accord and satisfaction of the claim which he had against appellant agreed to accept and to receive the benefits provided for him by the regulations and provisions of the relief department. It would appear that this is conclusively true if appellee's contention as to the construction of the relief department contract is correct, and that under same he was entitled to receive the benefits during his lifetime, since, if there was no release of his cause of action against appellant until the relief department had paid to him all the benefits to which he was entitled under it, there would be no settlement and release of the cause of action during the lifetime of the appellee. Such was evidently not the intention of the parties in making the relief department contract. As said in Pennsylvania Co. v. Chapman, 220 Ill. 428, 77 N. E. 248, although in that case the conclusion was different from the one here arrived at:

"The agreement on the part of the plaintiff that the acceptance of benefits from the relief fund should operate as a release of all claim for damages against the company is to be construed in connection with the by-laws, which amount to an agreement on the part of the relief department that it would pay him certain specified benefits."

The contract under which the relief department was created and conducted provided for certain benefits to which its members were entitled in case of disablement from sickness or accident and for injury from the negligence of the employer, if the injured employe agreed to accept them in lieu of his claim for damages against the employer, and it was agreed that if the employe elected to receive such benefits his action in so doing operated to release his claim against appellant for damages. He was to receive compensation for his injuries one time but not twice. The beginning to accept of the benefits of the relief department by the injured employé was agreed upon between employer and employé as the act determinative of the fact that the agreement between them that the employé had accepted the benefits of the provisions of the relief department contract as an accord and satisfaction of his claim for damages had been entered into. Among the courts there has not been entire agreement as to the effect of the acceptance of benefits under a contract similar to the relief department contract here; certain of them holding that, to cause such acceptance to work a release of the employé's claim for damages against the employer, in addition to the acceptance of benefits it must also be shown that the relief department had performed its entire contract; while the holding of the others has been to the effect that the acceptance of benefits worked an acceptance of the relief department contract as an accord and satisfaction of the employé's right of action against the employer and a release of same, and thereafter each of the parties must look to the contract which had been entered into as an accord and satisfaction, and the employé must depend upon its enforcement for his compensation. The latter seems to be the more logical conclusion from the necessary results of the transaction. Discussing this phase of the results of such a contract, in Johnson v. Railway Co., 58 S. C. 488, 36 S. E. 851, the court said:

"If the contract set up in the answer is a valid contract, and plaintiff has elected to accept and has accepted benefits thereunder, he could not escape the contract of release because a full tender of all payments due under the contract had not been made to him. By the contract and election to accept certain benefits and payments, he released the defendant from liability. The consideration for the release was the obligation or promise of the association to do certain things and the release was not conditioned on full performance by the association. For full performance of the contract by the association, the plaintiff, * * * has his remedy under the contract."

In Petty v. Brunswick & Western Ry. Co., 109 Ga. 666, 35 S. E. 82, the court, considering a contract similar to the one here relied upon, said:

"The acceptance by an injured employé of any benefit under a contract of the kind * * * is an election on his part to look exclusively to that source for compensation on account of the injury, and amounts to a complete accord and satisfaction of his claim for damages against his master therefrom arising."

Hence it would appear that the appellee, by the acceptance of benefits under the relief department contract because of his injury, accepted that contract with its promised obligations as an accord and satisfaction of his claim for damages against appellant and released the claim against appellant, and upon the failure of the relief department to perform its contract the appellee was relegated to his remedies upon and under that contract. Penna. Co. v. Reager's Adm'r, 152 Ky. 824, 154 S. W. 412, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 841, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 812. It was therefore not necessary for the appellant to aver a complete performance of the contract by the relief department, but it was sufficient to allege as a defense that the appellee had agreed to accept the benefits provided by the contract of the relief department as compensation for his injury as an accord and satisfaction of it, and that his claim against appellant was released in consideration of that contract. This the answer substantially alleged.

The trial court was therefore in error in sustaining a demurrer to the plea in bar, and the judgment is therefore reversed, and cause remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

SIMONS v. SCOTT et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky, June 18, 1920.)

States ~~6~~53—State tax commission can remove revenue agents at will.

Under Laws 1918, c. 55, providing merely that the tax commission, a continuing body, shall appoint, direct, control, and supervise revenue agents, and saying nothing as to term, it may remove them without cause or hearing.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Franklin County.

Suit by A. H. Simons against J. A. Scott and others for injunction. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gifford & Steinfield and L. S. Leopold, all of Louisville, for appellant.

Chas. I. Dawson, Atty. Gen., for appellees.

CARROLL, C. J. On January 3, 1920, the appellant, A. H. Simons, was appointed revenue agent for the state at large by the state tax commission, and on March 13, 1920, was summarily removed as such revenue agent by the state tax commission without notice or any cause being assigned for the removal. Soon after this Simons brought this suit in the Franklin circuit court, seeking to compel by injunction the state tax commission to rescind its order of removal and reinstate him as revenue agent, upon the grounds that his appointment run for a term of four years, or, if this was not so, he could only be removed (if at all) for a sufficient cause after notice and opportunity to be heard. The circuit court sustained a general demurrer to the petition, and, Simons declining to plead further, his petition was dismissed, and he appeals.

The state tax commission contends that it had the power, in the exercise of the discretion vested in it, to remove Simons at any time without notice or cause or opportunity to be heard, and if it did have the power claimed the judgment must be affirmed.

In 1880 the Legislature enacted a statute (Laws 1880, c. 1312) giving authority to the auditor of state to appoint revenue agents "subject to removal at pleasure by the auditor." In 1902 (Laws 1902, c. 128, art. 15) the act of 1880 was so amended as to provide that the term of revenue agents for the state at large should be four years. In 1906 (Laws 1906, c. 22, art. 17) the statute relating to revenue agents was again amended so as to read that the auditor may appoint "not exceeding four revenue agents from the state at large, whose term of office shall be the same as that of the auditor and expire at the same time, unless they or any of them are removed by him."

In 1918 (Laws 1918, c. 55) the Legislature took from the auditor the appointment and control of revenue agents and placed "the appointment, supervision, control, and direction of revenue agents" in the state tax commission. This 1918 act, however, did not attempt to change in any manner the provisions of the old law regulating the powers and duties of revenue agents; it merely transferred their appointment and control from the auditor of state to the state tax commission, to which body the Legislature had confided the power to supervise the assessment of all property in the state.

In the consideration of this case, it is not pertinent to inquire into the powers and duties of revenue agents, as the sole question presented by the record is the power of the state tax commission to summarily remove Simons without cause or opportunity to be heard, and the solution of this question must be determined from a consideration of the terms of the act of 1918, because the appointment and control of revenue agents, without limitation or restriction, was placed by it in the hands of the state tax commission.

Under the act of 1906, it may be said that revenue agents did have a term coincident with that of the auditor, whose term was and is four years. But the state tax commission, which is composed of three members, cannot be said to have any definite term of office, such as the auditor; it is a continuing body, or, at any rate, a body the personnel of which does not necessarily change every four years, and therefore the provision of the act of 1906, relating to the term of these agents, can have little to do with the question before us. The act of 1918 does not fix any term; does not say when the term shall begin or end, or anything about removal. It merely provides that the tax commission shall appoint, direct, control, and supervise revenue agents, thereby plainly indicating a purpose to leave to the commission the power not only to appoint but to dismiss.

If the statute had provided that revenue agents could only be removed for cause and after notice and opportunity to be heard, or if they had been appointed for a term, the state tax commission could not, without cause and opportunity to be heard, make the removal. As said in Commissioners of Sinking Fund v. Byars, 167 Ky. 306, 180 S. W. 380:

"Whatever may be the rule with respect to municipal officers, it is the law of this state, and the generally accepted doctrine, that in the case of a state or other officer whose term is fixed by statute, the right of removal, even for cause, is not an incident of the power of appointment in the absence of a statute conferring such rights."

But, on the other hand, the court said in Johnson v. Glun, 103 Ky. 654, 49 S. W. 470, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1475:

"Where the power of appointment is conferred in general terms and without restriction, the power of removal in the discretion and at the will of the appointing power, is implied, and always exists unless restrained, and limited by some provision of law."

In Parsons v. Breed, 126 Ky. 759, 104 S. W. 766, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 1136, the court had under consideration a statute providing that the board of public works "may appoint and, at pleasure, remove a chief of each department under its control." Under this statute, a board of public works removed, without notice, cause, or trial, Parsons, who was the chief of a department under its control, and appointed Breed in his place, and the court said:

"His [Parsons] term of office was not fixed, but, as expressed in the statute, was at the pleasure of the appointing board. He was liable to removal at any time, without notice, and without cause, other than the pleasure of the board. * * * 'Where the tenure of the office is not fixed by law, and no other provision is made for removal, either by Constitution or by statute, it is said to be a sound and necessary rule to consider the power of removal as incident to the power of appointment.'"

In 22 R. C. L. p. 562, the rule is laid down supported by many authorities that—

"Where the term or tenure of a public officer is not fixed by law, the power of summary removal is incident to the appointment."

Under these authorities, it seems clear that the tax commission had the power to discharge Simons in the manner that it did. He held his place merely at the pleasure of the Commission.

The judgment is affirmed.

STAMPER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 18, 1920.)

1. Criminal law § 404(5)—Checks and identification card held admissible without notice in prosecution for forgery of check.

In prosecution for forgery of a check involving issue of defendant's identity as person who deposited forged check in bank and drew check thereon, the check, identification card signed by defendant, and other check by which he withdrew a portion of the amount so deposited, were admissible without notice to defendant under Civ. Code Prac. § 604, requiring that notice with opportunity for examination be given adverse party of writing to be introduced in evidence, such statute having application only to writings that are executed at a different time and place from the particular writing investigated, and that are introduced only for purposes of comparison with the writing in dispute.

2. Criminal law § 404(5)—Writings of defendant written previous to transaction involved in forgery prosecution incompetent to prove similarity of writing without notice to defendant.

In a prosecution for forgery of check involving issue of defendant's identity as the person who deposited the forged check in bank and subsequently drew on such deposits, a letter and a check executed by defendant some time previous to the bank transaction were not competent to prove forged check to be in defendant's handwriting without notice to defendant with opportunity to examine, under Civ. Code Prac. § 604.

3. Criminal law § 1169(5)—Admission of incompetent evidence held reversible error notwithstanding court's subsequent admonishment not to consider it.

In forgery prosecution, where evidence as to whether forged check was in defendant's handwriting was in sharp conflict, the admission of writings by defendant without notice to defendant with opportunity to examine writings as required by Civ. Code Prac. § 604, was reversible error, though court subsequently admonished jury not to consider such evidence.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harlan County.

A. M. Stamper was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Reversed, with directions for a new trial.

Hall & Jones and J. E. Sampson, all of Harlan, for appellant.

Chas. I. Dawson, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

CARROLL, C. J. The appellant, A. M. Stamper, under an indictment charging him with the forgery of a check for $900, was found guilty and his punishment fixed at imprisonment in the state penitentiary for a term of two years. On this appeal his counsel insist that the judgment should be reversed: First, because the evidence was not sufficient to sustain a conviction; and, second, for prejudicial error committed by the trial court in the admission of evidence.

On August 12, 1919, a man who assumed to be Walter Cole presented to the Harlan State Bank a check for $900, drawn on that date on the First National Bank of Whitesburg, and payable to the Harlan State Bank. The check was signed with the name of Walter Cole. When the check was presented to the Harlan State Bank, it was placed to the deposit of Walter Cole, who it appears had not before kept a deposit at the bank, and was unknown to the bank officers. At the same time the person assuming to be Walter Cole, at the request of the cashier, signed his name to a card and left it with the bank so that his signature might be available to the bank for comparison with the checks that might be drawn by him on his deposit.

In the usual course of business and within a few days, the check was sent to the Whitesburg bank on which it was drawn and paid. On August 28, 1919, the person who made the deposit in the Harlan bank on August 12th, and yet assuming to be Walter Cole, presented in person a check for $700, at the Harlan bank, payable to himself, and, having on deposit at the time $900, the bank paid him the $700 in money.

A few days after this the Whitesburg Bank, with which the real Walter Cole did business, sent him a statement of his account with the bank, including the checks he had drawn, among them being the check for $900. When Walter Cole received and examined his checks, he at once discovered that the $900 check was a forgery, and so advised the Whitesburg bank. In this connection, it may be said that it is admitted by the Whitesburg bank that this $900 check had not been drawn by Walter Cole and was a forgery. Soon after this the appellant, A. M. Stamper, was charged with the commission of the forgery and indicted, with the result stated.

On the trial of the case there was evidence tending to show that A. M. Stamper was the man who deposited with the Harlan bank the $900 check and who later withdrew from the bank the $700 in money. On the other hand, the weight of the evidence conduces to show that Stamper was in Whitesburg, some 50 miles distant from Harlan, on the morning and during the day of August 28th, when the $700 was withdrawn from the bank, and that he remained in Whitesburg until late in the afternoon of August 30th; and, if this evidence is to be believed, it is, of course, manifest that the cashier of the Harlan bank was mistaken in his evidence that Stamper, who he identified as the man that made the deposit on August 12th, was in his bank on August 28th, and withdrew the $700.

It is strongly contended by counsel for Stamper, and there is great force in the contention, that if Stamper was not the man who withdrew the $700 on August 28th, neither was he the man who deposited the $900 check on August 12th, because the cashier of the Harlan bank testified that the same man made the deposit on August 12th, and checked out the $700 on August 28th.

As to whether Stamper was in the Harlan bank on August 12th is also a disputed issue. Stamper admits that he was in Harlan that day, but denies that he was in the bank or that he deposited or had anything to do with the drawing or depositing of the $900 check; while the cashier of the bank says that he was in the bank on that day and did deposit the check.

The defense of Stamper was an alibi, and while so much of his defense as relates to the transaction on August 12th is supported only by his own evidence, so much of it as relates to the transaction on August 28th is strongly supported by a number of witnesses who testified positively that he was in Whitesburg between 9 and 10 o'clock of the morning of the 28th, and remained there until late in the afternoon of August 30th.

With the evidence in the condition stated, and in view of the fact that the judgment must be reversed, for other reasons we refrain from expressing an opinion as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a conviction, preferring to leave this matter to another jury.

[1] On the trial of the case the commonwealth introduced the two checks for $900 and $700 each, the identification card signed by the man assuming to be Walter Cole when the $900 deposit was made, a letter written and signed by the appellant, Stamper, and a check for $20, the body of which was written by Stamper, but the signature by Walter Cole. The checks for $900 and $700 were, of course, competent, and no objection was made to their introduction as evidence upon the ground that notice had not been given to Stamper or his attorney that these writings would be introduced, as provided in section 604 of the Code. The identification card was admissible without notice, because it was a part of the transaction connected with the deposit of the $900 check. It and the check were signed by the same person, and, independent of the Code provisions, it was competent for the purpose of showing that the same person signed the check and the identification card, and it was permissible to show by persons who had examined these writings that the same persons signed the name "Walter Cole" to each of them.

The Code provision only applies to writings that are executed at a different time and place from the particular writing under investigation, and that are introduced only for purposes of comparison with the writing in dispute. Major v. Garrett, 157 Ky. 468, 163 S. W. 463.

[2] The letter and the $20 check, both of which were executed some time before the bank transaction took place, came under the Code provisions and were not admissible unless the provisions of the Code in regard to notice and opportunity for inspection were first complied with.

It appears that, when the letter and the check were introduced, they were compared by witnesses with the $900 and $700 checks, and these witnesses testified that the same person wrote the letter, the body of the $20 check, and the signature to the $900 and $700 check. It also appears that, when these writings were introduced and after the witnesses who had examined them testified as to the similarity of the handwriting, they were handed to the jury for their inspection and were examined by the jurors.

At the conclusion of the evidence, the court orally instructed the jury that they should not consider the letter or $20 check, or the evidence of the witnesses who compared these papers with the other two checks and testified as to the similarity of the writing in determining the guilt or innocence of the accused. But it is insisted that the admonition of the court to the jury came too late, as the minds of the jurors had been particularly directed to the letter and the $20 check, not only by the evidence of the witnesses, but their own examination, and therefore the prejudicial effect of this evidence, which was incompetent because no notice had been given of its introduction, could not be removed by the admonition of the court.

As the $20 check and the letter were introduced for purposes of comparison with the $900 and $700 checks, it was necessary, under section 604 of the Code, that the commonwealth should have given reasonable notice to Stamper, or his attorney, of its intention to introduce these writings, together with reasonable opportunity to examine them before the commencement of the trial. But, in view of the fact that the court in every way that it could took from the jury the consideration of this incompetent evidence, its admission would not perhaps, under ordinary circumstances, be so prejudicial as to authorize a reversal of the case especially.

[3] The evidence, however, of the guilt of Stamper is so conflicting and unsatisfactory that we have concluded that under the circumstances of this particular case the court could not, by its admonition, correct or remove from the minds of the jury the prejudicial effect that must have been produced by the admission of this incompetent evidence. On another trial the court should not permit Walter Cole to testify as an expert unless he shows himself to be better qualified than he did on the last trial.

For the error mentioned, the judgment must be reversed, with directions for a new trial in conformity with this opinion.

DIAMOND BLOCK COAL CO. v. UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 18, 1920.)

1. Injunction §136(1) — Injunction against erecting houses to prepare for discharged employees held improper.

Where the allegations that defendants were interfering with their employees by threats and declarations were not sustained by proof, and the only acts of defendant shown were peaceful solicitation of employees to join the union and construction of buildings to house employees discharged or evicted from the mine houses because they had joined the union, there was no ground for a temporary injunction.

2. Trade unions §8 — Can peacefully solicit members among employees of those opposed to unions.

Workmen have a right to organize trade unions and solicit without fraud or intimidation, others to join such union, even though the latter are employed by those who are opposed to unions, and discharge all employed by them who join the union.

3. Injunction §101(1)—Injunction will not issue without proof of irreparable injury or threat to continue trespass.

Injunction against a trade union will not issue without proof of threatened irreparable injury, or for a single act of trespass without threat to continue trespass.

4. Injunction §192—Injunction will not issue against unions for threats by members.

Even if members of a trade union have threatened and intimidated employees of plaintiff, injunction cannot be issued against the union, but only against the guilty members if they are parties to the action.

5. Associations §20(2)—Trade unions §9 —Cannot be sued in association name.

Generally a voluntary association such as a trade union cannot sue or be sued in the association name except in special cases.

Suit for injunction by the Diamond Block Coal Company against the United Mine Workers of America and others. On motion to dissolve a temporary injunction granted by the judge of the circuit court. Motion granted, and injunction dissolved.

O. W. Napier and T. E. Moore, Jr., both of Hazard, for plaintiff.

Jesse Morgan, of Hazard, W. O. Davis, of Versailles, and Edward O'Rear, of Frankfort, for defendants.

SAMPSON, J. The Diamond Block Coal Company, a Virginia corporation doing a coal mining business in Perry county, Ky., filed its petition in the Perry circuit court on March 10, 1920, praying the clerk to grant it an immediate temporary restraining order and that the court make this perpetual, enjoining and restraining the defendants, United Mine Workers of America and 17 individuals named in the petition as defendants, and all persons working by, through, or under them, or in their employment, from proceeding to erect, construct, or build or attempting to erect, construct, or build, near the coal plant of the plaintiff, shacks, houses, or tents, or shelter of any kind, and from placing therein, or attempting to place therein, any person or persons for the purpose of inducing or persuading any of its employees, laborer or laborers, to break their contracts of employment with the plaintiff, and from doing divers other things set forth in the prayer of the petition; and, as the petition was properly verified and bond given, the clerk of the court on that day granted a temporary restraining order in accordance with the prayer of the petition, and a copy of this order was served upon each of the 18 defendants. At the time the judge of the Perry circuit court was absent from the county, and this was alleged in the petition. After alleging that the plaintiff is a corporation organized under the laws of Virginia for the purpose of mining and selling coal from its lease of 1,493½ acres of valuable coal land, located about 3 miles above the town of Hazard, in Perry county, upon which lease it has 78 houses for its employees, and a tiple, railroad switch, and other improvements necessary in mining and marketing coal, and that it has been running its mine regularly and finding a market for its product for about four years without experiencing any labor troubles, and that its employees, about 75 in number, were content and well satisfied with the labor conditions prevailing at the mines, it alleges:

That the defendants, naming them, "are each claiming to have some connection of some sort with their codefendant, United Mine Workers of America, and as such, with the exception of the defendants Jack Morris and Lee Marks, are and have been for some time holding meetings for the purpose, as the plaintiff is informed, of attempting to interfere in some way with what they term the miners employed and engaged in its mines, and all workers employed by it in and about its mine, but so far have failed to make any headway thereat, but the plaintiff now says that the defendants, acting together and in concert with each other, and individually, are now threatening to come near to and in to the plant of the plaintiff and erect near by its plant, and within 200 yards thereof, houses, tents, shacks, buildings, and barns, and to drill wells and open up a regular camp for agitators for the purpose of intimidating, alarming, and disturbing its employes and its officers and managers in charge of its plant to such an extent that they will abandon their contracts of employment with it either through fear of violence or through the unlawful persuasion used by the defendants in their efforts to break the contracts of labor between it and its employes, and induce them to quit its employment and come into the camp which they are erecting near by, and at which camp they propose to take any employe who is not engaged and will not become engaged in the actual mining of coal, and keep him at their own expense, and house, clothe, and feed him and his family, provided he is not employed in the mining of coal, and will assist him in their unlawful way, and hinder it in the production of coal at its mines, and that the purpose and intention of the defendants and each of them in the location of the said camp and the construction of houses, shacks, and the erection of tents thereon is to either by intimidation or by persuasion entice each and all of its employes at said mines to abandon their contracts of employment and labor with it, and thereby force it to close out its mines, and that each of the defendants are working together and in conjunction with each other under and by an agreement with each other for this purpose, and this purpose alone."

It is further alleged that the defendants are attempting to establish a camp near the mines of the plaintiff company for the purpose of lodging therein agitators to bring about unrest and dissension among its employes and thereby cause a strike and to prejudice the minds of its employes against it. The petition also avers:

That certain of the defendants are nonresidents of the state, and are what are known as walking delegates or international organizers, imported for the purpose of fomenting unrest and disturbance in and about its camp, and that some of these persons are acting together in an attempt to do the plaintiff injury, and "are threatening to come into its camp and among its men in crowds and numbers and by demonstrations and by other acts and demonstrations cause dissension and strife among its employes to such an extent that it will bring about disorganization in its plant such as will prevent its operating same; that the defendants are threatening to build a number of shacks and to erect a number of tents near by plaintiff's mines for the purpose of housing men in furtherance of the plan and scheme on the part of the defendants to induce and persuade plaintiff's employes to break their contracts with it and to become idle, and thus bring about a complete shut-down of plaintiff's mines."

The answer traverses each of the material allegations of the petition, and affirmatively pleads that the United Mine Workers of America is a voluntary association with more than a half a million members scattered over the United States, that there is no statutory provision of law in this state authorizing an action against voluntary association, and it pleads and relies upon this fact as a complete bar and abatement to plaintiff's action, and further that the United Mine Workers of America, a voluntary association of working people, is authorized by Act Cong. June 29, 1886, c. 567, 24 Stat. 86 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8908-8912), and is what is known as a national trade union organized—

"for the purpose of aiding its members to become more skillful and efficient workers, the promotion of their general intelligence, the elevation of their character, the regulation of their wages and their hours and conditions of labor; the protection of their individual rights in the prosecution of their trade or trades, the raising of funds for the benefit of sick, disabled, or unemployed members of the families of deceased members, or for such other object or objects or which working people may lawfully combine, having in view their mutual protection or benefit."

By reply the affirmative matter of the answer was traversed, and it was averred that, if the defendants and each of them were not enjoined from doing the things complained of in the petition, the plaintiff would suffer great loss and damage. To this reply defendants filed a rejoinder, the affirmative allegations of which were by agreement controverted of record.

On March 23d the defendants gave notice and entered a motion before Hon. John C. Eversole, judge of the Perry circuit court, "to dissolve, cancel, and set aside the restraining order" granted by the clerk, and this motion was heard partly upon affidavits and partly on oral evidence which was taken down in shorthand and transcribed and made a part of the record now under consideration. Plaintiff, the Diamond Block Coal Company, filed and read 10 affidavits, one of the affidavits containing the names of about 50 deponents, but only 6 of these affidavits relate facts which are pertinent to the issue; the others stating only that they had been approached by persons representing themselves to be members of the organization known as United Mine Workers of America, and solicited to join the union and offered its benefits, and that they refused so to do because they were perfectly content with the conditions surrounding their employment with the plaintiff. Of the 6 who gave relative evidence, if the persons mentioned had been defendants, one of them, W. A. Shumate, named Lon Hamilton, McKinley Fowler, and one Couch as threatening him if he did not join the union. Neither Hamilton, Fowler, nor Couch are defendants, and are not shown to be members of the United Mine Workers. The next affiant, Joe Cornett, stated that while in the employ of the plaintiff Lon Hamilton and Harrison McIntyre, representing themselves as members of the union, approached him and urged him to join the union and told him that he "did not get any grub allowance as an employé of the Diamond Block Coal Company, but that, if he would join their union, they would see to it that he was given his grub and seventy-five cents a day; that the union was going to build houses in close proximity to the Diamond Block Coal Company and there take care of their men and keep them there and feed and house them and pay them money while they were not working." At another time he stated that Clay Lawson and Fultz Newberry, also representing themselves as members of the union, told him that it was useless to guard the tipple, "that the union men could blow it up if they wanted to, and that the damn thing ought to be blown up, anyway." And at another time Harrison McIntyre stated to affiant that he "did not see any use in the company fighting the union; that they would have to come to it." Neither of the persons named by affiant Joe Cornett are defendants, and, except for the intimation in the affidavit that they are members of the union, no proof is adduced on that subject. The other affidavits are much the same as the ones referred to, but no person named in the affidavits as having threatened violence or attempted to intimidate or coerce an employé of the plaintiff is a defendant in the proceeding before us. No witness for the plaintiff relates any fact which proves, or in any measure tends to prove, that the defendants, or either of them, have used unlawful means, or have threatened to use any unlawful means, to promote the interest of the union, or to injure the plaintiff in its property or its property rights. No witness for plaintiff testifies to any act or threat of either of the defendants, except that the organization and some of the other defendants named have been endeavoring peaceably to organize and institute local unions of laboring people in the Hazard district, and have solicited persons to become members of the organization, and have attempted to peaceably persuade working men of that district to join the union.

The plaintiff's general manager, R. F. Hoskins, was called as a witness and cross-examined by counsel for defendants. Among other things, he was asked:

"Q. What position do you occupy with that company? A. I am the general manager.

"Q. Do you know where the W. O. Davis tract of land is with reference to your coal tipple? A. Yes.

"Q. How far is it? A. Well, I have measured it; I would say it is about 300 or 400 yards, air line, from our commissary and the houses on the north of the river, and about half a mile from our tipple and mine. * * *

"Q. How far are the houses [proposed to be built by defendants] away from your commissary and office? A. I said I would think about 300 or 400 yards. * * *

"Q. Can you see the houses from your office? A. No, sir. * * *

"Q. Have you noticed any one working on the Davis tract of land? A. I did not notice. I heard the carpenters working up there.

"Q. You just heard the sound of the hammering? A. I saw people working, but it was a little too far to distinguish who they were.

"Q. While they were working up there they did not interfere with you in any way did they? A. No.

"Q. You was not disturbed by reason of the fact that they were up there working? A. No.

"Q. Did any of the men working up there on these houses attempt to do you any injury? A. Not as I know of myself.

"Q. Did they go upon your premises and interfere with you any way? A. No.

"Q. Or with any of your employés? A. No. * * *

"Q. Do you know Wm. Larson [one of the defendants]? A. No, sir.

"Q. Has he trespassed upon your property to your knowledge? A. Not to my knowledge.

"Q. Do you know J. H. Brown [another defendant]? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. He has not trespassed on your property? A. Not to my knowledge.

"Q. Do you know Frank Hefferly [one of the defendants]? A. No.

"Q. He has not trespassed upon your property, has he? A. Not to my knowledge."

The witness was then asked concerning each of the 17 defendants named in the petition in like manner, and he answered he did not know of any trespass or wrong done by either of the defendants.

"Q. Tell the court whether or not the defendants have individually or collectively intimidated or coerced you, or any of your employés, or used any violence or force in any way to cause you to stop operating your mine or caused your employés to quit digging coal for you. A. Not as I know of.

"Q. Now you have never stopped the operation of your mine, have you? A. No. * * *

"Q. Now, Mr. Hoskins, neither of the defendants have done any act that has caused you any damage have they? A. No.

"Q. Now, you charge that some of the defendants are threatening to go upon your property. Do you know of any defendant that has ever threatened to go upon your property? A. No. * * *

"Q. Have either of the defendants done any act or anything to your knowledge that would bring about any trouble in your camp? A. No.

"Q. Or any dissension or strife in your camp? A. No. * * *

"Q. Did they give you the name of any person who was threatening to do you any injury? A. They gave the name. I would have to get that from the affidavit. Here is one—Clay Lawson and Fultz Newberry.

"Q. Now, then, Clay Lawson and Fultz Newberry are not defendants here, are they? A. No more than I am led to believe that they belong to the United Mine Workers.

"Q. You do not know that they belong, do you? A. No.

"Q. Are they the only two men that you have ever received information that they was to do you injury? A. They are the only two I can recall. * * *

"Q. I notice you charge in your petition that the defendants are inducing and persuading your employes to break their contracts with you. None of the defendants have done that, have they? A. No; none of them mentioned in there.

"Q. What kind of contract have you with your employes? A. The contract whereby you can discharge them at your will and they quit at their will. I have no signed contract, of course, but it is understood it has always been our policy that they have a right to move away at a minute's notice, and we have that same privilege to discharge them for any cause. That has been our policy since the day we started.

"Q. Then it is your policy, a policy of your company, to discharge men at your will, and it is the corresponding right of them to quit when they desire at their will, either individually or collectively, just as they please? A. Certainly.

"Q. You claim the right to discharge all the employes you have got at any time? A. Yes.

"Q. You also grant them the right to quit collectively at any time? A. Yes.

"Q. Have any of your employes quit working for you at any time recently, quit of their own accord? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Any of them been discharged by you recently? A. I think so; I cannot recall their names though. I know some have left and some have come and we have discharged some.

"Q. No act on the part of the defendants, so far as you know, has caused any one to quit you, has it? A. Well, the general impression—

"Q. Your knowledge, what do you know? A. No; personally I have not heard the conversation.

"Q. Has the defendant United Mine Workers of America ever injured you in any way to your knowledge? A. No more than having to discharge people for joining when it is our policy that we will not have union people, and cutting our production down.

"Q. Then do you tell the court that, if the miners who work for you join the United Mine Workers of America, it is your policy to discharge that miner? A. Yes.

"Q. For that reason and that alone? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. Do you refuse to employ miners who have joined the union if you know of that fact? A. Yes.

"Q. Do you know anything about the association known as the Hazard Coal Operators' Association? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. Is your company a member of that association? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. Ever had any agreement as to how you would treat the men who joined the union? A. No, sir; it has been our policy that we are not going to work union labor.

"Q. Then there is an understanding and agreement that your company and also that your neighboring companies are not to work union labor? A. It is no agreement.

"Q. It is a general understanding? A. I do not know as you would call it an understanding. We are not working them. * * *

"Q. Have you given any other names of those who have joined the union? A. I have given some names of men who have joined the union. * * *

"Q. You also recognize the fact that they as a body of laboring men have the right to protect their interest in preparing shelter and places for those who are evicted by the coal company? A. Everybody has the right to try to protect themselves.

"Q. Then you tell the court that you have no objection for these men as far as you are concerned, in a legitimate way and in a legal way, of building camp houses? A. I have an objection or I would not be at this thing to-day.

"Q. I mean in a legal way, as far as they have a right under the law? A. Of course I object. I mean by that I don't want to see anybody in the rain."

In regard to the union, the witness was asked:

"Q. Some of your men did join? A. Yes.

"Q. And they were discharged by you? A. Yes.

"Q. You had some litigation in court about the houses in which they lived? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. And you stated that your only reason for discharging them was that they had joined this union? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. Now, Mr. Hoskins, the men you discharged never gave you any trouble, did they? You just found out they had joined the union and you discharged them and they went away? A. I don't know as they gave us any trouble at the time we discharged them. But it is our rule we will not work union labor. * * *

"Q. Everything has gone on quietly and peacefully? A. Yes.

"Q. Those who joined the union, do you know where they joined it, whether on your premises or somewhere else? A. I do not think they have joined on our premises."

From all the evidence, of which there is a great quantity, the following facts may be adduced:

Some months before this litigation started three or four local unions among mine workers were organized in the Hazard field, but neither one was located at Diablock. However, a few of the men employed at plaintiff's mines became members of one of these locals, and were discharged by the company for no other cause than that they had become members of the union. The union was trying to increase its membership and to organize other locals, while the operators and the different members of their association were attempting to suppress union labor and to expel it from that coal field. While this struggle was going on the men who were discharged for joining the union were evicted by the companies from their houses, and, as they could not obtain employment at other camps in that vicinity, were often unable to find shelter, and to overcome this obstacle the Mine Workers leased three or four small pieces of ground at different places in the Hazard field, one of the tracts being the W. O. Davis tract mentioned in the evidence. It contains about five acres, lies upon a hillside near the Kentucky river, and about one-half to three-fourths of a mile from the place of business of the plaintiff, Diamond Block Coal Company. It was the intention of the Mine Workers to use these scraps of ground as building sites for shanties or cheap dwelling houses and tents to be occupied by such of their membership as were evicted by the companies from their tenant houses. A few days before this litigation started, the United Mine Workers entered into a written contract with defendants Marks and Morris, carpenters and builders of Hazard, to erect ten shanties of given dimensions upon the W. O. Davis tract, and these workmen, in pursuance of their contract, began the erection and had completed three of the houses at the time the injunction was sued out and served on them. The uncontradicted evidence shows that the Mine Workers had great difficulty in finding and locating land that they could lease for the purpose of erecting abiding places for their men, and that the Davis tract was not selected because it was near the Diamond Block-Coal Company, nor because it was especially desirable, but rather because it was the only tract obtainable in that vicinity. It further appears that, while defendants were anxious to organize the men working about the mines throughout the Hazard field, they were not especially interested in the organization of the men at plaintiff's place.

On this hearing the circuit judge, sitting as a chancellor, overruled the motion of defendants to dissolve the temporary restraining order, and entered an order continuing the injunction in force until the case was prepared upon its merits, or until defendants could apply to a judge of this court for a dissolution.

[1] As there is no evidence to support the allegations of the petition that defendants have used threats, intimidation, coercion, and fraud to accomplish their purposes, and as these allegations are specifically denied by defendants, thus putting the burden of proof upon the plaintiff, and as it is admitted by plaintiff and its officers that its mines continue uninterruptedly to run, and no employé has been induced by defendants, or either of them, to leave its employment, and that its employés have the right to quit its employment at any time, it follows that the plaintiff has wholly failed to make out its case, unless it be that the peaceable solicitation of miners to become members of the organization in that district was a violation of the rights of the plaintiff, or that the leasing of the ground by defendants from Davis and others and the erection or attempted erection of the shacks or tenant houses was an invasion of the rights of plaintiff. In its last analysis, plaintiff's only complaint supported by evidence is that defendants have leased the ground and are proposing to erect shacks thereon, and are soliciting other employés to become members of the union.

While the United Mine Workers of America is a voluntary association, and not a corporation, it is recognized both by federal statutes and the statutes of Kentucky. The association, through its officers, had a right to enter into a lease contract with Davis and to erect the houses for the shelter of their membership. Of this there can be no doubt. That it was going to house and care for laboring men who had been discharged and evicted by employers in that vicinity because the men joined the unions does not militate against the manifest right of the association to otherwise make a lease and erect houses. So long as the union keeps within its legal rights, it may lease as much ground and erect as many houses as may satisfy its purpose, and it violates no right of the plaintiff, because the rights of two persons never conflict.

[2] Labor organizations have a status in this country the same as other associations. Courts without exception have recognized the right of laboring men to associate themselves together to better their conditions and to increase their wages by lawful means. They can organize new lodges and solicit membership at any time or place so long as they do not trespass upon the rights of another. In the case of Saulsberry v. Coopers' International Union, 147 Ky. 170, 143 S. W. 1018, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1208, we said:

"A man's labor is his own. He has the right to dispose of it upon the best terms he can secure; if one to whom it is offered or by whom it is desired is unable or unwilling to pay the price demanded for it, we have presented simply a case where the parties to a proposed contract cannot agree as to terms. * * * The influences which actuate the employer in discharging the servant, or the servant in quitting the employ of the master, are not proper subjects of inquiry. If they possess the right to terminate the employment, they may exercise it, although the one so doing may know it works inconveniences, if not a positive injury, to the other. The exercise of a legal right by one in a proper manner will not be denied, although damage or loss may result to another as a necessary consequence thereof. * * * If the same principle applies to a union, which is but an organization of men for mutual benefit and protection, the plaintiff is remediless, even though his business is ruined. The right of laborers to organize for protection, in the way of securing better wages, shorter hours, and improved facilities whereby their condition is bettered, has been many times before the courts of this country, and such right has been uniformly upheld."

In the case of Hopkins v. Oxley Stave Co., 83 Fed. 912, 28 C. C. A. 99, it was said:

"The courts have invariably upheld the right of individuals to form labor organizations for the protection of the interest of the laboring class, and have denied the power to enjoin the members of such associations from withdrawing peaceably from any service, either singly or in a body, even where such withdrawal involves a breach of contract."

[3] The general rule seems to be that organizers of labor unions may use any peaceable means, not partaking of fraud, to induce persons to become members, and equity will not enjoin such organizers, or their associates, from attempting by proper argument to persuade others to join the union so long as they do not resort to force or intimidation. If the union should induce employes of the plaintiff to become members of its organization, and the plaintiff, as it has done in the past, should discharge such employes because of their membership in the union, and the plaintiff should thereby lose the service of the employe, the proximate cause would not be the joining of the union by the employe, but the discharge of the employe by the plaintiff, and the plaintiff could have no legal redress of the defendant, even though all its employes should so join the union and should in consequence suffer discharge by the plaintiff, and its business should be closed. Neither will an injunction issue in a case of this character where there is no proof of irreparable injury or the evidence fails to show that the acts complained of are likely to be continued, nor will an injunction lie because of a single act of trespass in entering upon the premises of the complainant where there is no threatened repetition of the act.

[4] It may be urged that there is evidence in this record sufficient to warrant the conclusion that certain of the persons named in the affidavits as making threats or proposing injury to the plaintiff's employes or plant were at the time members of the United Mine Workers of America, and therefore acting for and on behalf of the union. Even if it be granted that these men or any one or more of them were members of the union, and that they made the statements with which they are charged, no injunction would lie against the organization on account of such threats. The only way to reach such persons, under the facts of this case, is to make them defendants, and, if it had been shown that either of the defendants named had threatened to and was about to invade the premises of the plaintiff, intimidate, coerce, or alarm its employes, injure its property or property rights, or otherwise infringe upon its lawful rights, the injunction would not be dissolved as to such person, if it were made to appear that the plaintiff would suffer irreparable injury, and that it had no adequate remedy at law. But that is not the case we have here.

In this jurisdiction the rule is thoroughly established that a labor organization, through its officers and agents, may organize new branches and solicit membership among employes of concerns that are opposed to union labor so long as they use only peaceable means, such as persuasion and argument, and are not guilty of threats against the person or property, intimidation, coercion, or fraud. No sufficient facts were shown on which the extraordinary remedy of injunction should have been granted to complainant in this case, as injunctive relief can be had in no case except where it is made to appear that complainant has no adequate remedy at law and that great and irreparable injury will result.

Capital may lawfully organize for its advancement and protection. It does so every day. Labor may rightfully do the same thing. This is the American way—the best-known way. A business man decides he would like to go into the coal mining business. He knows if he does he will, to some extent, reduce the business chances and profits of those concerns already in the business of producing coal, but he has the right, if he can, to engage in the business and to peaceably organize capital to aid him in carrying out his plans, and in doing this he may approach other business men and persuade or induce them or any member to join him in his new enterprise. Such men join their fortunes to make themselves more powerful, their business chances greater, and their profits larger. For the same reason working men get together and organize. They want to increase their efficiency, power, influence, and business chances. We are born equal in civil rights, and so remain although our avocations and fortunes are widely different. What capital may lawfully do, labor may do with equal right. Neither has the lawful power to invade the rights of the other, nor would it be to the advantage of either. The two are inseparable companions. One cannot exist without the other.

Some common basis can and must be found on which to work out the difficulties which confound industrials to-day without stifling initiative, hope, and ambition—the spirit of our institutions. An hour's labor in a given community at a given calling should bring the toiler a given sum, with purchasing power, measured in the common necessities of life, sufficient to carry him, if judiciously employed, for a given time. This basis must bear a fixed relation to the cost of production of such articles as wheat, corn, meat, cotton, wool, and hides, as well as the value of the finished product of the hour's labor. When this plan is worked out and property administered both labor and capital will be benefited, and there will cease to be strikes and other manifestations of industrial unrest.

[6] It is a general rule that voluntary associations, such as the United Mine Workers of America, have neither power to sue nor to be sued in the association name, except in special cases. 16 R. C. L. p. 465; 25 R. C. L. p. 72; Labatt's Master & Servant, vol. 7, p. 8491; note Curd, etc., v. Wallace, etc., 7 Dana, 192, 32 Am. Dec. 85; Nichols v. Bardwell Lodge No. 179, I. O. O. F., 105 Ky. 172, 48 S. W. 426.

But, as the injunction in this case must be and is dissolved on other grounds, it is not necessary here to further consider the question.

An order has been entered dissolving and setting aside the temporary injunction granted by the judge of the circuit court.

RILEY et al. v. WALLACE, Judge.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 18, 1920.)

1. Contempt ⚡30—Courts of record have inherent power to punish.

All courts of record of superior jurisdiction have inherent power to punish for contempt, a right recognized by statutes, as Ky. St. § 1291.

2. Jury ⚡21(4)—Statute gives right to trial by jury in contempt proceedings.

The rule of common law as to the conduct of contempt proceedings has been modified by Ky. St. § 1291, by giving the party charged right to a trial by jury when in opinion of judge indignity offered him requires a greater punishment than he is authorized to impose by statute.

3. Contempt ⚡13—False swearing by witness a direct contempt.

False swearing by a witness is such an obstruction of justice as to constitute a direct contempt of court.

4. Contempt ⚡2—Contempts either direct or constructive.

Contempts of court are either direct or constructive.

5. Contempt ⚡40—False witnesses could not be proceeded against unless chancellor knew falsity.

Unless the chancellor knew that testimony given by witnesses in a divorce suit was false, they could not be proceeded against for contempt by information and rule.

6. Evidence ⚡1—"Judicial knowledge" defined.

Judicial knowledge is not the personal knowledge of the judge, but the cognizance of certain facts which a judge under the rules of legal procedure or otherwise may properly take or act upon without proof because already known to him, or that knowledge which the judge has or is assumed to have by virtue of his office.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Judicial Notice.]

7. Evidence ⚡5(1)—Judicial notice taken of whatever should be known within jurisdiction.

Judicial notice will be taken of whatever ought to be generally known within the limits of the court's jurisdiction.

8. Evidence ⚡28, 49—Judicial notice of legislative acts, and official signatures enjoined by statute.

Judicial notice of legislative acts and resolutions and of the official signature of any officer of the state, of the United States, or of any state or territory in the United States is enjoined by Ky. St. §§ 1624, 1625.

9. Evidence ⚡43(1) — Chancellor could not know witnesses gave false testimony to justify proceedings.

The chancellor could not judicially know that certain witnesses in a divorce suit had given false testimony, and could not proceed against them for contempt by information and rule, but the matter should have received the consideration of the officers of the criminal court.

Petition by C. B. Riley and A. W. Bealmear against Arthur M. Wallace, Judge, etc., to restrain entry of order in contempt proceedings. Relief granted, and defendant enjoined and restrained from proceeding further.

Chas. P. Johnson and Clem Huggins, both of Louisville, for petitioners.

N. C. Cureton, Asst. Co. Atty., Grover G. Sales, and John L. Woodbury, all of Louisville, for defendant.

QUIN, J. W. H. Haney sued his wife for a divorce on the ground of five years' separation. On the proof of two witnesses, C. B. Riley and A. W. Bealmear, a judgment granting the prayer of the petition was entered November 25, 1919. December 2d defendant moved the court to set aside the judgment of divorce on the ground of accident and surprise, and because of fraud in obtention of the decree, setting up in an affidavit filed in support of the motion that her husband had admitted to her that he had no cause for divorce and had promised to drop the proceedings. For this reason an answer prepared by her counsel was not filed, and she took no further steps in the matter. The first she knew of the judgment was when she saw a notice in a newspaper to that effect on November 25, 1919.

When the motion was first called on the docket, W. H. Haney filed his affidavit stating that on November 26, 1919, the day following the entry of the judgment, he had married one Gladys Innes, and thus the status of the parties had been changed. The motion was set for hearing on the 17th of December. In the meantime subpoenas were issued for various witnesses, including Riley and Bealmear, to appear on said date. Upon that hearing it was established that Haney and his wife had lived together as man and wife within two years prior to the filing of the petition for divorce. The testimony of Riley and Bealmear substantially showed that the evidence given by them in the divorce case was based upon information received from Haney. Thereafter, to wit, January 3, 1920, an information was filed by Hon. Arthur M. Wallace, judge of the chancery branch, First division, Jefferson circuit court, who had granted the decree, in which he set out in detail the facts as given, charging that the testimony given by the two witnesses aforesaid was false and untrue, and said statements were for the purpose of interfering with the lawful and true administration of justice in said case. A rule returnable January 6, 1920, was issued upon said information. In a response to this rule, filed by Riley and Bealmear, they denied they were guilty of contempt, or that the testimony given by them in the divorce suit was untrue. At the same time they filed a demurrer to the information as well as a motion to strike same from the record. These were overruled, and the court of its own motion struck out certain parts of the response, and before the rules were called up, to wit, on January 29, Riley and Bealmear petitioned a member of this court for an order restraining Judge Wallace from entering any order or proceeding in any wise to punish the petitioners for contempt of court.

By agreement of the parties the proceedings in the circuit court were held in abeyance until the matters should be disposed of by this court.

[1] As a general statement it may be said that all courts of record of superior jurisdiction have the inherent power to punish for contempt. Arnold v. Commonwealth, 80 Ky. 300, 44 Am. Rep. 480. This right is recognized by statute. For instance, in section 1291, Kentucky Statutes, it is provided that a court may for contempt impose upon the offender a fine not exceeding $30 or imprisonment not exceeding 30 hours, without the intervention of a jury.

[2] In the Arnold Case, supra, it was held that it was not necessary to provide by statute a mode of trial in contempt cases. The manner of conducting such proceedings was established by a rule of the common law, and all the Legislature has said is that the tribunal to whom the contempt is offered shall not, by way of punishment, exceed a fine of $30 or imprisonment exceeding 30 hours without the intervention of a jury. The rule of the common law has been modified by giving to the party charged the right to a trial by jury, and the judge is required to have a jury impaneled when in his opinion the indignity offered requires a greater punishment than he is authorized to impose by the statute.

Of prime importance is an answer to the question whether the petitioners were guilty of contempt of court.

[3, 4] As said in 13 C. J. 25:

"Ordinarily false swearing by a witness is held to be such an obstruction of justice as to constitute a direct contempt of court."

This, we think, is a fair statement of the rule. Contempts of court are either direct or constructive. It is manifest the court treated the acts of the petitioners as a direct contempt, and we will deal with it as such.

[5, 6] Unless the chancellor knew the testimony given by the petitioners was false, the petitioners could not be proceeded against by information and rule; hence it becomes necessary to inquire as to whether the court had actual or judicial knowledge or cognizance of the alleged falsity of the statements given or made by the petitioners. Knowledge of notorious facts—i. e., common knowledge—the court may be assumed to share with other intelligent men. Judicial knowledge is not the personal knowledge of the judge; it may be defined as the cognizance of certain facts which a judge under the rules of legal procedure or otherwise may properly take or act upon without proof because already known to him, or that knowledge which the judge has or is assumed to have by virtue of his office—virtute officii. To announce and enforce the provision of certain laws, substantive or procedural, is one of the judicial powers of the court and a very important object in the creation of the tribunal. Knowledge of such is therefore an essential attribute of the office. Cognizance of these rules of law is not, like that of facts in general, something which comes to the judge without, i. e., de hors, the judicial office. Chamberlayne on Evidence, §§ 570-572.

As said by Prof. Thayer in his Treatise on Evidence, the two maxims, that what is known need not be proved, "manifesta non indigent probatione," and it matters not what is known to the judge if it is not known to him judicially, "non refert quid notum sit iudici, si notum non sit in forma iudicii," comprise the whole doctrine of judicial notice.

[7] Judicial notice will be taken of whatever ought to be generally known within the limits of the court's jurisdiction.

In Wade on Notice, § 1403, it is said:

"The classes of fact of which notice will be taken are judicial, legislative, political, historical, geographical, commercial, scientific, and artistic, in addition to a wide range of matters arising in the ordinary course of nature, or the general current of human affairs, which rest entirely upon acknowledged notoriety for their claims to judicial recognition."

See, also, Commonwealth v. Gabhart, 160 Ky. 32, 169 S. W. 514.

[8] Judicial notice of legislative acts and resolutions and of the official signature of any officer of this state, of the United States, or of any state or territory in the United States is enjoined by Kentucky Statutes, §§ 1624 and 1625.

If the chancellor had had actual knowledge that Riley and Bealmear had made false statements, he would not have entered the decree of divorce, nor could he judicially have known of the alleged false testimony. It was not until after they were ordered to appear at the hearing under process of the court and in response to questions by attorneys appointed by the court to assist in the investigation that they gave information which led the chancellor to believe they had made false statements. Petitioners are here insisting that the statements made by them were not false, but we will not enter into a discussion of this question.

As said in People v. Stone, 181 Ill. App. 475:

"In a case of direct contempt, it [the court] may act upon that of which it may take judicial notice, but it cannot judicially know that evidence is false unless at the trial it is so made to appear by the witness' own admission or perhaps by unquestioned or incontrovertible evidence. Otherwise the court would act merely upon its belief or conclusions derived from evidence heard, and not upon matter of fact of which it had judicial cognizance, which is essential to summary proceeding for direct contempt."

And as further said in the foregoing opinion:

"If false swearing in the presence of the court constitutes direct contempt, then judicial knowledge of its falsity is, in our opinion, indispensable to the right of the court to exercise authority to commit therefor, and there is nothing in the record to disclose that the court knew or could know that the testimony was false."

Judge Wallace did not know, indeed could not know from the record, of the alleged falsity of the testimony given by Riley and Bealmear. At most, he was acting upon a presumption, not upon judicially known facts. With commendable promptness he sought, though by an improper method, to have the parties, if guilty, punished. We do not doubt he was convinced of their guilt. However, the facts were not disclosed until after a hearing of the motions to modify the judgment, and this was had at a date subsequent to the filing of Haney's affidavit, and when it was known that the status of the parties was such that the judgment of divorce could not be annulled.

Gordon v. Commonwealth, 141 Ky. 461, 133 S. W. 206, was a proceeding similar to this, but it was disposed of on a plea of limitation. The court intimates that the punishment inflicted on appellant in that case was warranted because of his own admission of guilt when testifying in a pending damage suit, a situation not presented here. Petitioners are denying they gave false testimony; besides the alleged falsity was not ascertained until after an independent investigation in which petitioners were ordered to appear and testify. We cannot give our approval to this plan of procedure.

As said in Melton v. Commonwealth, 160 Ky. 642, 170 S. W. 37, L. R. A. 1915B, 689:

"In thus speaking we do not undervalue the importance of the protecting courts or keeping pure the administration of the law; nor do we think what we have said limits in any manner the power courts have always possessed to punish as for contempt persons who were guilty of contempt as it has always been defined. When a court has full power and authority to protect its dignity, enforce its processes, discipline its officers, and punish those who would impede or bring into disrepute the administration of justice in a pending case, it has all the authority that is needed to be exercised through contempt proceedings, and other offenses should be left to be disposed of in the ordinary way."

[9] If the petitioners were guilty as charged in the information, they should not go unpunished. The practice of attempting to secure court judgments upon false or fraudulent testimony should not and will not be tolerated, nor would we be understood as sanctioning such practice, or any semblance thereof, because it is deserving of the severest condemnation and censure. We only hold that the facts shown in the record before us do not present a case justifying the procedure adopted. The chancellor could not judicially know the petitioners were guilty as charged. If the petitioners are thought to be guilty, that is a matter that should receive the consideration of the officers of the criminal court, and due notice of the facts should be brought to their attention for such action as may be deemed advisable.

For the reasons given the relief sought must be granted, and defendant will be enjoined and restrained from proceeding further in the contempt proceedings.

SATTERLY v. THORNTON.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 18, 1920.)

1. Trial \S 133(6)—Improper remark cured by sustaining objection and admonishing jury.

Court, by promptly sustaining objection to counsel's improper remarks in argument to jury and admonishing jury not to consider such remarks, cured what might otherwise be reversible error.

2. False imprisonment \S 8—Refusal to take prisoner before police judge held actionable.

Where defendant, who had arrested plaintiff on a warrant charging a breach of the peace, issued by a police judge, and substantially complying with Cr. Code Prac. \S 27, refused to take plaintiff before the police judge and afford him an opportunity of furnishing bail, but immediately placed him in jail, though he requested to be taken before such judge, and though on the way to the jail they passed within about eight feet of the judge's office, plaintiff had a good cause of action against defendant for false imprisonment, in view of section 28.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Spencer County.

Suit by Ezra Satterly against O. G. Thornton. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

S. K. Baird, of Shelbyville, for appellant.
L. W. Ross and Thad Cheatham, both of Taylorsville, for appellee.

QUIN, J. Appellant, as plaintiff below, instituted this suit to recover damages on two counts; one for assault and battery the other for false imprisonment. There was a directed verdict for defendant on the second count, and the jury found in his favor on the first. Plaintiff appeals.

Defendant is the town marshal of Taylorsville. February 5, 1918, county court day, he received information there would be an attempt to release from jail one who had been arrested for drunkenness. To prevent the escape of the prisoner he remained at the courthouse that night. The prisoner had created a disturbance following his arrest. About 10 o'clock p. m., plaintiff, his son, and a companion, while in a nearby restaurant, hearing cries in the direction of the jail, stepped out through a rear door of the restaurant to the jailyard to see what was the trouble. The prisoner requested them to get him a drink of water. Seeing these people near the jail, defendant, in company with his deputy, hastened toward them, and ordered them to move on. Some words passed between the parties. Their respective version of the affair is detailed by the opposing witnesses. Defendant in turn struck plaintiff, his son, and their companion with a billiard cue, which he had in his hand. The evidence of the assault is contradictory. This issue was submitted to the jury under proper instructions, and the record contains nothing prejudicial to the rights of plaintiff in this regard.

Alleged improper remarks by counsel in his opening statement are urged as grounds for a reversal. The overstatement by an attorney of his case is usually fraught with more danger to his side of the controversy than to that of his adversary. We do not see wherein the remarks complained of could have influenced the jury or affected their verdict. However, they were not objected to, nor was any motion made to strike same from the record.

It is next urged that counsel overstepped the bounds of propriety in his closing argument. We have written oftentimes that in arguing a case to the jury counsel should confine themselves to the facts disclosed by the record, or to reasonable deductions therefrom, and when they exceed these bounds they do so at their peril. See Pullman Co. v. Pulliam, 187 Ky. 218, 218 S. W. 1005, and cases therein cited.

[1] The remarks pointed out were improper, and should not have been made, but when they were objected to the court very promptly sustained the objection, and admonished the jury that they were not to consider them, thus curing what might otherwise have been a reversible error.

Complaint is further made of two questions propounded the witness Greenwell, but here again the court promptly sustained the objection to the questions—they were not answered.

The court erroneously instructed the jury to find for defendant on the false imprisonment charge. A warrant issued against plaintiff by the police judge on May 20, 1918, was placed in defendant's hands for service. Said warrant commanded defendant to arrest plaintiff and bring him before the police court to answer a charge of a breach of the peace committed in Taylorsville on the 7th day of May. The form of the warrant substantially complied with that found in section 27 of the Criminal Code.

[2] Plaintiff was arrested on the morning of May 20. On the way to the jail he inquired of defendant where he could find the police judge, and was told the latter was at the courthouse. When they reached the courthouse he repeated the question about finding the county judge, and informed defendant that the friend who accompanied them was prepared to go on his bond, whereupon defendant said to come on, he did not have time to fool with him. They passed within about eight feet of the judge's office, but notwithstanding plaintiff's request to be taken before the police judge, and his ability to furnish satisfactory bail, defendant failed and refused to comply with his request, placed him in jail, and locked the door. He did not remain long in jail; his companion immediately appeared before the judge, arranged the bond, and plaintiff was released. Under the circumstances it was defendant's duty to have taken plaintiff before the police judge and afford him the opportunity of furnishing bail, and not subject him to the humiliation of being placed in jail. He was so directed by the warrant, and requested by the plaintiff, who advised him he had a bondsman ready. Under the provisions of section 27 of the Criminal Code it is the duty of the arresting officer to bring the prisoner before some magistrate of the county in which the offense was committed; and in section 28, in misdemeanor cases, it is provided that the person arrested may immediately give bail, either before the magistrate who issued the warrant or the judge of the county court. The defendant did not comply with either of these Code provisions. Circumstances and conditions might arise under which it would be impossible for the officer to take his prisoner immediately before the proper official. For instance in Pepper v. Mayes, etc., 81 Ky. 673, Pepper was arrested under a warrant and brought before the justice at 11:30 p. m. He was crazed with a dangerous condition of mind, and the court by cursing him late to try the case, he been in condition of mind to stand the justice of the peace taking the prisoner. See, also, 5 C. J. 429; Pratt v. Hill. The facts of the case, as can read the opinion, support the judgment thereof. Defendant followed the directions of the warrant and brought plaintiff before the justice. The evidence shows that the prisoner was sane at the time.

There was no evidence of statements made by the prisoner as to the occurrence of the arrest; this was a ruling on the substance of the evidence on this issue. The court will direct the jury to find for the plaintiff, but, should defendant submit evidence, the court should submit the case to the jury. Wherefore the further proceedings are ordered.

Frauds, statute of §131(1)—Agreement to surrender term having more than one year to run must be in writing.

An agreement for the surrender of a written lease for five years, which would have more than one year yet to run after the date of surrender is within the statute of frauds, and not enforceable if not in writing.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of First Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by A. Franklin Sittig against Alf Gardner and others. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (188 S. W. 731), and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Elliott Cage, of Houston, for plaintiffs in error.

Ross & Wood and W. J. Howard, all of Houston, for defendant in error.

SONFIELD, P. J. Suit by A. Franklin Sittig, plaintiff, against Alf Gardner and others, defendants, to recover installments of rent for certain premises in the city of Houston and a foreclosure of the landlord's lien. Plaintiff by amended petition alleged that defendants entered into possession of the premises under a lease from plaintiff—the lease being for a period of five years, beginning on the 16th day of August, 1911, and ending on August 16, 1916, and continued in such possession until the 1st day of July, 1914, when, over the protest of plaintiff, who was asserting a landlord's lien on the fixtures and stock of goods in the storehouse upon the premises, they abandoned the premises, which have since that time been unoccupied. This suit was instituted on the 8th day of April, 1914, and prior to the vacation of the premises, for installments of rent then due. By amendments, plaintiff alleged other installments of rent accruing from time to time, up to the date of the trial, and sought recovery thereof.

Defendants admitted the lease contract, but alleged that on or about the 16th day of January, 1914, the parties made and entered into an agreement, by the terms of which defendants were to be released from any liability for rent then due, and were to be permitted to remain in the building until the 1st day of July, 1914, rent free, plaintiff to pay them the sum of $500 in consideration of their agreement to the cancellation and of their vacating the premises by the first day of July, 1914; that in compliance with this agreement the defendants vacated the premises before July 1, 1914, and have never used them since that date, but they prayed judgment.

On the trial, defendants offered evidence to establish the parol agreement, and that they vacated the premises in compliance with and reliance upon such agreement, at considerable expense to themselves. This evidence was excluded by the court. The cause was tried to a jury, and upon the conclusion of the evidence the court instructed to return a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the amount of the rent, with a foreclosure of the lien. On appeal, the judgment of the district court was affirmed. 188 S. W. 731. Writ of error was granted by the Committee of Judges.

The determinative question in the case is whether the agreement for the surrender of the lease, the term remaining and to be surrendered being for more than one year, was within the statute of frauds. Upon consideration of this question, we concur in the conclusion of the Court of Civil Appeals that the agreement was within the statute. That court in its opinion so fully and clearly discusses the question that we deem further discussion unnecessary. We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

ANDERSON v. STEDDUM. (No. 142-3072.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 26, 1920.)

Guardian and ward §30(3)—Pension is "estate" expendable only on court order.

Pension money received by a guardian is "estate" of the ward within the meaning of the term "estate" as used in Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 4131, and the guardian is not entitled to credit for expenditure thereof for support and education where she did not first procure a court order as required by that article.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Sixth Supreme Judicial District.

Proceedings on the final account of Mary A. Anderson, as guardian of Charles T. Steddum, her minor son. A judgment of the district court disapproving the final account was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (194 S. W. 1132), and the guardian brings error. Affirmed.

H. G. Evans, of Bonham, for plaintiff in error.

J. W. Gross and A. P. Bolding, both of Bonham, for defendant in error.

KITTRELL, J. This cause is reported in 194 S. W. 1132. The writ was granted by the Committee of Judges. It involves the question whether pension money received by a guardian and expended in her capacity as such is "estate" of the ward within the meaning of the term "estate" as used in article 4131, V. S. R. S. The Court of Civil Appeals held that it is, and that, the guardian having expended the money without having first procured such order as is by said article 4131 required to be obtained before the expenditure was made, the guardian was not entitled to credit for such expenditure in the settlement of her final account.

The Supreme Court has indicated to us that in its opinion the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals was correct and should be affirmed. In view of that opinion, it is recommended that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

O'NEIL ENGINEERING CO. et al. v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF PARIS. (No. 104-2940.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B. June 18, 1920.)

1. Principal and surety \Leftrightarrow 59—Surety on a contractor's bond is charged with knowledge of terms.

Surety on a contractor's bond is charged with knowledge of all the terms, stipulations, and legal consequences of the contract upon which it became a guarantor.

2. Assignments \Leftrightarrow 85—Assignee of contractor held entitled to priority over surety.

Where a construction contract authorized the board of road commissioners to retain 15 per cent. of the monthly estimates, and the surety on the contract was subrogated to and had had assigned to it the rights of the board, the contractor's assignment of the remaining 85 per cent. gave its assignee rights superior to the board and surety so long as the contractor was carrying on the work and not in default.

3. Assignments \Leftrightarrow 74—Assignee takes only title of the assignor.

When there is an assignment of a particular fund, the assignee takes the title of the assignor to that which is assigned, but he obtains no greater right in or title to the fund than exists in the assignor.

4. Assignments \Leftrightarrow 85—Breach having occurred before payment, rights of assignee were inferior to those of surety.

Where contract for the construction of a road authorized the board of road commissioners to retain 15 per cent. of the monthly estimates, and provided that the remainder should be paid on or before the fourth Monday of the month following that in which the work was performed and the warrant for the work done on the previous month, although approved on the 4th day of the month, had not been delivered on the 8th day of the month, when the contractor defaulted and a bank which had an assignment of warrants to become due demanded payment, held, that the board was warranted in retaining the amount because of default, so rights of the surety to which had been assigned all sums retained, etc., were superior to those of the bank.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Sixth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by the First National Bank of Paris, Texas, against the O'Neil Engineering Company and others. Judgment adverse to plaintiff was modified and affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (176 S. W. 74), and defendants bring error. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and that of district court affirmed.

James J. Collins and M. W. Townsend, both of Dallas, and Chas. L. Black, of Austin, for plaintiffs in error.

A. P. Park, of Paris, and Brooks, Hart & Woodward, of Austin, for defendant in error.

SADLER, P. J. The statement of the case as given in the opinion by the Court of Civil Appeals is so full and complete that we adopt same as shown in 176 S. W. 74. As aptly stated by Associate Justice Hodges:

"The only errors assigned are those which question the court's legal conclusions from the foregoing facts. To summarize: These facts show conflicting claims to a special fund authorized by law to be disbursed under the order of the board of permanent road commissioners for justice precinct No. 1 of Lamar county. The appellant [defendant in error] claims that fund—or rather so much of it as may be necessary to satisfy its debt against the engineering company—by virtue of parol assignments made before any of the money due upon the contract with the board had been earned by the engineering company. The surety company [Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, and Title Guaranty Insurance Company, acting together] claims this fund upon three different written assignments. The first is referred to as the application agreement made at the time the contract of suretyship was entered into and as a part of the consideration of that contract; the second is another written assignment, dated February 26, 1913; and the third still another agreement made on the 8th day of August, 1913, at the time it took over, or agreed to take over, the contract of the engineering company with the board. The surety company also insists upon its right of subrogation to all of the claims, securities, and demands owned or held by the board against the engineering company at the time the latter defaulted in the performance of its contract.

The trial court held that the sureties on the bond of the O'Neill Engineering Company given to the board of road commissioners to insure performance of the road contract were entitled to the fund involved. On appeal, the Court of Civil Appeals held that the bank had a prior right in the fund to the extent of its debt against the engineering company. To this judgment writ of error was granted.

Opinion.

After a very careful consideration of the able presentation by counsel of the questions involved, we have concluded that the Court of Civil Appeals erred in the disposition made of this case.

[1, 2] In reaching this conclusion, we have recognized the difficulty involved. At the time the contract was entered into between the O'Neill Engineering Company and the board of road commissioners, it was therein specially stipulated that a bond should be given as required by law, guaranteeing performance by the engineering company of the contract, in which it obligated itself, in accordance with the plans and specifications furnished, to construct the roads contemplated. It was further stipulated as a protection to the board that 15 per cent. of each monthly estimate of the work completed should be retained by it until all of the work had been completed, in accordance with the contract. It was stipulated that between the 1st and 10th of each month, the engineer who was acting for the board should make an estimate of the amount of work which had been completed during the previous month; that he should deduct therefrom fifteen per cent. and such other amounts as might be proper to be retained by the board until the completion of the contract; that the remaining portion of the estimate should be paid over to the engineering company for the work which it had completed during the previous month. The contractor could not require payment of this amount before the fourth Monday in the month in which the estimate had been approved.

It may not be amiss to discuss the relationship existing between the board of road commissioners and the engineering company under the contract. The board provided for its protection against default on the part of the engineering company. The retention of 15 per cent. of the monthly estimates and such other deductions as its engineer might make, together with the bond guaranteeing performance, were provided as sufficient to recoup the board for any dereliction by the engineering company. We think that it is clear that this construction of the contract is in consonance with its terms and with the intention on the part of the board. As a retained percentages and deductions by its engineer and the bond required. The engineering company accepted for itself, with the consent and permission of the board, such an amount of each monthly estimate as remained after the deductions had been made by the engineer in charge. This amount may, for convenience, be treated as 85 per cent. of each monthly estimate.

At the end of each month, after the work began, the engineering company, it then being in performance of the contract, was entitled to receive 85 per cent. of each estimate, without any retained claim thereto by the board. This board did not put any restraint upon this 85 per cent. to protect against any future dereliction, failure, or incapacity on the part of the engineering company in the performance of the contract. In the absence of fraud or mistake, when the board approved the estimate submitted by the engineer for any month, the amount of such estimate, the contract then being in performance by the engineering company, was set apart from the general fund to meet the obligation to the contractor at its maturity.

What was the position of the surety or bondsman who sought to indemnify the board against loss or guarantee the faithful execution of the contract by the principal? They were charged with knowledge of all of the terms, stipulations, and legal consequences of the contract upon which they became guarantors. If we treat the contract, which we think proper to do, as being incorporated in and forming a part of the bond, then the surety company occupied exactly the same position in relation to it as that of the principals themselves. The surety company had no greater right in the contract or under it than had the board. It accepted the suretyship with knowledge that a certain per cent. of each monthly estimate for work completed during that month was to become due and payable to and subject to the possession of its principal in the bond without restraint.

An examination of the application for suretyship made by the contractor to the surety companies further confirms the position here taken. The assignment contained in the application had relation to the condition which existed, not at the time of making the contract, but at the time of the breach and failure of performance on the part of the principal. As long as the contractor was carrying out his obligation in performing the terms of his contract, the surety company had no right to arrest or hold for its protection, either under the application assignment or by equitable subrogation, any part of the estimate approved by the board, ordered paid, and subject to the demand of the contract. It entered into its suretyship relying for protection upon the retained percentage and its faith in the contractor. It reserved no rights against any earned and approved amounts subject to the demand of the contractor prior to breach by him.

This being the situation at the time the assignment was made by the engineering company to the bank, it became the first assignee of that portion of the monthly estimates to which the engineering company would be entitled under its contract with the board as long as the engineering company was in the performance of its contract and until any sums due to the bank covered by the assignment were liquidated.

The second assignment made to the surety company affected only the percentage retained by the board under the original contract, and did not in any wise attach to that portion of any estimate payable to the contractor. The last or third assignment to the surety company, that made on the 8th day of August, 1913, is not material except as it may affect the question of whether or not there was an abandonment of the contract by the engineering company.

What, then, was the status of the fund involved in this litigation on the 4th day of August, 1913? The engineering company was in the proper performance of its contract during the month of July, and had completed such a portion of the work contemplated as, in the judgment of the engineer in charge, entitled it to the sum of $13,347.97. All proper deductions had been made in behalf of the board under the contract. On this date this fund had charged against it the indebtedness due by the engineering company to the bank. There was no other demand or claim against it. All claims of the board were satisfied in the deduction made by the engineer. This fund was resting under no obligation either to the board or to any other party as an assignee, by contract or by equitable subrogation, under the conditions as they existed on the 4th day of August, 1913. The only party who had any claim in this fund was the engineering company, subject, alone, to the assignment which it had made to the bank. The board of commissioners, on the submission to it of the estimate by the engineer, duly and legally approved the same and ordered the sum found due by him for the previous month's work to be paid to the engineering company, and a warrant was drawn on the special fund in its favor for this amount.

[3,4] At the time of this order the engineering company was carrying out and performing its contract. There had been no breath of suspicion of failure to perform on the part of the contractor. There had been no intimation of the prospective abandonment of the contract or of an inability to complete it. The board justly determined in the exercise of its power that it had no claim on this amount, and that it was owing to the contractor. Nothing had occurred giving rise to any question as to the legal right of the contractor to the fund. The surety company was not asserting any claim against it, and nothing had occurred which gave it the right to assert a claim. If on that day the contractor had the right to demand the payment, and it had made the demand, there is nothing in the record which gives to any one the right to have demurred, or which would have given to the board the power to have refused payment to the contractor, or to the bank as its assignee. It appears, however, that for several days no demand was made for the delivery of the warrant or payment. On the 8th of the month the bank, as assignee, demanded the delivery of the warrant to it, and gave notice to the board of its assignment. Subsequent to this demand, but on the same day, came into existence the transactions which bring about this litigation. The president of the engineering company appeared before the board, and notified it that his company could not carry out the contract and that it had assigned the same, together with all rights under it, to the surety companies, who were to carry out and complete the work in accordance with the terms of the contract. On indemnification by the surety company, the board delivered the warrant to it.

If the surety company had any right in this fund, the power to exercise that right arose subsequent to the 4th day of August, 1913. The bank held, on that date, under the then existing conditions, the superior right in this fund to the amount of its claim against the contractor, except as that right may have been affected by the subsequent conduct of the engineering company.

The determination of the effect of the transactions which took place on the 8th day of August, 1913, has been fraught with great difficulty. We cannot agree with the Court of Civil Appeals that the engineering company did not abandon work and make default under the contract. It did assign all of its rights under the contract to its surety and all amounts then due thereunder by the board. This assignment, however, was superinduced by the fact of inability to perform the obligations resting upon the engineering company. We are impressed that the question is squarely before us to be decided in the light of effect thereon of abandonment of the contract by the engineering company, and that we will have to deal with the parties and their rights as such abandonment affects them.

If the contract had been abandoned prior to the approval of the estimate for July and the order for payment of that portion to which the engineering company was entitled, under the decision of the engineer in charge for the board, then, in a suit to compel ap-final completion of the work contemplated. This right existed in the board in virtue of the relation existing between it and the contractor with regard to the subject-matter of the contract.

Notwithstanding the order approving the estimate and directing its payment to the contractor, should he have abandoned his contract at a time when there was no existing right in an assignee, the board could have defeated a recovery by the contractor until final completion, and, so long as no right existed in the contractor to demand payment and require performance of the order of the board, the assignee of the contractor could exercise no greater right than he. We are thus brought to the question of what effect upon these rights of the board the previous assignment to the bank had.

It appears to be settled that when there is an assignment of a particular fund the assignee takes the title of the assignor to that which is assigned, but he obtains no greater right in or to the fund than exists in the assignor.

The trial court and the Court of Civil Appeals seem to proceed to a decision upon the evident hypothesis that at the time the bank demanded payment (August 8th), the contractor then had the unqualified right to demand payment, in that the amount ordered paid was a matured obligation. These courts evidently overlooked that provision of the contract with controlled the maturity of the payment. In the clause providing for the estimates and deductions and directing the manner of payment, it is provided that the board, or the engineer acting for the board, "shall pay the remainder of such estimate to the contractor * * * at the office of the county auditor * * * on or before the fourth Monday of each month for the work of the preceding month." Under the terms of the contract, the board might make the payment at any time after approval of the estimate, but the contractor could not demand it as a matured and absolute right vested in him until the fourth Monday in August.

On the 8th day of August the parties stood in this relation: The board had determined that it was due for the previous month's work the amount of the estimate, and that the same should be paid, but the payment was reserved and the contractor could not demand that it be made. The option was with the board to pay then or to abide its time under the maturity clause of the contract. The amount due and owing was determined, but it was still an unmatured indebtedness. The definite amount of $13,347.97 became fixed as due by the board to the tion of the board. With the funds thus impressed, the contractor gave notice of his default, his inability to further perform, and, as a consequence, of abandonment, and that he had called upon the sureties to complete his original obligation—their ultimate contract.

The assignment in the application for the suretyship bond was of all amounts which might be due the contractor by the board at the time of the abandonment of the contract by the engineering company. This assignment antedated that made to the bank. It stood ready at all times, for the protection of the surety, to take hold of any money which the board owed to the contractor at the time of the abandonment of the contract. The amount of the estimate in question being a debt due, but not matured, at the time of the abandonment, was immediately fastened upon by the original assignment to the surety company, to the exclusion of any other assignment subsequently given. The assignment to the bank attached to this fund, subject to the stipulations contained in the contract, and subject to the rights of the parties under that contract as they might arise in law.

The rights of the board to retain this estimate against the contractor became fixed upon his abandonment of the contract. This right existed from the inception of the construction contract; the surety company was in equity subrogated to the then existing rights of the board. As the surety accepted its responsibility to, and did proceed in, the performance of the contract, it was vested, both under the application assignment and by subrogation, to a prior right in the fund to that of the bank. The bank's assignment postdated the application assignment, and postdated the equitable rights existing in the board and subject to attach to the fund. Hess & Skinner Engineering Co. v. Turney (Sup.) 216 S. W. 621. What occurred on August 8th gave rise to the rights of the board and of the surety company which related back to, and dated from, the inception of the construction contract.

We are of opinion that the surety company obtained the prior right in this fund, and that the Court of Civil Appeals erred in not so holding.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be reversed, and that of the district court affirmed.

HAWKINS and GREENWOOD, JJ. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

(No. 157-3129.)(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 23, 1920.)1. Carriers §218(1)—Interstate carrier not estopped to set up limitation of time for action.

Provision in contract for interstate shipment of live stock that in consideration of lower rate no action against the carrier shall be maintained unless commenced within six months, is valid, and cannot be avoided by the shipper on ground that the carrier is estopped to set it up.

2. Carriers §35 — Interstate carrier cannot waive requirement of Commerce Act or stipulation of contract thereunder.

No interstate carrier can waive a requirement of the Interstate Commerce Act, or stipulation of contract made pursuant thereto.

3. Carriers §35—Interstate carrier cannot estop itself to invoke limitation of time to sue.

Representatives of interstate carrier cannot, by conversations, letters, and negotiations extending beyond time limited for suit by contract pursuant to the Interstate Commerce Act, estop the carrier to assert and invoke the limitation against the shipper.

4. Commerce §8(12)—Carmack Amendment withdraws determination of validity of shipping contracts from state law.

The Carmack Amendment (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa) to the Interstate Commerce Act has withdrawn the determination of the validity of all stipulations in interstate shipping contracts from state law or legislation.

5. Carriers §32(1) — No discrimination by interstate carriers between shippers permitted.

St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa) to the Interstate Commerce Act, so that it was not binding on a shipper where it was not filed as a part of the schedule of rates with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by W. H. Shroyer against the Chicago, Rock Island & Gulf Railroad Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which reversed and remanded (197 S. W. 773), and plaintiff brings error. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and judgment of the trial court affirmed.

W. A. Davidson, of Amarillo, for plaintiff in error.

N. H. Lassiter, of Ft. Worth, and O. E. Gustavus, of Amarillo, for defendant in error.

KITTRELL, J. Plaintiff in error sued defendant in error for damages arising out of an interstate shipment of cattle, and recovered judgment. On appeal that judgment was reversed and the cause remanded by the Court of Civil Appeals of the Seventh District. The report of the case is to be found in 197 S. W. 773, and the carefully considered and able opinion of Chief Justice Huff clearly reveals what issues were involved, and the holding of the court with relation thereto.

The question on the decision of which the opinion is in the main based was apparently raised on motion for rehearing for the first time. There were, however, several assignments of error presented, but the defense was based in the main on the ground that the plaintiff had not brought suit within six months after his cause of action accrued, as was required by the contract under which the shipment was made.

[1] By way of avoidance of that defense plaintiff pleaded certain facts by way of estoppel, to the effect that the representatives of the railway company had by their statements and letters induced him to believe that the six-month limitation would not be insisted on, but would be waived, and the Court of Civil Appeals, without setting forth the evidence, treated it as sufficient to show waiver by estoppel. We do not deal with the questions so ably discussed by the Court of Civil Appeals with the expectation of being able to add to or improve upon its opinion; but, since the memorandum of the Committee of Judges which granted the writ shows that it was granted because of the great importance of the question involved, without any expression of opinion as to the correctness of the holding, additional observations on our part may be helpful to the bar and courts in similar cases which may arise in the future. The Court of Appeals held that the six-month limitation provision was valid, and that estoppel could not be interposed to prevent its application to the case as a defense. With that holding we fully agree. To allow the force and effect of the limitation to be avoided on the ground of estoppel would be to allow that to be done indirectly which cannot be done directly.

[2] One of the controlling purposes in enacting the Interstate Commerce Act originally, as well as the amendments thereto, was to prevent the evils arising out of discrimination between shippers on the part of carriers, which had grown to harmful proportions; therefore the right or power to discriminate between shippers in any matter relating to interstate shipments was taken away by the federal statute, and no carrier can waive any requirement of the statute or any stipulation of any contract made pursuant thereto.

[3] If the representatives of a railroad company could by conversations and letters and negotiations extending beyond the statutory or contract limit of time to bring suit set estoppel in operation so that the carrier could not assert and invoke the statutory right given it, which is part of the contract of shipment, their action would, in effect, amount to the equivalent of a waiver, and would operate to enable the carrier to discriminate between shippers, and thereby virtually nullify the statute. Georgia, etc., v. Blish, etc., 241 U. S. 197, 36 Sup. Ct. 541, 60 L. Ed. 948, and authorities cited; Southern, etc., v. Prescott, 240 U. S. 638, 36 Sup. Ct. 469, 60 L. Ed. 836; St. Louis, etc., v. Landa (Civ. App.) 187 S. W. 358.

The Interstate Commerce Act has been the subject of judicial decision by the court of ultimate resort in many cases, and the Carmack Amendment (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa) has been repeatedly construed, interpreted, and applied.

[4] It is clear beyond doubt or debate that the amendment has withdrawn the determination of the validity of all stipulations in interstate shipping contracts from state law or legislation. Adams, etc., v. Croninger, 226 U. S. 491, 33 Sup. Ct. 148, 57 L. Ed. 314, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 257; Michigan, etc., v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59, 33 Sup. Ct. 192, 57 L. Ed. 417, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 176.

[5] No discrimination will be permitted directly or indirectly as between shippers.

The limitation of the time within which to bring actions is a usual and reasonable provision, and nothing in the Carmack Amendment is violated by such agreement.

[6, 7] The question of the construction of an interstate bill of lading is a federal question. Every shipper is charged with notice of the terms of the interstate tariffs governing his shipments.

[8] If any state law or the holding of any state court conflicts with the provisions of the federal statute, or with the interpretation put upon it by the Supreme Court of the United States, the federal law will control. Authorities supra; M., K. & T., etc., v. Harri-man, 227 U. S. 657, 33 Sup. Ct. 397, 57 L. Ed. 890; Western, etc., v. Leslie, 242 U. S. 448, 37 Sup. Ct. 133, 61 L. Ed. 423; Southern, etc., v. Prescott, 240 U. S. 632, 36 Sup. Ct. 469, 60 L. Ed. 836.

The appellee, plaintiff in error here, stated in his motion for rehearing in the Court of Civil Appeals that it was not disputed by him that the court's holding that the stipulation could not be waived was correct, if the stipulation was enforceable in the first place, but contended that it was not valid, but was void because it was not a part of the schedule filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. On the other hand, appellant, defendant in error here, contends that the stipulation as to bringing suit in six months was not required to be filed. The contentions of opposing counsel revolve around this single point. The question is one concerning which lawyers and courts may reasonably differ. While Chief Justice Huff discusses it with persuasive force, yet he admits it is not free from difficulty and doubt by saying:

"The presentation of the question upon motion [for rehearing] by appellee has been forceful, and it appears to us may be a reasonable interpretation of the statute, but, after examining quite a number of cases by the Supreme Court we find no case passing upon provisions of like kind that will justify us in reaching the conclusion that that court has ever placed its holding as to the validity of such limitations in bills of lading upon the ground that such provision must first be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission as part of the carrier's rate sheet."

[9] The Supreme Court has indicated to us that the stipulation in the bill fixing the short period of six months for the institution of the suit was clearly a determinative element of the rate charged the shipper; indeed, was in a chief measure the consideration, the justification for the rate; that the statute declares that any regulation which in any wise affects or determines the rate shall be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission as a part of the carrier's schedule of rates. The purpose of this must have been to acquaint the shipper with any rule or regulation having the character of a determinative factor in the making of the rate, and by which, because of this, the shipper would be bound if he accepted the rate. In fairness, he would be entitled to that knowledge so as to enable him to choose properly between the higher and the lower rate, and it should therefore be assumed that the intention of the statute was to afford it to him. The ultimate decision of the question rests with the United States Supreme Court, but it has not yet determined it. Upon this view of the question the holding is based that the stipulation was a regulation affecting the rate within the meaning of the federal statute. This being true, it was not binding on plaintiff in error under the admitted facts, and the Court of Civil Appeals erred in holding to the contrary.

The proper judgment to be rendered is to reverse the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals and affirm the judgment of the district court, and we so recommend.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. CO. OF TEXAS v. NORRIS et al. (No. 126-3009.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B. June 23, 1920.)

Carriers §322—Negligence of carrier must have caused or concurred in death of passenger.

In action against railroad for injury to shipper when riding in a box car, in absence of affirmative finding that injury in car, and not a subsequent injury in a wagon, was proximate cause of death, or of finding that injury in car and subsequent injury concurred as cause of death, there was no basis for judgment against the railroad.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fifth Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by J. A. Norris and others against Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which affirmed (184 S. W. 261), and defendant brings error. Judgments of the trial court and the Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and case remanded.

Chas. C. Huff and Lawther, Pope & Mays, all of Dallas, for plaintiff in error.

D. H. Morrow and Carden, Starling, Carden, Hemphill & Wallace, all of Dallas, for defendants in error.

SADLER, P. J. On the 10th day of January, 1914, J. A. Norris was injured at Pottsboro by the negligence of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas. These injuries were caused by making a flying switch with a box car in which Norris was riding as a shipper of household goods, stock, etc. What injuries he received are left uncertain except as to his leg, hip, and a skinned place on his cheek or forehead. This occurred on Saturday afternoon. Sunday he, with some assistance, loaded some of his freight into a wagon drawn by a span of mules, and started to his home out in the country. He fell from the wagon, receiving additional injuries, the nature and extent of which are not clearly shown by the evidence. He died the following Saturday from hemorrhage of the brain.

Suit was filed by the surviving wife and children against the railway company to recover damages on account of the death of the husband and father.

On the jury's responses to special issues judgment was rendered against the company, from which an appeal was taken by the defendant. The judgment of the trial court was affirmed in 184 S. W. 261, and writ of error granted to the judgment of affirmance.

The recovery is sought upon several theories: (a) That the death of Norris resulted from the injuries received in the box car, that the injuries received in the box car were fatal, and that the negligence of defendant in making the flying switch was the direct and proximate cause of such injuries and death. (b) That on the next day after receiving the injuries in the box car Norris while riding home in a wagon fell therefrom on account of such injuries and received additional injuries. The fall from the wagon is charged to have been the direct and proximate result of the previous injuries. (c) That as the proximate result of the negligence of defendant Norris was injured in his head, chest, left side, left ribs, leg, and hip, and internally. (d) That all the injuries received in the box car and in the fall from the wagon were the direct and proximate result of the negligence of defendant.

The answer of defendant put in issue each of these theories, and further charged that the injuries received in the fall from the wagon were the direct and proximate cause of death, and were produced by subsequent independent cause in no way created by or due to the charged negligence of defendant, or to the injuries received in the box car.

The cause was submitted on special issues, which, so far as necessary to the decision of this case, together with the answers, are as follows:

"(1) Did the deceased, Norris, die from the injury or injuries he got in the box car, and none other? A. No.

"(2) Did the injuries got in the box car contribute to cause the death of the deceased? A. Yes.

"(3) Was the deceased, Norris, faint or sick when riding upon the wagon from which he fell upon the occasion in question? A. Yes.

"(4) Did the sickness or faintness, if any, of the deceased, Norris, while riding upon the wagon result directly and proximately from the injuries got in the car? A. Yes.

"(5) Did the sickness or faintness, if any, of the deceased, Norris, while riding upon the wagon from which he fell directly and proximately cause him to fall off said wagon? A. No.

"(6) Did the deceased, Norris, die from the injuries, if any, he got at the time he fell off the wagon and none other? A. No."

Defendant requested the following issues, which were refused:

"Did the injuries received by J. A. Norris as a result of the collision with the box car, directly and proximately in a natural and continuous sequence, and unbroken by a new cause, produce his death?"

"Would the death of J. A. Norris, deceased, have occurred but for the injuries received by him in the runaway?"

It also requested the court to charge as follows:

"To attribute death to two or more concurrent causes each must be a prominent and efficient cause; for, if one of the alleged causes operates slightly with another one, which is the prominent, efficient cause, then the proximate cause of the death should be attached to the latter."

This was refused.

Defendant also moved for judgment on the findings of the jury because of the answer to special issue No. 5, for the reason that such answer was a finding that the injuries received in the box car and the act of the defendant in causing such injuries did not directly and proximately cause the deceased's fall from the wagon, the consequent runaway, and the injuries and death resulting therefrom?

Complaint is made by plaintiff in error to the finding by the Court of Civil Appeals that as a result of the collision Norris "received injuries to his head, chest, and side" because there is no evidence to support this finding.

Opinion.

The most important question arises upon the legal effect of the jury's answers to the special issues.

So far as the two sets of injuries which Norris received are concerned, the answers negative any connection between the negligence of the defendant and the fall from the wagon and the injuries resulting from the latter cause. We may premise that the injuries received in the fall from the wagon owe their origin to an independent, unrelated, and subsequent cause from those resulting from defendant's negligence. If these latter injuries were the proximate cause to which death is referable, it is not chargeable to the negligence of defendant.

Under the Bigham Case, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 367, 126 S. W. 324, and subsequent decisions of our courts following the holding there expressed, defendant cannot be held responsible for the result of an independent, intervening cause which did not owe its origin to or have any connection with its negligence.

If the findings of the jury can be said to sustain the court's judgment, it must be based upon some other theory. If the injuries received in the box car were the direct and efficient cause of death, then the negligence of the defendant is the proximate cause of death.

The findings of the jury do not charge more certainly the death of Norris to one than to the other set of injuries. While issues 1 and 6 were very suggestive that Norris died from both sets of injuries, yet they certainly leave in the domain of conjecture to which the jury attributed the greater influence upon the result. In fact, the findings give us no guide pointing the way to the ascertainment of the extent to which either contributed to the death of Norris.

Defendants in error contend that, if the fall from the wagon is an independent intervening cause in no manner referable to the negligence of the railway company, yet the injuries received in the box car so acted upon Norris, and so concurred with those received in the fall from the wagon, as to be responsible along with the latter injuries for the death. This position would merit consideration if that theory were presented by the evidence. This is not done. The effect of the injuries shown to have been received in the box car in bringing about or rendering Norris subject to or as increasing the fatal effects of the later injuries is not made to appear.

Many cases are cited upon this theory. All have been carefully examined. Many not cited have had our attention. The propositions presented by these authorities are all based upon pleading and evidence showing that the recovery is sustained because it is charged and proved that the prior injury exerted a material influence upon the injured party in rendering him susceptible to the effect of subsequent disease or injury, and less able to withstand its deterrent effect upon his system, or when the subsequent disease was the natural and probable result of the injuries. The rule discussed in these cases has no application to that now under consideration because not raised by proof, and it is doubtful whether presented by the pleading.

The jury finding in answer to issue No. 2 cannot assist defendants in error, as it must be considered in the light of the pleading and proof. If it should be said that this is a finding that the injuries in the box car acted materially in conjunction with those subsequently received in producing death, then the finding is immaterial, because not within the purview of the pleading and proof. If it should be construed as a finding that the first injuries brought about the event producing the second injuries, then it is in direct and positive conflict with the answer to issue No. 5.

Because of the failure of the jury to fix the proximate cause of death, a necessary finding in support of the judgment is wanting. Defendant requested the submission of an issue calling for a finding upon proximate cause of death in relation to the injuries charged to have been received as a result of the collision with the box car. This should have been given, since the court had failed to give the jury the opportunity to pass upon the evidence in this respect. The evidence called for the submission of the requested issue as to the proximate effect of such injuries.

The judgments of the Court of Civil Appeals and district court should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PHILLIPS, C. J. There was no affirmative finding by the jury in this case that the injury received by Norris in the box car and for which the defendant was responsible was the proximate cause of his death. The defendant requested the submission of this issue. Nor was there any affirmative finding by the jury that the injury received by Norris in the box car and the fall from the wagon concurred as the efficient cause of his death. Under this condition there was no basis for a judgment against the defendant, and accordingly there should be another trial.

We make no holding as to the effect of the evidence, nor as to what issues are presented by the evidence. In the disposition made of the case such a holding is unnecessary, and in view of another trial it is pretermitted.

As has been recommended by the Commission of Appeals, the judgments of the District Court and Court of Civil Appeals are reversed and the case remanded to the District Court.

CHICAGO, R. I. & G. RY. CO. v. SMITH. (No. 150-3108.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A. June 23, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨216(3)—Instruction in personal injury action not to be complained of, in absence of request for correction.

In an action brought under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), a charge that if plaintiff was injured as alleged, and if the proximate cause thereof was concurring negligence, under issues submitted, then "in answer to this question you will diminish your findings on this issue in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to plaintiff," cannot be complained of, in absence of a special charge suggesting corrections.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1088(4)—Instruction on diminution of damages for concurring negligence held harmless.

In an action against a railroad company for personal injuries, an instruction that if plaintiff was injured as alleged, and the proximate cause thereof was concurring negligence, then the finding should be diminished in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to plaintiff, if erroneous, held harmless, where the jury found that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

3. Master and servant ⇨297(2) — Findings held not inconsistent.

In a personal injury action under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), a finding that plaintiff did not attempt to step on a stringer, lose his balance, and fall, as alleged in the answer, held not inconsistent with a special subsequent finding that, if the accident had happened as alleged, plaintiff would have been guilty of contributory negligence, which was rendered immaterial by the first finding.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Action by A. W. Smith against the Chicago, Rock Island & Gulf Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (197 S. W. 614), and defendant brings error. Affirmed, as recommended by the Commission of Appeals.

Lassiter & Harrison, of Ft. Worth, O. B. Gustavus, of Amarillo, and R. M. Rowland, of Ft. Worth, for plaintiff in error.

L. C. Barrett, J. N. Browning, and Crudgington & Works, all of Amarillo, and Black & Smedley, of Austin, for defendant in error.

SPENCER, J. A. W. Smith instituted this suit, and recovered judgment against the Chicago, Rock Island & Gulf Railway Company for personal injuries sustained by him. Judgment was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals. 197 S. W. 614. Writ of error was granted upon application referred to the Committee of Judges.

[1, 2] Plaintiff in error complains of the following charge of the court:

"If you find that plaintiff was injured as alleged in his petition, and the proximate cause thereof was the concurring negligence, if any, of the plaintiff and defendant under the issues hereinbefore submitted for your finding, then in answer to this question you will diminish your finding on this issue in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to plaintiff."

The reason assigned is that it does not correctly submit the liability of the plaintiff in error under the terms of the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665). The charge given is almost in the identical language of the statute, and in the absence of a special charge from plaintiff in error, suggesting a correction of any error it deemed to exist, we think it is not now in position to complain. St. L. & S.F. Ry. Co. v. Brown, 241 U. S. 223, 36 Sup. Ct. 602, 60 L. Ed. 966. Moreover, the jury found that defendant in error was not guilty of contributory negligence, and this renders the error, if any, harmless.

[3] Plaintiff in error insists that the answer of the jury to special issue No. 5 is inconsistent with and contradictory to the answer of the jury to special issue No. 6, and therefore forms no proper basis for a judgment in favor of defendant in error. Special issue No. 5 reads:

"Did the plaintiff, at the time, place, in the manner, and under the circumstances alleged in paragraph 6 of defendant's answer, attempt to step upon the stringer, lose his balance, and fall to the ground?"

The jury answered: "No."

Special issue No. 6 is as follows:

"If the plaintiff at the time, place, in the manner and under the circumstances alleged in paragraph six of defendant's answer did attempt to step upon the stringer, lose his balance, and fall to the ground: (a) Was same negligence of plaintiff? (b) Was same the proximate cause of injuries to plaintiff, or any of them, alleged in plaintiff's petition?"

The jury answered both questions in the affirmative.

It is clear, we think, that the answers are not contradictory. Plaintiff in error alleged in paragraph 6 that defendant in error was guilty of contributory negligence, in that he carelessly and negligently attempted to step upon the moving timber, lost his balance, and fell to the ground. The jury, by its answer to special issue No. 5, found that the injury did not happen as alleged by plaintiff in error. This is conclusive of the issue of contributory negligence, and renders the answers to special issue No. 6 wholly immaterial. It is clear that the jury intended, by its answer to special issue No. 6, to find that, had the accident happened as alleged by plaintiff in error, defendant in error would have been guilty of contributory negligence proximately causing the injury.

The definition of "ordinarily incident," as defined by the court, when considered in connection with the entire charge, presents no error, and we think the honorable Court of Civil Appeals properly disposed of the assignment complaining of it.

It is recommended, therefore, that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals and of the district court be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

WALKER v. CHATTERTON et al.
(No. 131-3022.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A. June 23, 1920.)

1. Judgment \Leftrightarrow 906—Defense to original cause not available in action on judgment.

In an action on a judgment, the original cause of action is merged in the judgment, and, unless void, it is conclusive; the principles of estoppel attached to final adjudications being as operative and conclusive in an action on judgment as in other cases, so that no defense can be urged which existed anterior to the judgment, the effect of which would be to render the judgment voidable, or erroneous, but not void.

2. Judgment \Leftrightarrow 518—Want of jurisdiction over person of defendant may be set up in action on judgment as direct attack.

Although a judgment rendered against a surety recites appearance by the surety, in an action on such judgment want of jurisdiction over the person of the surety may be set up by him; such defense not constituting a collateral, but a direct, attack upon the judgment.

3. Judgment \Leftrightarrow 906—In action on judgment, defense may attack validity of judgment.

Since equitable defenses may be interposed to actions at law, a defendant in an action on a judgment may interpose by way of defense facts which would require a vacation of the judgment for want of jurisdiction, if he had resorted to a dependent action for such purpose, and such defense should be given the same force and effect as a cross-bill.

4. Judgment \Leftrightarrow 884—Intervention by judgment creditor in receivership proceedings held not to work merger of judgments.

Where a judgment was rendered against a surety on a note, and also against a railroad company on its notes given as collateral to secure the note, and the railroad company subsequently became insolvent and went into the hands of receivers, an intervention by the judgment creditor in the receivership proceedings did not affect the status of the judgment on the note, and did not result in a merger of the two suits or judgments.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Sixth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by G. A. Chatterton and others against L. E. Walker. Judgment for plaintiffs was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (192 S. W. 1085), and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded, as recommended by the Commission of Appeals.

Y. D. Harrison, of Marshall, for plaintiff in error.

F. H. Prendergast, of Marshall, for defendants in error.

SONFIELD, P. J. On August 12, 1904, in cause No. 11063, W. A. Chatterton v. Delaware Western Construction Company et al., in the district court of Harrison county, W. A. Chatterton, plaintiff, recovered judgment against defendants Delaware Western Construction Company, L. E. Walker, and Texas Southern Railway Company. The judgment against the two first-named defendants was based upon a note executed by the construction company and guaranteed by Walker; that against the railway company was upon certain construction notes issued by it to the Delaware Western Construction Company, and by that company delivered to Chatterton as collateral to secure the above-mentioned note.

Shortly after the rendition of this judgment, a proceeding was instituted in the same court, being cause No. 11076, United States & Mexico Trust Company v. Texas Southern Railway Company, and a receiver of the property of the railway company was appointed. Chatterton intervened in this proceeding, setting up the judgment recovered against the railway company in cause No. 11063, and in the final decree of foreclosure was awarded, in lieu of the construction notes, 15 of the bonds of the railway company; the decree providing that the judgment in cause No. 11063 as against the railway company should be set aside, and the construction notes canceled. Subsequent to the rendition of the judgment in cause No. 11063, both the railway and construction companies became insolvent, ceased to do business, and their respective charters were forfeited. No execution issued upon the judgment, and it was dormant at the time of the institution of this suit.

This is an action of debt on the judgment in cause No. 11063 by defendants in error, the heirs and representatives of W. A. Chatterton, against plaintiff in error, L. E. Walker, one of the defendants in that cause. Walker pleaded the invalidity of the judgment as to him, on the ground that he had never been served with process, and made no appearance in the case, and prayed its cancellation. He alleged partial payment of the note which was the basis of the judgment, and an agreement by Chatterton to accept in further payment thereof certain trust certificates; that Chatterton was entitled to certain bonds of the railway company as collateral to secure the note, such collateral, at the time of the institution of suit No. 11063, being worth $7,500, and Chatterton sold his interest therein for the sum of $3,300. The partial payment and alleged agreement sought to be interposed by way of defense by Walker, as presented in the assignments of error in his application for the writ, antedated rendition of the judgment sued upon.

Walker, by supplemental answer, pleaded that the suit in which the judgment herein sued upon was rendered was merged in the suit of United States & Mexico Trust Company v. Texas Southern Railway Company, No. 11076, and the judgment recovered by W. A. Chatterton therein against the railway company, in the final decree of foreclosure, was sold and transferred by Chatterton to F. M. Hubbel, and plaintiffs in this suit are not entitled to any interest in, and are not the legal owners and holders for value of, the judgment of W. A. Chatterton against the Texas Southern Railway Company, which judgment was the result of the merger of causes Nos. 11063 and 11076.

The cause was tried by the court. Walker adduced evidence to establish want of service upon and nonappearance by him in cause No. 11063, and to sustain the other defenses, which evidence the court declined to consider. The court concluded: (1) That the defenses which existed at the time the judgment was rendered could not be urged in this proceeding; (2) that the judgment reciting appearance of defendants by attorney, Walker was precluded from showing want of jurisdiction in the court rendering the judgment; this constituting a collateral attack upon the judgment. Judgment was rendered for defendants in error in the amount of the judgment sued upon, with interest, less $3,300, the sum received by Chatterton on the sale of the collateral. On appeal, the judgment was affirmed. 192 S. W. 1085.

[1] We think the trial court correct in its first conclusion. The judgment, unless void, is conclusive in a proceeding of this character. The original cause of action is merged in the judgment, and the principles of estoppel attached to final adjudications are as operative and conclusive in an action on the judgment as in other cases; hence no defenses can be urged which existed anterior to the judgment, the effect of which would be to render the judgment merely defective, erroneous, or voidable, but not void. Bullock v. Ballew, 9 Tex. 498; Hopkins v. Howard, 12 Tex. 7; Baxter v. Dear, 24 Tex. 17, 76 Am. Dec. 89; Bridge v. Samuelson, 73 Tex. 522, 11 S. W. 539.

[2] We are of opinion that the conclusion of the trial court, to the effect that the recital in the judgment of appearance was conclusive, and that defendant in an action on the judgment could not defend on the ground of want of jurisdiction over his person by the court rendering the judgment, is erroneous. The judgment is the foundation of the action. The proceeding is directly upon the judgment, and does not merely collaterally involve it. The defense does not attempt to defeat the operation of the judgment in a proceeding where some new right derived from or through the judgment is asserted. No new right is affected. The only right involved is the original right expressed by the judgment. It is sought to make the judgment the basis of a new recovery, proceeding from the original right acquired by the judgment.

The judgment is itself the cause of action. The defense is that the judgment, the cause of action, is an absolute nullity. The action being directly upon the judgment, the defense that the court had no power to render it does not constitute a collateral, but a direct, attack. It is well established in this state that a proceeding to vacate a judgment, or to enjoin its execution, is a direct attack upon it. Crawford v. McDonald, 88 Tex. 626, 33 S. W. 325. Defendant could have brought such a proceeding, and, upon allegation and proof of want of jurisdiction over his person, obtain relief against the judgment.

[3] Our courts administer both law and equity in the same action, and equitable defenses may be interposed to actions at law. This being true, we can perceive no good reason for denying to defendant in an action on a judgment the right to interpose, by way of defense, facts which would require a vacation of the judgment for want of jurisdiction, had he resorted to an independent action for such purpose. The defense asserted in the answer, with prayer for cancellation, should be given the same force and effect as a cross-bill. House & Co. v. Collins, 42 Tex. 486. It is now well settled by the courts in a majority of states, and by the Supreme Court of the United States, that in an action upon a foreign judgment the question of jurisdiction may be inquired into, and a want of jurisdiction over the person shown, notwithstanding the requirement in the Constitution of the United States that full faith and credit shall be given in every state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. No sound distinction can be made as to this defense in an action upon a judgment of another state and one upon a domestic judgment. If a conclusive presumption obtains in the one case, it should obtain in the other.

It is clear, upon principle, that the jurisdiction of a court entering a particular judgment may always be inquired into when such judgment is made the foundation of an action. In Norwood v. Cobb, 15 Tex. 500, the first case before our Supreme Court involving the availability of this defense to a foreign judgment, the court, speaking through Lipscomb, J., recognized that the defense was available in an action upon either a foreign or domestic judgment. In the course of the opinion it is said:

"The rule is believed to be universal, not only in cases arising upon judgments of a sister state, but by the common law, and acknowledged also to prevail in most civilized governments, that a want of jurisdiction in the court rendering the judgment invalidates the judgment; and it would be vain and useless to say to the party interested: You may impeach the judgment and show that the court awarding it had no jurisdiction—and deny to him the means of showing such want of jurisdiction."

And again:

"If a suit was brought on one of our own judgments, it cannot be questioned; but it would be competent for the defendant to go behind the judgment, and show a want of jurisdiction in the court that rendered the judgment, or to show that it was obtained by fraud. In effect, we so ruled in Gross v. McClaran, 8 Tex. 341, and in Jones v. Stuart, 9 Tex. 469."

The Court of Civil Appeals did not pass upon this question, holding that, if it be conceded that the defense could be urged, the record disclosing that the judgment was valid, it devolved upon Walker to show that he had a good defense to the suit; that the trial court heard all the evidence, and passed upon its sufficiency, or as ground for vacating the judgment, and the evidence is not such as required the rendition of a different judgment upon the merits; that, the facts being such as to warrant a finding of an insufficient defense, it must be assumed that the trial court was justified in rendering the judgment herein.

The defendant pleaded and adduced evidence to establish a partial payment of the note, the basis of the judgment sued upon, and an agreement that Chatterton would accept in further payment of the note certain collateral trust certificates; such partial payment and agreement antedating the judgment. The trial court declined to consider the evidence, holding it inadmissible for any purpose; the judgment being conclusive upon defendant. It cannot, therefore, be assumed that the trial court was justified in rendering judgment on the ground of a lack of defense to the original cause of action. If defendant's right to defend upon the ground of want of jurisdiction was conditioned upon allegations and proof of a meritorious defense, which we do not determine, we hold that such condition was complied with.

[4] There remains to be considered the contention of plaintiff in error that cause No. 11063 was merged in cause No. 11076, and, W. A. Chatterton having sold that judgment, defendants in error cannot recover herein. The cause of action in suit No. 11063 against the Delaware Western Construction Company and L. E. Walker was on a note; that against the Texas Southern Railway Company was on certain collateral given to secure the note. Though joined in one suit, the causes of action were separate and distinct. So, likewise, the judgment was not joint, but as against the Delaware Western Construction Company and L. E. Walker was on the note, and against the Texas Southern Railway Company on the collateral. The intervention by Chatterton in the receivership proceeding was solely upon the Judgment recovered against the Texas Southern Railway Company; and neither the intervention nor the decree of the court thereon in any wise affected the judgment on the note against the Delaware Western Construction Company and L. E. Walker. The intervention was proper, and resulted in no merger of the two suits or judgments. The proceeds of the sale of Chatterton's rights under the judgment were duly credited upon the judgment herein.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case, and the holding of the Commission on the question discussed.

THOMPKINS v. STATE. (No. 5874.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 23, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §1086(13)—Appeal dismissed, where record does not show "sentence."

The "sentence" is the final judgment in a criminal case, and is necessary to the jurisdiction of the Court of Criminal Appeals over the appeal in a felony case, so that the appeal must be dismissed where the record does not show the sentence.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Sentence.]

2. Criminal law §1092(7)—Bills of exception, not filed within the time granted, cannot be considered.

Bills of exception, taken on the trial of a criminal case, which were not filed within the 30 days granted by the court within which to file them, cannot be considered.

Appeal from District Court, Newton County; J. T. Adams, Judge.

Arthur Thompkins was convicted of theft, and he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This conviction was for theft; two years in the penitentiary being the punishment assessed.

[1, 2] The appeal must be dismissed, because the record does not contain a sentence. The sentence, being the final judgment, is necessary to attach the jurisdiction of this court in appeal felony cases. Collated cases may be found in Branch's P. C. p. 338; C. C. P. art. 853; Vernon's Ann. C. C. P. p. 851. But for this omission in the record the judgment should be affirmed. The two bills of exception taken on the trial are not filed in time granted for that purpose. Court adjourned March 20th. The court granted 30 days in which bills of exception might be filed. The bills were not filed until in early part of May, and could not therefore be considered.

The appeal is dismissed.

YOUNG v. STATE. (No. 5768.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 7, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, June 16, 1920.)

1. Ball §65—Recognizance in misdemeanor appeal must state punishment.

The recognizance for appeal in a case of misdemeanor required by Code Cr. Proc. 1911, art. 903, must state the punishment.

2. Ball §65—Recognizance stating punishment as fine of "one hundred" is insufficient.

A recognizance for appeal from conviction of a misdemeanor which states the punishment merely as a fine of "one hundred" is insufficient, and the appeal must be dismissed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

3. Criminal law §200(2)—Conviction of assault no bar to prosecution for unlawfully carrying a pistol.

A conviction for assault, under an indictment charging that defendant, while unlawfully carrying, or having about his person a pistol, did make an assault, etc., is not a bar to a subsequent prosecution for unlawfully carrying a pistol, for the two offenses are entirely distinct, and averments as to unlawfully carrying a pistol might be rejected as surplusage, particularly as Vernon's Ann. Pen. Code 1916, art. 1024a, expressly provides for punishment of an assault while unlawfully carrying a pistol.

Appeal from Aransas County Court; F. Stevens, Judge.

Henry Young was convicted of a misdemeanor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Gordon Gibson, of Rockport, for appellant. Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MORROW, J. By motion the Assistant Attorney General suggests that this court has not acquired jurisdiction to decide this case on its merits, for the reason that a recognizance in substantial compliance with the statute is wanting.

[1] On appeal to this court the statute (article 903, Code of Crim. Procedure) requires that the recognizance in a case of misdemeanor shall state the punishment; at least it has been construed in a uniform line of decisions to be incomplete if it fails to state the punishment. Watson v. State, 62

Goss v. State, 202 S. W. 956; Hayes v. State, 204 S. W. 330.

[2] In the instant case the judgment shows that the fine entered against appellant was $100. In the recognizance the fine is described as "one hundred." It is essential that the recognizance comply with the law; otherwise it would be inadequate to support a judgment forfeiting bail.

Under the facts and the law, we are constrained to sustain the motion of the state, and the appeal is accordingly dismissed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

[3] The order heretofore entered, dismissing the appeal, is set aside upon the motion of appellant, accompanied by a proper recognizance. On the merits of the case the conviction is for unlawfully carrying a pistol on and about his person. He was previously convicted of an assault in an indictment charging that he did "then and there, while unlawfully carrying on and about his person a pistol, with the said pistol in and upon Willie Bell make an assault." The occasion upon which the assault was made was the same as that upon which the present conviction is had. The contention is urged that the conviction for the assault bars this prosecution for unlawfully carrying a pistol. The indictment in the assault case charged the offense awkwardly, and included therein surplusage; that is, "while unlawfully carrying on and about his person a pistol" was not necessary. The indictment, however, we think, did not charge the appellant with the offense of unlawfully carrying a pistol, but in describing the occasion charges with unnecessary particularity that it was done while he was unlawfully carrying one. The offenses are different, punished with different penalties, and that of unlawfully carrying a pistol is not included in the statutory offense of an assault. An assault may be made with a pistol unlawfully carried. We have a statute expressly so declaring. See Vernon's Texas Crim. Statutes, vol. 1, art. 1024a.

The case of Nichols v. State, 37 Tex. Cr. R. 616, 40 S. W. 502, was one in which the prosecution was for unlawfully carrying a pistol. The plea of former conviction for rudely displaying a pistol was stricken out, and the ruling sustained. So in Burns v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 606, 38 S. W. 204, the propriety of a double conviction was recognized, where one was charged with unlawfully carrying a pistol, and also charged on the same occasion with carrying it within a prohibited distance of a polling place during an election. In Woodroe's Case, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 212, 96 S. W. 30, the ruling was that a plea of former acquittal of an assault with intent to murder was not available in bar of a prosecution same occasion. In Ford's Case, 36 S. W. 918, the plea of former conviction charged that the appellant had been "convicted of an assault with intent to murder, * * * and that the carrying of the pistol was a part of this transaction; that is, he had the pistol, and used it in said assault." This plea as a bar to the prosecution for carrying the pistol was rejected.

Our attention has been drawn to no authorities supporting the view of appellant. Those we have cited we regard as analogous, and in our judgment the reasons expressed in them, controlling their rendition, support the ruling of the trial court.

The former judgment dismissing the appeal is set aside, the motion for rehearing granted, and the judgment affirmed.

WALLACE v. STATE. (No. 5871.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 23, 1920.)

1. Criminal law \S 1116—Variances must be shown by record.

A conviction for forgery cannot be reversed for variance between the forged name as alleged in the indictment and the name signed to the instrument, where the record does not show what name was signed to the instrument.

2. Forgery \S 34(8) — Difference between "Bickerell" and "Bicknell" as forged name is fatal variance.

There is a fatal variance between an indictment charging forgery of the name "Bickerell" to a check and proof that the name forged was "Bicknell."

3. Criminal law \S 603(2)—Motion to continue must be sworn to.

A conviction will not be reversed for denial of a motion to continue or postpone which was not sworn to by accused or by any one for him.

4. Criminal law \S 1090(7)—Refusal to continue not reviewable without bill of exceptions.

The refusal to continue or postpone a criminal trial must be verified by bill of exceptions to authorize review of the ruling on appeal.

5. Criminal law \S 1090(8)—Error in admitting evidence must be shown by bill of exceptions.

A conviction cannot be reversed for error in admitting testimony where the record does not contain bill of exceptions to the rulings of the trial court, though the motion for new trial charged error in admitting testimony.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; W. S. Anderson, Judge.

W. H. Wallace was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

DAVIDSON, P. J. The jury allotted appellant two years in the penitentiary for forgery.

The indictment contains two counts, one for forgery, and the other for passing the alleged forged instrument.

[1, 2] Motion to quash on the ground that the check or draft was described as the act of "J. Bickerell," whereas the name of "J. W. Bicknell" is signed to the instrument, and that there is a variance between the allegation and the facts, was overruled. The indictment alleges the name of "Bickerell," and not "Bicknell." If there was developed on the trial that "Bicknell," and not "Bickerell," was the forged name, it is not made to so appear by the record. If such was the case, there would be a fatal variance. The facts have not been sent with the record; therefore we are unable to determine that question.

[3] There was a motion made to postpone or continue the case. This was not sworn to by appellant, or any one for him.

[4] Nor was exception reserved to the court's refusal to grant the application. Refusal to continue or postpone must be verified by bill of exceptions in order to authorize this court to review the ruling of the trial court.

[5] The record does not contain any bills of exception to rulings of the trial court. The motion for new trial states the court erred in admitting testimony, but this is not verified by bills of exception.

The record presents no reversible error.

The judgment is affirmed.

CLEMENTS v. STATE. (No. 5873.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 23, 1920.)

Criminal law §1097(4)—Statement of facts necessary to review admission of testimony.

In absence of a statement of facts, the appellate court cannot review the admission of testimony.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; W. W. Walling, Special Judge.

A. J. Clements was convicted of receiving and concealing stolen property, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LATTIMORE, J. In this case appellant was convicted of the offense of receiving and concealing stolen property, and his punish-mentary for a term of six years.

The record appears before us without either a bill of exceptions or statement of facts. We have examined the rather lengthy motion for new trial, but, inasmuch as the same complains only of errors in the admission of testimony, we are unable to determine the correctness of any of the contentions, in the absence of a statement of facts.

The indictment and charge of the court appear to be in conformity with the law, and no complaint is made of either.

The judgment of the trial court will be affirmed.

GARZA v. STATE. (No. 5878.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 23, 1920.)

Indictment and information §79—Information sufficient to charge carrying a "pistol," though spelling it "pistle."

A complaint and information which charged defendant with unlawfully carrying a "pistle" will be construed as charging defendant with unlawfully carrying a pistol, and the rule of bad spelling will apply, notwithstanding it was contended that the word "pistle" was an obsolete word meaning a letter.

Appeal from Brazoria County Court; C. D. Jessup, Judge.

Morris Garza was convicted of unlawfully carrying a pistol, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. C. Currier, of Alvin, and A. E. Master-son, of Angleton, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LATTIMORE, J. Appellant was convicted in the county court of Brazoria county of unlawfully carrying a pistol, and his punishment fixed at a fine of $100.

The complaint and information charge appellant with carrying a "pistle." The testimony shows that he carried a "pistol." Objection was made to this testimony on the ground of variance between the allegation and proof. It is urged that "pistle" is a word meaning a communication, and that the well-known rules of idem sonans and bad spelling do not apply. Appellant's authority for asserting that "pistle" is the name of a communication is the Century Dictionary. Reference thereto discloses that said work prints said word as obsolete and quotes Mr. Chaucer, who wrote in old English some 700 years since, as using it. We do not think that the fact that an early English poet, in the exercise of his license, should have used this word in that sense, would necessarily give it any standing at this time, or would likely mislead a Brazoria county Mexican, defended by a pair of able lawyers, into the mistake, in preparing for trial upon a charge of unlawfully carrying a "pistle," of seriously thinking himself charged with unlawfully carrying a communication. The word "pistle" does not seem to be given in any of our other dictionaries, to which this court has access, and we are inclined to hold the word, as used in the information and complaint herein, idem sonans with "pistol," and that the rule of bad spelling will apply and, further, that it is evident that the word "pistol" was intended. The evidence that appellant had a pistol on his person in a public place was uncontroverted.

The judgment will be affirmed.

RAMIREZ v. STATE. (No. 5864.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas.
June 16, 1920.)

Criminal law §1182—There being no error of record, conviction will not be disturbed.

Where there was no statement of facts, bills of exception, or motion for new trial, a conviction will not be disturbed on appeal; there being no error of record, and the indictment and charge being sufficient.

Appeal from District Court, El Paso County; W. D. Howe, Judge.

Ernesto Ramirez was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LATTIMORE, J. In this case, appellant was convicted in the district court of El Paso county, for the offense of burglary, and given a term of two years in the penitentiary.

The record is before us without any statement of facts, bills of exception, or motion for a new trial. We have examined the indictment, and find it to be in conformity with the requirements of the statute, and the charge of the court is the law applicable.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment will be affirmed.

RABE v. STATE. (No. 5770.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas.
June 16, 1920.)

1. Larceny §32(5)—Ownership of cattle should be alleged in person controlling pasture and not owner of pasture.

In a prosecution for theft of cattle from a pasture, ownership should be alleged to be in the person who had the care, control, and management of the pasture, and not in the owner of the pasture.

2. Animals §26(2)—Lien for pasturage given.

One taking cattle into a pasture of which he has control has a lien on the cattle for pasturage, although nothing is said concerning the price or who shall care for and control the cattle.

3. Animals §22—Duty in pasturing defined.

The law places the obligation on one taking cattle into his pasture to take care of them.

4. Criminal law §925½(3)—Discussion of accused's failure to testify by jurors required new trial.

Where a number of jurors were in favor of giving a two-year sentence until the fact that accused had not testified was called to their attention by jurors, and after the matter was discussed for some time, and because of such discussion, agreed to a four-year sentence, court erred in not granting a motion for a new trial.

Appeal from District Court, Angelina County; L. D. Guinn, Judge.

J. C. Rabe was convicted of cattle theft, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

See, also, 212 S. W. 502.

Mantooth & Collins, of Lufkin, and J. J. Collins, of Huntington, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. [1] This is the second appeal. The judgment was reversed on the former appeal because of a variance between the allegations of the indictment and the evidence. The indictment on the former appeal charged ownership in Dr. Stewart, the real owner of the alleged stolen cattle. The care, control, and management of the cattle was held, under the evidence, to be in Thomas. This constituted a variance, for which the judgment was reversed. A new indictment was presented, containing three counts, alleging, respectively, ownership in Dr. Stewart, Mr. Herrington, and Mr. Thomas. Each count charges separate ownership. The count charging ownership in Herrington finds no basis in the facts. He was not in possession of the cattle, or the pasture from which they were alleged to have been taken. Herrington owned the pasture, but, under a contract with Mr. Thomas, Thomas was in control, and exercised care, control, and management of the pasture. Thomas had been in control under his contract with Herrington for about two years. Herrington had a conversation with Dr. Stewart with reference to pasturing his cattle, in which he informed him of the fact that Thomas had control of the place, and any contract he made with Thomas would be satisfactory. Dr. Stewart called upon Thomas, who agreed to let him pasture his cattle. There seems to have been no stipulated price. Thomas was in control of the property—the pasture and fences.

Thomas' testimony upon this trial is in conflict with his testimony upon the former trial. Upon the former trial he stated:

"It is true that I testified before in this case 'that I owned a one-half interest in the pasture on that place this year. Dr. Stewart made arrangements with me this year to pasture some of his cattle in my pasture. He made a rental contract with me to rent my place. As to whether or not he was to pay me for the use of the pasture, we never set no price. He was to pay me a price. I left it to Mr. Herrington to set the price; that is, Mr. Josh Herrington. He did not pay the pasture rent in advance. I look after the place myself when I am able, such as keeping up the fences around the pasture, and the closing of gates, and things like that; but I have been sick some this year. There were a few cattle belonging to other people, besides Dr. Stewart. I saw to the cattle that were in the pasture; that is, I was supposed to keep them in there and to keep other people's out. I saw that the fences were kept up, and the gates closed, the best I could. I don't know just how far it is, but I think it is something like a mile Mr. Tulley lives from that pasture.' That is correct."

The above was his testimony upon the former trial. He further adds here: "What I testified to before was the truth, and it is true now." On this trial Thomas testified, referring to Dr. Stewart:

"I believe it was a couple of days that he came to see me before the cattle were put in the pasture; anyway he came to see me just before the cattle were put in there. When he put the stock, or when he made arrangements to put the stock, in the pasture, he did not put the stock in my control, for me to manage and look after. I did not have any authority, management, or control whatever over the cattle. I had no instructions at all with reference to the cattle. We had no agreement about the fences, as to who was to keep them up; me and Dr. Stewart did that. As to who kept the gate closed, and looked after things of that kind, the children did at that time; I wasn't able; I was sick. Dr. Stewart did not mention to me anything about such things as looking after the gate, or taking care of the cattle, whatever. If he asked me to exercise any sort of management or control about those cattle, I don't remember it. I am the one that reported that some of the cattle were gone."

[2, 3] The evidence shows that Dr. Stewart was not about the pasture, and exercised no management over it, or the cattle, further than to place them in the pasture controlled by Thomas. This he did through his employed hands. The case was decided before upon the theory that Thomas had a lien on the property for their pasturage, and that therefore he was in possession of the cattle as against the true owner, Stewart. This conclusion was reached by virtue of a lien fixed under such circumstances by the terms of the civil statutes. It was a legal lien, and would be operative in the absence of a contract to the contrary. These parties could have made any contract with reference to it they saw proper to do. The evidence does not so show. In fact, it excludes the idea of such contract. Had the owner, Dr. Stewart, taken the cattle from the pasture with the fraudulent purpose of defeating the lien legally resting upon the cattle, he would have been subject to prosecution under the statute. See P. C. art. 1335; Branch's Ann. Crim. Stats. p. 1353. There would be no question in law or in fact that Thomas would be entitled to the possession of the cattle, after being placed in his pasture, as against Dr. Stewart, until the pasturage had been satisfactorily arranged. This would place Thomas in possession of the property under the facts of this case. We are still of opinion that ownership should have been alleged in Thomas, and not in Stewart. The statement by Thomas that there was nothing mentioned between him and Stewart that he (Thomas) was to have control and management of the cattle, and kindred testimony, would not legally change this proposition. The law places the obligation upon him to take care of the cattle when he assumed the burden of their pasturage, and gave him a lien for pasturage. This matter was presented in various ways by appellant in the trial court. We have stated the matters generally.

Appellant requested the court to require the state to elect upon which count the prosecution would be had at the time the trial began. When the testimony was in, he again urged the election under which count the conviction would be asked. These were overruled. The court instructed the jury that they could convict under either count, submitting all three of them to the jury. Exception was properly and timely reserved to this action of the court. General ownership could have been alleged in Dr. Stewart as the real owner, and possession and management in Thomas. This was pointed out in the former appeal; not that it was necessary to so allege, but if it was thought proper to allege ownership in the real owner under the facts of this case, it should have been alleged in that manner. We are still of opinion that ownership should have been alleged in Thomas. He became the temporary owner of the property, as against even the real owner under the circumstances and the evidence depicted in this record. The authorities were sufficiently collated in the opinion on the former appeal.

[4] Misconduct of the jury in discussing the failure of appellant to testify was presented on motion for new trial. Several jurors testified to that effect. Two or three of the jurors testified that, if it occurred, they did not hear it. Several jurors testified they were for the minimum punishment of two years until this matter was discussed; that they then changed their view, and voted for the maximum of four years, which was the verdict returned by the jury. The details of the testimony we deem unnecessary to mention. There are a great number of authorities, cited by appellant in his brief, which we think are in point. Wilson v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 365, 46 S. W. 251; Tate v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 261, 42 S. W. 595; Mizell v. State, 81 Tex. Cr. R. 241, 197 S. W. 300; Boozar v. State, 198 S. W. 295; Walling v. State, 59 Tex. Cr. R. 279, 128 S. W. 624. And for a great number of other cases see Branch's Ann. P. C. p. 292. Some of the jurors gave as a reason for desiring to fix the punishment at two years that appellant was getting to be an elderly man, and they thought two years would be a sufficient time for his reformation, and to ascertain the fact that he must not repeat this character of transaction; but, after the matter was discussed of his failure to testify, they changed their verdict and went to four years. It is sufficient, with reference to the remarks used, to copy the following from the affidavit of Perry:

"After the jury had retired, I was in favor of giving him a conviction for only two years, as he is now an old man, and there being no proof of other crimes against him, I felt that if we gave him a two-year sentence that probably by the time he served that out he would be taught a sufficient lesson to not do a thing like that again. Some of the others, also, were in favor of a two-year term; but some of the older men spoke up against this, and, as an argument against giving him a two-year term, said that he ought to have the limit of four years; that he did not even get on the stand and testify, or attempt to explain and tell how it happened, and that he did not even get on the stand and offer any excuse for his conduct, or give the jury any information as to why he stole the cattle, and that, if he had not been guilty, he would have certainly got on the stand and denied it."

There are affidavits of other jurors substantially to the same effect. The evidence on this issue is in substantial compliance with the above.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

SMILEY v. STATE. (No. 5861.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 23, 1920.)

1. Robbery §13—Intent essential to conviction of assault with intent to rob.

To sustain conviction of assault with intent to rob, the evidence must show a specific intent to rob.

2. Criminal law §784(1)—Refusal to instruct as to circumstantial evidence held error.

In prosecution for assault with intent to rob, defended on the ground of an alibi, refusal to instruct on circumstantial evidence held error under the evidence.

3. Criminal law §404(2) — Exhibition of wounds not error, in prosecution for assault with intent to rob, under indictment charging aggravated assault.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to rob, where the indictment included a charge on aggravated assault, the exhibition to the jury of the wounds received by the prosecuting witness in the encounter held not reversible error, since the character of the wounds received might have enabled the jury to decide the issue of aggravated assault.

4. Robbery §27(5)—In prosecution for assault with intent to rob, aggravated assault should be submitted, where indictment includes such charge.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to rob, where the indictment included a charge on aggravated assault, the issue of aggravated assault should be submitted to the jury.

Appeal from District Court, Wichita County; H. F. Weldon, Judge.

L. R. Smiley was convicted of assault with intent to rob, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Mathis & Caldwell, of Wichita Falls, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MORROW, J. The appellant was convicted of an assault with intent to rob Harry M. Reed. It appears that, as Reed was approaching his home and about to enter his gate, he was attacked by three men. As he described the matter, they came to him, and the man in the middle said, "Stick them up." Reed replied, "What is your idea?" and he said, "Stick them up," when Reed replied, "Put that thing up; you are going to hurt yourself." Quoting:

"Just then the fellow on the left struck me with his gun, hit me on the jaw, and I hit the fellow on the right, and knocked him about 10 feet, and swung at the fellow on the left, knocking him off the curbing, and then the one on the right hit me and knocked me to my knees; then the man in the middle came at me, and from that time on it was a free-for-all. I began to holler, and the Lowry boys came running out of their home, and the three fellows beat it. I engaged in the difficulty, and observed the appearance of the man, and identify the defendant as the one in the middle, and he was engaged in the difficulty."

Alibi was the defense interposed by the appellant, and he urges that a charge on circumstantial evidence should, upon his request, have been given to the jury. The identity of the assailant in a prosecution for assault frequently depends upon circumstances, and this is true in some instances, although the injured party may claim on the trial to identify the accused; and experience has demonstrated that the mere conclusion of the party injured touching the identity of the offender, where there is no previous acquaintance, no peculiarities noticed, and the opportunity for observation limited, is often unreliable. Wills on Circumstantial Evidence, p. —; Burrill on Circumstantial Evidence, p. 606. In this case, Reed had no acquaintance with the appellant. He states upon cross-examination that in his identification on the trial there was a possibility, though not a probability, of mistake. The assault was at night, though the moon was shining. The observation of the assaulting parties was but momentary, and necessarily under excitement. Reed afterwards saw in a business house the appellant, who, according to the judgment of Reed, met the description that he held in his mind of one of the assailants. He gave no details, no peculiarities of stature, personal appearance, gait, habit, traits, tone of voice, nor does he describe any article in the possession or pertaining to the clothing of his assailant. His identification is necessarily but the inference which he draws from the similarity of appearance of one of the men who assaulted him and the appellant.

[1] To sustain the conviction of assault with intent to rob, it was essential that the evidence show a specific intent to rob. The proof describing the assault would undoubtedly sustain a conviction of aggravated assault and might if the indictment was so framed, sustain one for assault with intent to murder; this, of course, predicated upon there being sufficient proof of identity. There are cases in which facts somewhat similar have been held sufficient to show that the assault was with the specific intent to rob. Long v. State, 47 Tex. Cr. R. 296, 83 S. W. 384. In that case, however, the assailant was identified with certainty, and, presenting a gun, demanded that the injured party stop and "throw up your hands!" and, upon the party assailed running, a shot was fired upon him. Other facts, according to the opinion if the court, eliminated any other intent than that to rob. The case before us is not so plain. The command was to "Stick them up." This probably meant, "Throw up your hands." The attack took place so near the home of Reed that assistance was in easy call, and reached him during the mêlée. He received injuries which, as above stated, might have indicated that the intent of the parties was to murder him, or to injure him. They made no demand upon him for his property. The facts are somewhat similar to those in the case of Sanders v. State, 53

Tex. Cr. R. 613, 111 S. W. 157, in which it was held the intent was not sufficiently established.

[2] We are not prepared to hold that the evidence in the instant case was not sufficient to sustain conviction, but are of the opinion that in the matter of identity and specific intent to rob the evidence is left in a condition to render it necessary that the jury determine by inference from facts rather than from direct testimony that the appellant is guilty, and we think the appellant's request that the jury be instructed upon the law of circumstantial evidence should have been granted.

[3, 4] Complaint is made of the exhibition of the wounds received by Reed in the encounter. As the matter is presented, we think that this would not justify a reversal of the case, for the reason that the indictment included a charge on aggravated assault, and the character of wounds received might have enabled the jury to decide that issue, if it had been submitted to them, and in this connection we suggest that upon another trial it should be submitted.

For the reasons pointed out, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

TEXAS & P. RY. CO. et al. v. McDOWELL et al. (No. 576.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Beaumont.
May 25, 1920.)

1. Carriers ⇐215(1)—Carrier held not liable for negligence in having caused castration of bulls shipped.

A railway company was not liable to a shipper of cattle for negligence in causing bulls in a shipment to be castrated, where the carrier, intending to comply with quarantine regulations, refused to receive the bulls for shipment unless they were given the tubercular test or castrated, and the shippers exercised their choice and themselves castrated the bulls.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1175(1)—On reversal judgment will be rendered where no different result probable on new trial.

Where judgment is reversed, and it appears that the case was fully developed and that no different result would probably be reached by remanding, judgment will be rendered for appellant.

Appeal from District Court, Shelby County; Chas. L. Brachfield, Judge.

Suit by H. L. McDowell and another against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs against the named defendant, and it appeals. Reversed and rendered.

Young & Stinchcomb, of Longview, and E. H. Carter, of Center, for appellant.

Sanders & Sanders and J. P. Anderson, all of Center, for appellees.

HIGHTOWER, C. J. This was a suit by the appellees, H. L. McDowell and J. E. Burton, filed in the district court of Shelby county against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company and its receivers, and also against the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railroad Company; the purpose of the suit being to recover damages to a shipment of cattle from Waldo, Ark., to Timpson, Tex. The shipment consisted of about 286 head of cattle, and among them were 137 head of bull yearlings between one and two years of age. The appellees, McDowell and Burton, resided at Timpson, in Shelby county, Tex., and were engaged in the dairy business at that place, and also in buying and selling cattle generally. About the 28th day of March, 1916, they went to Waldo, Ark., and purchased the 286 head of cattle which constituted the shipment in question, and made an effort to make a through shipment of the cattle from Waldo, Ark., to Timpson, Tex., but the Cotton Belt Railroad Company at Waldo refused and declined to accept the cattle for through shipment to Timpson, Tex., but would only receive them for shipment as far as Texarkana. Thereupon appellees shipped the cattle down to Texarkana, Tex., and from there shipped them over the road of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company and its connecting carrier, the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railroad Company, to Timpson, Tex. The cattle reached Texarkana from Waldo about 8 o'clock in the morning of March 29, 1916, and it was the purpose of appellees to ship them out of Texarkana direct to Timpson as soon as arrangements could be made for cars at Texarkana for that purpose. Arrangements were made some time in the afternoon of March 29, 1916, the agent of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company agreeing with appellees to furnish the cars so that the shipment might move from Texarkana that night; but when said agent ascertained, which he did before the cattle were received or loaded, that there were a number of bulls in the shipment, he told appellees that on account of quarantine regulations he would have to decline to receive the shipment with the bulls in it, and referred appellees to Mr. James, who was the live stock agent of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company at Texarkana.

Appellees then went to Mr. James, as agent of the Texas & Pacific Railway Company at that point, and took the matter up with him, and Mr. James explained to them that because of quarantine regulations which he had been advised were in effect his road was prohibited from accepting a shipment of bulls into Texas unless the shipment was accompanied by a health certificate, in accordance with the rules and regulations of the live stock sanitary commission of the state of Texas. Thereupon Mr. James and appellees sought Dr. Hearn, who was a veterinarian at Texarkana, and who was registered as such with the live stock sanitary commission of Texas, and who represented both the state of Arkansas and the state of Texas in the official capacity of inspector of live stock for interstate shipment. It was explained to Dr. Hearn that appellees desired to ship said cattle to Timpson, Tex., and it was also explained by appellees that the cattle were not intended for dairy or breeding purposes or for exhibition in the state of Texas, but that appellees intended to put them on the range and resell them, etc. Dr. Hearn explained to appellees, in the presence of Mr. James, that he could not permit the shipment of the bulls into Texas unless they were accompanied by a health certificate showing that they had been tested for tuberculosis within 60 days prior thereto, and when it was admitted by appellees that they had no such certificate Dr. Hearn stated that the shipment of the bulls would not be permitted unless they were given a tubercular test. At that point Mr. James, in his capacity as live stock agent for the Texas & Pacific Railway Company, told appellees that his road could not receive the bulls for shipment until they were given the tubercular test, or castrated. Thereupon the Texas & Pacific Railway Company's agent declined to issue a bill of lading for the shipment of cattle, and appellees consulted further with Dr. Hearn and asked him if the shipment of the bulls would be permitted if they were castrated, and Dr. Hearn told him "Yes," and appellees asked him what the cost would be of castrating the bulls and were advised that it would be 50 cents per head. They then asked him if they might not do the work themselves, and Dr. Hearn stated that they might, and that no charge on his part would be made therefor. Appellees then castrated 137 head of these young bulls, and the shipment of the 286 head moved from Texarkana on the following day, April 30, 1916, somewhere in the forenoon.

For their cause of action appellees alleged, substantially, that the Texas & Pacific Railway Company was guilty of negligence or negligently caused the castration of these young bulls, and that 17 head of them were so weakened by the operation that they were knocked down and trampled upon while en route to Timpson, and that 17 head of them died; that they were of the value each of $20. Appellees also alleged that on account of negligence on the part of both railroad companies in roughly handling the cars in which they were loaded 7 head of the cows were so injured that they died, and that these cows were of the value of $30 each. They also alleged, substantially, that on account of negligence on the part of both railroads in roughly handling the cars 145 head of cattle, not including the bulls, were damaged to the extent of $3 per head. They sued for this total amount of damages, and also other items unnecessary here to mention.

The railroad companies and receivers answered by general demurrer and several special exceptions, general denial, and special pleas. They also specially set up the shipping contract, which, among other things, provides: (1) That the shipper assumed all risk of injury to or loss of stock because of their being wild, unruly, weak, or any inherent vices or defects, etc.; (2) that the carrier should not be liable for any delay or damage sustained by the stock, or any expense incurred by the shipper by reason of any enforcement or attempted enforcement by government officers of quarantine regulations, either federal, state, county, or municipal, whether such officers should act lawfully or unlawfully, or by reason of the existence of any quarantine regulations or laws, federal, state, county, or municipal. They also alleged that the castration of the bulls was made in compliance with the laws of the state of Texas, the laws of the state of Arkansas, and the laws of the United States, and that defendants and their agents were not guilty of any negligence in acting as they did. They also alleged that the cattle were wild, unruly, weak, and had inherent vices and defects, and that the shippers and laborers acting under them were guilty of contributory negligence, etc.

Appellees filed a supplemental petition in which the matters of fact alleged by the defendants were denied, etc. The trial was with the jury and their verdict consisted of answers to special issues, and judgment was rendered thereon in favor of appellees against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company in the sum of $500, but there was no recovery as against the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railroad Company. Motion for new trial was made by Texas & Pacific Railway Company, and was overruled, and that company alone has appealed.

[1] There are several assignments of error found in appellant's brief, but we shall not take them up in their numerical order, nor mention them specifically, because in the view we take of the case it is only necessary to dispose of that assignment which substantially complains that upon the undisputed facts appellant was not guilty of any negligence in causing, and in fact did not cause, appellees' bulls to be castrated, as claimed, and that since the jury expressly found in answer to special issues that there was no other negligence on the part of appellant, as charged by appellees, the verdict and judgment should have been in favor of appellant. This is the contention of appellant substantially.

We have given the case careful consideration, and have reached the conclusion that appellant's contention is correct, and that the judgment should be reversed and here rendered in favor of appellant. As we find the evidence in this record, there is practically no contradiction or dispute as to the facts touching this shipment of cattle, and they are, substantially, as follows:

In addition to what has been above stated, defendants below introduced a certified copy of the proclamation of the Governor of Texas, issued May 23, 1915, having reference to the shipment of live stock into the state of Texas, by which was given full power and authority to the live stock sanitary commission of the state of Texas to make rules and regulations pertaining to the admission of live stock into the state, and further providing that the live stock sanitary commission of Texas should have authority to make any rule or regulation to prevent live stock infected with tuberculosis from entering the state. There was also introduced by defendants a rule of the live stock sanitary commission of this state, of date January 21, 1916, which became effective February 1, 1916, providing as follows:

"Cattle for dairy and breeding purposes, over six months old, and cattle for exhibition within the state, must be accompanied by a health certificate, including the tubercular test, such certificate to show that the tubercular test was given within at least sixty days prior to the time the cattle entered the state."

It was then shown that the name of Dr. J. L. Hearn, Texarkana, Tex., was officially registered with the live stock sanitary commission of Texas. It was then shown by Dr. Hearn that he had no connection whatever with any railroad company, but, as above stated, was inspector of live stock for interstate shipment for both the state of Texas and the state of Arkansas, and that it was his duty to inspect live stock and pass upon its admission in the interest of the state. In this connection he said:

"It was my duty to inspect live stock that were to be transported into the state of Texas by railway companies, and ascertain whether or not they should be admitted. If I found a shipment of live stock from another state in the state of Texas, and there was no certificate showing that they had been tested for tuberculosis, and they were coming into the state for breeding or dairy purposes, it was my duty to give them the tubercular test.

"I am acquainted with the rule made by the live stock sanitary commission of Texas that went into effect February 1, 1916, with reference to cattle being admitted into Texas. I was in Ft. Worth attending the state veterinary medical association, and at the live stock sanitary commission office about March 15, 1916, and while there I asked for a ruling on live stock coming into Texas. I was in Ft. Worth about March 15, 1916. I know Mr. James, the foreman of the stock yards of the Iron Moun-sation with Mr. James after I returned from Ft. Worth and before this matter came up on March 30th. I told him to prohibit all bulls from coming into the state of Texas without the tubercular test."

It was further shown by this witness, on cross-examination, that he stopped the shipment of the bulls in question because he was instructed by the chairman of the live stock sanitary commission of Texas to that effect.

Without undertaking to quote the testimony of either of the appellees in detail, it will suffice to say that they testified, substantially, that they never even considered whether they would have the bulls in this shipment of cattle tested for tuberculosis when they were informed by Dr. Hearn that such would be necessary before the shipment could pass, but they further testified that they were given their choice in that matter, that is to say, they were permitted to choose whether they would have the bulls given the tubercular test or castrated, and that they chose the latter. Speaking with reference to appellant's agent at Texarkana, Mr. Burton stated:

"He let us take our choice and we castrated them. We did not consider the matter of having them tested for tuberculosis at all."

It was further shown by the appellees themselves that the cost of giving the tubercular test, as stated to them by Dr. Hearn, would have been 50 cents a head, but, as shown by Burton's statement above, they did not consider testing the cattle at all.

Now, as shown above, the jury acquitted appellant of any negligence in handling the shipment of cattle in question, but found that appellant caused the castration of the bulls, and that in doing so appellant was guilty of negligence. We have concluded that it cannot be said that appellant caused the castration of these bulls. Upon the whole evidence, the material parts of which we have stated, it is manifest that appellant's agent at Texarkana was acting in perfect good faith in trying to comply with the quarantine regulations, as he understood them, relative to the shipment of cattle into Texas, and that the railway company had no interest whatever in insisting upon the castration of these bulls, other than to comply with the quarantine regulations, as appellant's agent understood them to be; and, without deciding whether the proof of what the rules and regulations of the live stock sanitary commission of Texas were was of such character as to show that appellant acted in strict compliance with such rules in declining to receive the shipment of the bulls, we have concluded that it cannot be held that appellant's agent caused these bulls to be castrated. It is true that appellant's agent, acting in obedience to instructions of Dr. J. L. Hearn, refused to retubercular test or castrated, but it is also too clear for argument that appellees had their choice as between the tubercular test and castration, and no sufficient reason is shown why the bulls might not have been given the tubercular test and all damages here claimed to them prevented.

[2] We have been cited to no authority by appellees which we think supports their contention that appellant's refusal to receive and ship the bulls without the tubercular test or castration was the cause of the damage to appellees in this case, and, since upon the express findings of the jury no other damage to the shipment of cattle could be chargeable against appellant, there was no basis for a judgment against appellant in this case for any amount; and since it appears that the case was fully developed, and that no different result would probably be raised by remanding the cause, the judgment of the trial court will be reversed and here rendered in favor of appellant.

BOST v. BIGGERS BROS. et al. (No. 1672.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo. June 23, 1920.)

1. Mines and minerals \S 78(1)—Provision for development, not satisfied by efforts to secure third parties to do so.

Where a contract for the lease of oil lands expressly binds lessee to begin actual development of the oil property, such obligation is not discharged by making reasonable efforts to secure third parties to develop the land.

2. Mines and minerals \S 58—Consideration of $1 for oil lease covering 2,000 acres held not inadequate.

One dollar a year, paid upon the execution and delivery of an oil lease covering 2,000 acres, held not so inadequate a consideration as to suggest fraud.

3. Appeal and error \S 527(1)—Refusal to submit special issues must be presented by bill of exceptions.

Refusal to submit special issues in a suit to cancel an oil lease cannot be reviewed by the Appellate Court without a bill of exceptions under Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, arts. 2061, 2062, art. 2058, being controlling, and the mere fact that the court's indorsement upon objections and exceptions recites that a bill was allowed is insufficient.

4. Exceptions, bill of \S 7—Exceptions to refusal to submit special issue held too general to be considered.

A bill of exceptions, based on refusal to submit special issue, stating that "the charge is incomplete and fails to submit to the jury material issues raised by the pleading and testimony and covered by issues requested on the part of" appellant, is too general to be considered.

5. Mines and minerals \Leftrightarrow 78(7) — Lessee's financial inability to develop oil property held properly excluded.

In a suit to cancel an oil lease, where plaintiff contended that part of the consideration consisted of actual development of the land by lessee, it was not error to exclude testimony that the lessee was not financially able to put down a well on the land, where it appeared that plaintiff fully understood lessee's financial inability at the time of the execution of the lease.

6. Mines and minerals \Leftrightarrow 78(7)—Refusal to develop held not to avoid lease containing alternative rental provision.

Where an oil lease provides for the sinking of a well by lessee within a stated time, and gives lessee the alternative of paying a stated rental annually, refusal on the part of lessee to develop does not, as a matter of law, avoid the contract.

Appeal from District Court, Carson County; W. R. Ewing, Judge.

Suit by John Q. Bost against Biggers Bros. and others. Decree for respondents, and complainant appeals. Affirmed.

S. E. Fish and C. E. Gustavus, both of Amarillo, for appellant.

F. P. Works, of Amarillo, for appellees.

HALL, J. The motion has called to our attention some matters shown by the record which we overlooked, and some inaccuracies in the statement of the rules of law governing cases of this character, and in order to correct these the cause will be again fully considered and the original opinion withdrawn. The object of this suit is to cancel an oil and gas lease executed by appellant to appellee, upon certain land situated in Hutchinson and Carson counties. With slight immaterial changes the lease is what is commonly known as "Producers Form No. 88." The appellant alleged, in substance, that he was about 60 years of age when the lease was executed, was feeble in mind and body, is and has been a farmer and laborer all of his life, and wholly unacquainted with and unaccustomed to transacting business matters of complicated character. That the lands described are located in a section of country pronounced by experts as having indications of oil and gas and highly promising territory for development of these minerals; that at the time of the execution of the lease and ever since said lands have a high rental value, and that the same are constantly and rapidly advancing in price; that on March 14, 1917, the defendants, with knowledge of said facts, secured an oil and gas lease from him, by pretending and representing that they would develop his lands, and that plaintiff would realize large profits therefrom in the way of royalty, expressly representing and stating that a well would be put down and the said lands developed within a short time. He further alleges that they stated that such lease would be only for 1 year, unless a well was put down within that time, and, having confidence in their statements and representations, he executed said lease for a consideration of $1; that the lease as executed is for a period of 5 years, containing a provision for renewal thereof during said period of time, upon the payment of $1 every 12 months; that the lease is void, is a cloud upon plaintiff's title, and should be canceled for the following reasons:

"(a) The said contract of lease is without consideration, the said sum of $1 therein specified being only nominal, and bearing no relation to the real lease value of said lands.

"(b) Said contract is unilateral, imposing no duties or obligations whatever upon the defendants, and containing no requirement for putting down a well or developing said land in any manner.

"(c) Said contract is unreasonable and unconscionable, in that it grants defendants the right to hold and speculate upon the lease value of plaintiff's land, which is now from $5 to $10 per acre, without the payment to plaintiff of anything except $1 each 12 months for annual renewal thereof.

"(d) Before signing and executing same said contract was read to plaintiff by one of the defendants, who falsely and fraudulently read the same as expiring on March 14, 1918, unless renewed on or before said date, which said lease as now recorded fixes the expiration date as March 14, 1919. That said lease was either falsely read to him or had been changed since its execution. That such change was made either through fraud, accident, or mistake, and plaintiff is entitled to have same reformed so as to show the expiration date to be March 14, 1918. That defendants did not renew said lease by depositing the $1 under the terms of the contract until the time had expired; such deposit being made March 16, 1918, when the contract, according to its true terms, expired March 14, 1918.

"(e) That plaintiff did not understand and was incapable of understanding the purported terms of the lease, and did not know or understand that he was granting to defendants the full leasehold estate for a period of 5 years for a consideration of $1 per year, without any obligation on the part of appellees to put down a well or make any development; otherwise he would not have executed the same.

"(f) That the defendants have not the means and financial ability to develop land, and have never intended to do so, but fraudulently pretended that they would develop said land for the sole and only purpose of procuring such lease.

"(g) That a reasonable time has transpired for developing and testing said lands, and the defendants have no intention of developing the

"(h) That plaintiff has requested and demanded a release and cancellation of the lease, and has refused to accept the last deposit of $1, placed to his credit in the bank.

"(i) Plaintiff has heretofore tendered and now here tenders to defendant the $1 originally paid to him."

The substance of defendant's amended answer, upon which the case was tried, in addition to the general demurrer, general denial, and setting out practically the material terms of the contract, is an allegation of the payment and deposit of the $1 consideration, in accordance with its terms. They further allege, in substance, that although not expressed in writing, it was in fact understood and agreed between the parties that the lessees should and would use their best efforts to secure development of said lands within the time limited by the contract; that prior to the contract there had been no development whatever attempted near the premises, and that the territory was what is known as strictly "wildcat territory," that the lessees did in good faith and with all possible diligence strive to make arrangements for exploration and development of the land in connection with other lands held by them under lease in that neighborhood, which they had secured for a like purpose; that in their efforts to secure development, they conveyed their interest in other leases in that neighborhood to prospective drillers; that on account of war conditions existing since the 6th day of April, 1917, and within less than a month after the execution of the lease, which conditions have existed to the present with but slight change, they have been unable to secure the means, machinery, and material with which to prosecute development; that Millie Biggers and Zack Biggers, two of the defendants herein, were both within the draft age; that Zack Biggers entered the army about the 17th day of June, 1917, and has been in the service continually ever since; the said M. W. Biggers being excused because of having certain dependent relations to support; that plaintiff is estopped from claiming that the lease contract was for only 1 year, and has waived any additional payment and the right to forfeit the same on account of defendant's failure to make the second payment promptly, in this, that during the summer of 1918, and the first year, plaintiff not only permitted, but encouraged the lessees in their further efforts to develop the land and in incurring further expense looking to the development of said land, and knowingly permitted them to assign the leasehold interest held by them in other lands to prospective drillers, which said leaseholds so conveyed were of the reasonable value of about $500; that by such act on the part of plaintiff, with the knowledge and confirmed said lease contract, and waived any of the alleged rights to forfeit the same; that on or about the 31st day of August, 1918, while their lease was in full force and effect, and while they, with the knowledge and approval of plaintiff, were making all possible effort to secure development, plaintiff executed to third parties a subsequent lease upon the same lands, which said lease was immediately recorded in both Carson and Hutchinson counties, whereby a cloud was cast upon the leasehold interest of defendants, and their further progress toward development was materially interfered with and rendered practically impossible; that having by his own act prevented successful development, plaintiff cannot now be heard to complain of defendant's default. The court submitted the cause to the jury upon three special issues, which, with the answers, are as follows:

"(1) Was or not the provisions of the lease contract involved herein as to the time the first renewal thereof might be had misread or misstated by defendant Less Whittaker, to plaintiff as to same being 1 year instead of 2 years?" Answer: "No."

"(2) If you answer the foregoing question in the affirmative, then state whether or not the plaintiff was deceived thereby and was thereby induced to sign said contract." Answer: "No."

"(3) Was the plaintiff capable and capacitated to read and understand the lease contract in question at the time of its execution?" Answer: "Yes."

The court further submitted a special issue, inquiring whether or not more rapid exploration and development of the land was prevented by war regulations, the violation of which would have involved punishment of the offender by the government. Upon this issue the jury disagreed and failed to return an answer. Judgment was entered for appellees upon the verdict so returned.

[1] The lease in this case, under the jury's findings, provides that in lieu of development after the first 2 years the lessee shall pay $1 annual rental for the whole tract of land, consisting of about 2,000 acres, during the remainder of the term. The contract does not require the payment of any sum by the lessees in the event they should desire to surrender the lease before the expiration of the 5-year time; neither does it expressly require the lessees to begin development at any time. There is no evidence in the record showing that at the time the lease was procured the land had any value as oil or gas producing property, although it is shown that at the time of the trial, 2½ years later, it had a value of $3 to $6 per acre. The testimony of lessee tended to show they had made reasonable efforts to secure third parties to develop the land, but this would not discharge an obligation on their part to begin actual development if the contract expressly bound them to do so.

[2] Appellant insists that the $1 consideration paid at the time of the execution and delivery of the lease was in fact no consideration, being nominal, and is not a sufficient and adequate consideration to support the lease. This court has recently considered this question in several cases, and in McKay v. Tally et ux., 220 S. W. 167, and Nolan et ux. v. Young, 220 S. W. 154, announced the conclusion that $1 was a sufficient consideration to support an option contract of this character. We cannot say from the record that the consideration originally paid or to be paid for the renewal of the lease annually is so inadequate as to suggest fraud.

Appellant requested the submission of three special issues, the first being:

"Is the lease contract in question, in its terms and provisions as to plaintiff, unreasonable and unconscionable?"

"(2) Did the defendant, prior to the execution of the written lease contract, represent and lead the plaintiff to believe that they would start putting down an oil or gas well within 12 months after date of the lease contract?"

"(3) Was the sum of $1, stipulated in the lease contract in question, a valuable consideration as distinguished from a nominal consideration?"

These special issues were refused by the court. It appears from the record that appellant filed objections and exceptions to the court's charge, the fourth subdivision being as follows:

"The charge is incomplete, and fails to submit to the jury material issues raised by the pleading and testimony and covered by issues requested on the part of plaintiff."

The court's indorsement upon the objections and exceptions shows that it was duly presented to opposing counsel and the trial court, that the exceptions were overruled, and that plaintiff, in open court, excepted to the ruling, and recites:

"And plaintiff is hereby allowed this as his bill of exception, to said action of the court."

[3] As we understand the practice, this ruling of the court, if error, is not properly before us for review. Article 1974 (as amended by Acts Thirty-Fifth Leg. p. 389), V. S. C. S., and Supplement, relate to charges and special instructions. The practice with reference to the submission of special issues is governed by V. S. C. S., arts. 1984a, 1985. A special issue which has been requested and refused by the court is not a part of the record on appeal in the sense that the action of the court must be reviewed by the appellate court without a bill of exceptions under V. S. C. S. arts. 2061, 2062. In such case article 2068, V. S. C. S., controls. Texarkana & Ft. S. Ry. v. Casey, 172 S. W. 729; Tex.

L. A. v. Fleming, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 668, 46 S. W. 63; Hill v. Hill, 193 S. W. 727.

[4] If the objections and exceptions which the trial judge, by indorsement, converted into a bill of exception may be considered as such, the fourth subdivision quoted above is too general to be considered. M., K. & T. Ry. Co. of Texas v. Churchill, 171 S. W. 517; K. C., M. & O. Ry. Co. v. Corn, 186 S. W. 807; Morris v. McSpadden, 179 S. W. 554. We agree with appellant that it is a hard rule which will permit lessees of approximately 2,000 acres of land to procure a lease for the first 2 years for a consideration of $1 and maintain the option in force by the annual payment of $1 for the remaining 3 years without any definite promise to develop the land at any time during the 5-year term, but it is not the province of the court to make contracts. Under the weight of authority we would not be justified in declaring the lease void upon the ground of inadequacy of consideration. There is nothing in the record to show that any development was going on upon other lands anywhere within the vicinity of the land in question, and it appears that the parties negotiated for several days, making one trip to inspect the premises before the deal was closed. The appellant testified that during the negotiations, prior to the execution of the lease, the appellees said they expected to sell leases to put down a well, and hoped to sell them to railroad men around the shops. He further testified:

"They spoke about leasing land and would try to get a well. * * * We discussed that it would take a lot of money and time to develop, and they discussed the drilling and cost of it among themselves, and that it took a lot of acreage in wildcat territory to get a drilling contract. * * * I do remember that they said it would take a lot of money and time to get a drilling contract, and we understood that steel and machinery were hard to get hold of. * * * They also discussed at the same time other leases to help this drilling, and they made efforts to get others, and I assisted them in locating some of these leases. * * * They wanted about 5,000 acres. * * * They thought they could get a driller for what I and Mrs. Dunaway had, and I thought so too. There were two sections of the Dunaway land, and that, added to my 22, makes 3,200 acres, but I have understood from other parties that there was some kind of a muddle over that land. * * * On the first trip appellees spoke of selling stock in order to get money to drill."

From this testimony it appears that appellant understood that the development of the land which all the parties testified was the real consideration depended upon securing at least 5,000 acres, and that early development, even with that number of acres, was doubtful. The fact that the land 2½ years later may have a lease value of $3 to $6 per acre is foreign to the issue. It is held and so stated by this court in the Talley Case, court of equity should not declare the contract void on that ground. In the light of the surrounding circumstances, at the time when the contract in question was executed, we are not prepared to say that the price was so grossly inadequate as to suggest fraud. The issue of fraud was decided against appellant. It may be that appellant's pleadings are sufficiently full to raise the issue of abandonment by the lessees, and there is some evidence tending to support the contention. The matter is not before us for consideration, however, as appellant did not request that the issue be submitted to the jury. The question is waived in this court by a proposition urged under the third assignment of error. This assignment is predicated upon the refusal of the court to direct a verdict for appellant, and the proposition is therefore not germane to the assignment, as it does not present fundamental error.

[5] Appellant's first and second assignments of error are based upon the court's action in refusing to permit him to prove that the defendants were not financially able to put down a well upon the land. The testimony above quoted shows that appellant fully understood the financial inability of appellees at the time of and prior to the execution of the lease, and was informed by the lessees that they must secure, in all, leases upon about 5,000 acres of land, and sell the stock in order to secure the money for development. The contention under these assignments we think is disposed of by the case of Griffin v. Bell, 202 S. W. 1037, in which it is said:

"The state of the evidence in this case was such as to sustain a finding that the contract was executed under circumstances free from fraud, and that all of the parties signed it with a fair understanding of its provisions. It gave the lessees the liberty of assigning their rights to third parties. The fact that they acquired the option granted with no intention of then drilling for minerals, but with a view of selling that privilege at a profit is no ground for cancellation. They had not bound themselves to sink wells, and they violated no agreement by failure to do so."

[6] There are a number of propositions urged under the third assignment, which have been disposed of by what has heretofore been said. If the lessees had bound themselves to sink a well within a given time, less than 5 years, and had failed, the right to cancel the contract would be clear, but the alternative is given them of paying the $1 rental annually, and thereby postponing development to the end of the term. In view of this provision a failure or refusal on the part of appellees to develop does not, as a matter of an extreme case, we cannot, under the authorities, go further than to sustain the implied holding of the trial court, the effect of which is to declare the consideration valuable and adequate.

It seems that the lease contract was executed in duplicate or possibly triplicate originals, and the one delivered to appellant is sent up as an original paper with the statement of facts. The blanks were filled with a typewriter and by the use of carbon, and it is difficult to determine from this copy whether the lessees are given until March 1, 1918, or 1919, in which to commence a well, but it appears from the statement of facts that the other copies of the lease made at the same time show this date to be 1919. The effect of this is to grant appellees a 2-year lease upon payment of $1 before they would be required to begin operations in order to prevent a forfeiture. In this connection it may be stated that the jury found that Whitaker correctly read the lease to appellant.

Under the eighth assignment it is contended that the verdict is insufficient to support the judgment because the jury failed to agree upon the special issue submitted at appellant's request, inquiring whether or not more rapid development was prevented by war regulations. This issue was based upon one of the defenses urged by the appellees, and in view of the condition of the record it is an immaterial matter to appellant. If the $1 consideration is a valuable one, even though the answer to this issue had been in appellant's favor, it could not affect the result.

The remaining assignments present no reversible error, and the judgment is affirmed.

WALKER v. J. N. HIRSCH COOPERAGE CO. (No. 584.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Beaumont. June 8, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 23, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \Rightarrow 758(2)—Refusal of issues not considered, where brief does not show written request.

Assignments of error to the refusal of the trial court to submit three special issues cannot be considered, where there was no statement in the brief showing that the special issues were requested in the writing before the case was submitted to the jury, nor even that they were requested and refused by the court at any time.

2. Appeal and error \Rightarrow 500(2), 758(2)—Assignments to sustaining of exception to plea not valid, where record does not show exception.

An assignment that the court erred in sustaining defendant's exception to plaintiff's plea shows no error, where the statement in the brief and the record itself do not show any exception to the plea.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; Ewing Boyd, Judge.

Action by James Walker against the J. N. Hirsch Cooperage Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles Murphy, of Houston, for appellant.
Baker, Botts, Parker & Garwood and Fouts & Patterson, all of Houston, for appellee.

HIGHTOWER, C. J. Appellant, James Walker, sued appellee, J. N. Hirsch Cooperage Company, in the district court of Harris county for damages claimed on account of personal injuries alleged to have been sustained in consequence of negligence attributable to appellee. In his petition appellant alleged five specific grounds of negligence against appellee, but upon conclusion of the evidence the trial court seems to have entertained the opinion that only one of the grounds of negligence alleged should be submitted to the jury, which was done, and the jury's finding in answer to a special issue submitting that ground was favorable to appellee, and judgment was rendered upon the verdict in favor of appellee. After his motion for new trial had been overruled, appellant properly perfected his appeal, and presents in his brief six assignments of error, by which he seeks to have this court reverse the judgment.

[1] The first three assignments complain, substantially, of the refusal of the trial court to submit three special issues embracing grounds of negligence pleaded by appellant, in addition to that submitted by the court. To the consideration of these assignments appellee strenuously objects, pointing out several reasons; but it will suffice to say that following these assignments there is no statement in the brief showing that these special issues were requested in writing before the case was submitted to the jury, nor does it even appear, from the statement in the brief following the assignment, that such issues were requested at any time and refused by the court. For that reason, as well as others pointed out by appellee, we decline to consider the first three assignments. The holdings of all the courts on this point are so numerous that a mention of the decisions would be superfluous.

By the fourth assignment it is claimed, substantially, that the jury, in determining the issue of negligence submitted to them in favor of appellee, was actuated by prejudice or passion against appellant on account of his race (he being a negro), and we are asked, for that reason, to set aside the jury's verdict. We shall not go into this matter in detail, but, notwithstanding the fact that the assignment is not briefed in accordance with the rules, at the same time we have gone to the record and considered the assignment upon its merits, and hold that we cannot sustain it, and it is therefore overruled.

By the fifth assignment it is complained that the trial court erred in entering judgment for the defendant upon the jury's verdict, and erred in refusing to set aside the findings of the jury on the special issue submitted to them. Considering this assignment also upon its merits, in the light of the record, we have concluded that it cannot be sustained and must be overruled.

[2] The sixth assignment of error is as follows:

"The court erred in sustaining the exception of the defendant to the plaintiff's plea in the alternative, wherein plaintiff asks for damages for failure of defendant to inform and advise him that defendant carried insurance."

This assignment is followed by this proposition:

"Where it develops that plaintiff sustained an injury with the defendant corporation carrying the workmen's compensation, and appellant did not know of such compensation until after the institution of his suit and after the time had elapsed within which he should file his claim, the failure of the corporation to notify and advise plaintiff renders the corporation itself liable for such a sum as it would have had to pay had plaintiff been notified in the first instance and availed himself of the insurance."

It will be noted that the assignment complains that the trial court sustained an exception interposed by appellee touching the above-mentioned plea by appellant. From the statement contained in appellant's brief, however, it is not shown that any exception on the part of appellee to such plea was ever presented to the trial court or ever ruled upon one way or the other by him. In fact, the record itself on this point is silent. We therefore must hold that the assignment points out no error, even if we should go to the record in the absence of anything in the statement following the assignment touching this complaint.

This disposes of all the assignments of error, and the conclusion is that the judgment must be affirmed; and it will be so ordered.

1. Bills and notes 493(3), 497(2)—Maker has burden of proving failure of consideration and assignee's notice.

Maker of note sued by assignee, conceding execution and delivery and assignment before maturity, has burden of proof on defense that consideration failed and that assignee had notice thereof.

2. Bills and notes 518(1)—Failure of consideration not shown.

Failure of consideration of note given to corporation, which was to acquire land and issue stock to maker, is not shown; there being no evidence that the land will not be acquired and the stock issued.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; J. D. Harvey, Judge.

Action by the Arkansas Bank & Trust Company against John H. Kirby and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Andrews, Streetman, Logue & Mobley, of Houston, for appellant.

J. W. Lewis, of Houston, for appellee.

HODGES, J. On June 22, 1917, J. H. Kirby, the appellant, executed and delivered to the Marion Coal & Lumber Company his promissory note for the sum of $5,000, due four months after date. A few days thereafter the note was indorsed in blank by Earl D. Sweetwood, treasurer of the Marion Coal & Lumber Company, and delivered to A. N. Walker, the president of that corporation. Some time before its maturity, Walker pledged the note to the Arkansas Bank & Trust Company, the appellee, as collateral to secure his personal obligation amounting to something over $4,000. Walker having failed to pay his indebtedness at maturity, demand was made upon the appellant for the payment of this note. He refused, and this suit was instituted by the appellee against the appellant, the Marion Coal & Lumber Company, and A. N. Walker. Appellant was the only defendant who answered in the court below. He pleaded a failure of consideration, and alleged, in substance, the following facts: That a short time prior to the execution of the note the appellant was approached by A. N. Walker and Earl D. Sweetwood, who represented themselves to be the president and treasurer, respectively, of the corporation known as the Marion Coal & Lumber Company; that Walker also represented that he expected to acquire for that company a large body of timber and coal land situated in Tennessee, with which the appellant was then familiar. Walker further represented that he if secured from the appellant, would be used for the purpose. He further represented that the papers to be delivered in consummation of the purchase were then in the possession of a certain bank in Tennessee, and that, if appellant would advance the amount of $10,000, he (Walker) would immediately proceed to make the purchase of the property. It was thereupon agreed between Walker as the president of the Marion Coal & Lumber Company, and Sweetwood as its treasurer, and the appellant Kirby, that the latter would execute and deliver to the Marion Coal & Lumber Company two notes for the sum of $5,000 each, which should be immediately used by Walker in part payment for the property above referred to; that Walker would proceed to Tennessee and complete the purchase, using the two notes in part payment therefor. In pursuance of that understanding, the appellant executed his notes and delivered them to Walker with the express understanding that they were to be used only in the acquisition of that property. It was further alleged that the representations of Walker were false and fraudulent and were made for the purpose of obtaining the appellant's note for Walker's individual use and benefit, and that the notes were so used for that purpose by Walker. After hearing the evidence, the court gave a peremptory instruction in favor of the plaintiff in the suit.

[1, 2] In this appeal it is contended that the evidence presented issues of fact which should have been submitted to the jury. It is claimed that the testimony was such as to support a finding by the jury that the consideration for which the note was given had failed, and that the appellee was not a purchaser for value and without notice.

The execution and delivery of the note and its assignment before maturity being conceded, the appellant had the burden of proving that the consideration had failed and that the appellee had notice of that fact. In testifying for himself the appellant admitted the execution of the note. He stated that at the time the note was given Walker represented that he (Walker) had decided to make the purchase of the coal lands but lacked part of the money; he wanted appellant to take a part of the investment, which the latter agreed to do and executed this note and another of like amount and delivered them to Walker and Sweetwood. Walker represented that the papers covering the purchase were then in a bank in Chattanooga, Tenn., and that with this $10,000 the purchase could be consummated; that after the purchase was consummated he (Walker) would issue to appellant an agreed amount of the stock of the Marion Coal & Lumber Company as a consideration therefor. On cross-examination he said:

"I first learned that the plaintiff in this case held one of these notes at the maturity of the note, whatever date that was. These properties that I speak of had not been acquired by the Marion Coal & Lumber Company then. I learned from both Mr. Walker and Mr. Sweetwood prior to the maturity of this note, I should say about September 1917, that the consummation of the deal was held up because one of the selling parties had died and it was necessary to have some court proceeding to bind his heirs, and that the deal was halted pending that court action."

The legitimate inference from the above is that the real consideration for the note sued on was stock in the Marion Coal & Lumber Company to be issued in the future. No defense, however, is predicated upon that fact. The evidence relied on by the appellant was not sufficient to justify a finding that the consideration of the note had failed. There was no evidence that the land had not or would not thereafter be acquired, or that the stock in the corporation would not thereafter be issued. The appellee offered testimony, which was not disputed, that the lands were subsequently acquired and were owned at the time of the trial by the Marion Coal & Lumber Company. It is true the evidence shows that this note was pledged by Walker for the purpose of securing his individual indebtedness to the appellee; but, assuming that the consideration had failed in whole or in part, the evidence was not sufficient to show that the appellee had notice of such failure.

It could serve no useful purpose to quote at length from the evidence. We have carefully considered all of the material facts, and have concluded that the judgment should be affirmed.

GOODMAN et al. v. TOPLITZ. (No. 1121.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. El Paso. May 20, 1920.)

Appeal from District Court, El Paso County; Ballard Coldwell, Judge.

Suit by L. S. Toplitz against L. Goodman and Theo. Meyer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Loomis & Kirkland, of El Paso, for appellants.

Beall, Kemp & Nagle and H. Potash, all of El Paso, for appellee.

WALTHALL, J. This suit was brought by appellee, L. S. Toplitz, to recover on a prom-issory note executed by Theo. Meyer and L. Goodman, and made payable to L. S. Toplitz, for the principal sum of $4,100, due and payable 90 days after date, with interest from date, and containing the usual 10 per cent. attorney's fee clause and accelerated maturity clause. The note was given in payment of a stock of shoes sold by appellee to appellant Meyer.

In addition to the general denial, suretyship of Goodman, and certain credits admitted by appellee, appellants pleaded that Toplitz in making the sale of the shoes to Meyer made misrepresentation as to the shoes, and warranted said shoes to be of a certain kind and character. By supplemental petition appellee pleaded that the shoes were sold in bulk; that they were counted out to and accepted by Meyer; that thereafter Meyer made payments on the note and asked for extension of time and repeatedly promised to pay said note, and denied that Goodman was surety on the note.

The case was tried before the court without a jury. The court made and filed findings of fact to the effect: That appellants executed and delivered to appellee the note sued on; found the credits made on the note in the total amount of $1,000, and that same was applied at the several times when made, first to the discharge of the interest, and the balance to the principal; that the note was placed in the hands of an attorney for collection; found the balance due on the note, principal, interest, and attorney's fee, in the total sum of $3,648.37; that the note was due and unpaid; that the note was given in consideration of a stock of shoes sold by appellee to appellant Meyer; "that Toplitz made no false representations as to the kind, quality, size, or style of the shoes, nor the number thereof, and that the full number purchased by Meyer was delivered to him by Toplitz; that the sale of the shoes was a sale in bulk, and not a sale in parcels; and that the market value of the shoes delivered to Meyer was not less than $4,100," the amount of the note. Judgment was entered for appellee against appellants for the amount found due, with interest and attorney's fee, as provided in the note.

Appellants present two assignments of error. The first claims error to the court's finding that Toplitz made no false representations as to the kind, quality, size, and style of the shoes sold by him to Meyer, because said finding is not supported by the evidence. The second claims error in the finding that the sale of the shoes was made in bulk, and not parcels, because not supported by the evidence.

A careful examination of the evidence satisfies us that both of the court's findings complained of are well sustained by the evidence. We need not reproduce the evidence here.

Finding no error, the case is affirmed.
